Which text was also printed and sent to all members of the organization. This particular activity during the 1916 elections was not conducted along partisan lines, nor was it augmented by any other activity. The records of Members of Congress were compiled from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by the executive secretary and Mr. Charles E. Lydecker, the latter at that time being a member of the executive committee of the league. The organization continued its work along its lines of patriotic endeavor to arouse sentiment favorable to increasing of military and naval defenses, and upon the declaration of war in April, 1917, it enlarged its work by seeking, through the medium of addresses, publication of articles, and various other activities for the purpose of stimulating a win-the-war spirit among the people.

During the summer of 1918 one Charles D. Orth, who described himself to be a member of the firm of Hansen & Orth, importers and sellers of rope and binder twine, suggested to certain officers of the league that he desired to offer his services to the organization, and that he had formulated a plan to conduct certain activities in connection with the approaching congressional elections which he thought of importance. After some slight consideration, with no investigation as to the requirement of State or Federal statutes as bearing on activity by the organization in a campaign such as was proposed, and with practically no attention to the question of Mr. Orth's qualifications to conduct such an activity, he was appointed chairman of the league's congressional committee. Shortly thereafter the troubles of the National Security League began. As a result of his management of the congressional activities, differences arose in the executive committee and among members of the league. Mr. Orth was a business man, who had never participated in any particular political activity, and had only followed political matters in the usual manner of a busy citizen engaged in the conduct of a business requiring expert knowledge. He had never made any particular study or investigation of the manner of conducting a campaign of politics or education. He had been a reader of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for some few years, but with no special object in view other than to secure general information upon the work of Congress. He relied principally upon newspaper accounts for the results of congressional deliberation, and was not informed upon the method or the effect of enactment of resolutions or acts by either branch of Congress.

He apparently was not required to prove any adaptability of the plan he proposed to put into execution, but was selected to do the work, and was given a free hand. He caused to be prepared a chart, which was circulated widely, bearing the caption, "Congressional chart on preparedness." This set forth the votes of Members of the House upon eight matters acted upon in the House of Representatives, and was known as the "acid-test" chart.

It tabulated the votes as "wrong" or "right."

It did not set forth the measures voted upon.

It did not accurately set forth the substance of the measures in three instances.

It did not explain what the vote cast was, nor did it supplement the vote shown with subsequent votes upon the same question.

It set forth an interpretation of the measures under consideration by the House which was not warranted and which was unjust.

It did set forth the votes of Members, but it did not explain accurately the effect of the vote cast.

In witness whereof we have made, signed, and acknowledged this certificate in duplicate.

Dated January 7, 1915.

EDWARD H. CLARK.
FRANKLIN Q. BROWN.
J. BERNARD WALKER.
JOHN H. ISELIN.

The idea of organizing the league was first conceived by Mr. S. Stanwood Menken, of 34 West Fifty-second Street, New York City, an attorney whose law firm represents many large business interests.

Mr. Menken testified that the idea first came to him while he was in the gallery of the House of Commons of the British Parliament, listening to a debate in which was discussed the condition of the British nation respecting preparedness for war, early in August, 1914.

Mr. Menken upon his return to the United States communicated with the late Augustus P. Gardner, Representative from Massachusetts, on the subject of forming an organization for the purpose of arousing public sentiment with relation to the actual state of unpreparedness in the United States. He discussed the matter with several of his acquaintances, and late in November, 1914, he, together with Messrs. Herbert Barry, George Haven Putnam, Lawrence F. Abbott, J. Mayhew Wainwright, Charles E. Lydecker, and Franklin Q. Brown——

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. No; not at this time.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, how much time has the gentleman got?

The SPEAKER. Enough to read the report in.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I want to know how much time he has.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not tell how much time he has, but he has time enough to read his report.

Mr. OVERSTREET. But it is getting late. We ought to transact business. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, to continue, on the restoration of order in the House——

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. WALSH. I do not yield to any parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. WALSH. It sought in various ways to arouse public sentiment on the question of preparedness, and in 1916 it issued a tabulated statement of the votes of Members of Congress upon four measures which the league, through a committee, had decided were important preparedness measures.

This table was not in the form of a chart, but in a pamphlet, and it set forth the votes of each Member on the measures indicated as being for or against the pending legislation under consideration. The four measures were as follows:

VOTE IN CONGRESS, BY STATES, ON PREPAREDNESS MEASURES.

House of Representatives: Kahn amendment to the Hay Army bill. Vote by States, March 23, 1916.

United States Senate: Brandegee amendment to the Hay-Chamberlain Army bill; vote by States, April 18, 1916. House of Representatives: Senate's proposal to fix size of Regular Army at 250,000; vote by States in House, May 18, 1916.

United States Senate: Proposition to strike out section 56 of the Chamberlain (Senate) substitute which provided for a Volunteer Reserve Army wholly under Federal control; vote by States, April 18, 1916. House of Representatives: Section 56, Chamberlain (Senate) substitute; vote in House to retain the section, May 8, 1916.

House of Representatives: Vote on motion to recommit naval appropriation bill with instructions for increase, June 2, 1916.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important matter, and I think we should have a quorum present.

Mr. KNUTSON. I think the gentleman should withdraw that suggestion. The gentleman from Massachusetts ought to be allowed to present his side of the case, notwithstanding the fact that he refused to yield to me. I suggest to the gentleman from Oklahoma to withdraw his point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw his point of no quorum?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I do not, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KNUTSON. How long is it going to take to whitewash this National Security League?

The SPEAKER. I do not think it is going to be whitewashed if this House knows its own opinion. [Applause.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the National Security League.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the National Security League. Is there objection?

Mr. KEARNS. I think that ought to be done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Speaker, I avail myself of the leave granted me to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD a memorial to the Congress asking for the establishment in Garfield County, in the State of Utah, of a national monument to be known as the "Temple of the Gods."

This region, known locally as Bryce's Canyon, is one of majestic beauty. The grandeur of its mountain scenery can not be excelled in any spot in America, and those of us who know the region and love it are anxious that it should be set apart as a national park before the land passes into the ownership of private interests.

I include with the memorial a letter of indorsement from Gov. Bamberger, of my State, in transmitting the document to the Congress.

STATE OF UTAH, EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Salt Lake City, February 27, 1919.

Hon. MILTON H. WELLING,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WELLING: I am sending you herewith for your information a copy of a memorial introduced to-day in the lower house of our State legislature asking that Bryce's Canyon be set aside as "The Temple of the Gods National Monument."

Last summer it was my pleasure to visit this scenic wonder, and I concur most heartily in the appeal that it be protected and preserved for the enjoyment of our people. In my estimation it is one of the most remarkable scenic attractions in our entire western country. I am very anxious that such action be taken as will make it a national monument before it has the opportunity to pass into private control.

With kind personal regards, I am,

Sincerely, yours,
SIMON BAMBERGER,
Governor.

A memorial to the Congress of the United States to create the Temple of the Gods National Monument.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States:

Your memorialists, the governor and the Legislature of the State of Utah, respectfully represent:

On the public domain within the boundaries of the Sevier National Forest, in the Pink Mountain region, near Tropic, Garfield County, Utah, there is a canyon popularly referred to as Bryce's Canyon, which has become famed for its wonderful natural beauty. Inasmuch as the State and Federal Governments have indicated a desire that the natural attractions of our State and our country be protected and preserved for the enjoyment of posterity, therefore your memorialists respectfully urge that the Congress of the United States set aside for the use and enjoyment of the people a suitable area embracing Bryce's Canyon as a national monument under the name of "The Temple of the Gods National Monument."

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the use of the mails for the promotion of fraudulent enterprises under the guise of war charities and patriotic organizations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk read a telegram which I have received.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to have a telegram read. Is there objection?

Mr. BRITTEN. What is the telegram about?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. The Irish question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to have read a telegram on the Irish question. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

TULSA, OKLA., March 3, 1919.

Congressman CHANDLER,
Washington, D. C.:

At a banquet of the Knights of Columbus and their friends in the city to-night the following resolutions were adopted, with instructions that copies be telegraphed to you:

"Whereas the supreme board of directors of the Knights of Columbus, at a meeting held in New York January 4, adopted resolutions setting forth that Ireland has a right to self-determination 'which can not be denied,' and asking President Wilson to use his great influence at the peace conference in this behalf; and

"Whereas the National Convention of the Friends of Irish Freedom, representing some millions of our citizens and held in Philadelphia recently, urged the claims of the Irish people to self-determination in the name of justice, because 'all governments derive their just power from the consent of the governed'; in the name of America, because no other people have contributed more than those of Irish blood to the creation, upbuilding, development, preservation, and defense of our great country; in the name of Ireland, because she has struggled for freedom for centuries and in the last few months her people have declared by an overwhelming majority their dissatisfaction with their present Government and their determination to be free and independent of any outside power or influence; in the name of humanity and peace and order, because war can not be brought to an end and a just and permanent peace established except by the application of the doctrine of self-determination to Ireland as well as to all the other small nations of the earth; and

"Whereas the mayor and city commissioners of the city of Tulsa, at a recent meeting adopted resolutions in agreement with the same sentiments, and declaring further that the people of Ireland are and have a right to be free and independent, and the delegates of the Irish Constituent Assembly, Count Plunkett Edward Devalera and Arthur Griffith, should be seated at the peace conference; and that this Government should recognize the Irish republic; and

"Whereas we, the members of the Knights of Columbus and their friends of the city of Tulsa, believe that the majority of the people of this community sympathize with the aspirations and demands of the Irish people as set forth in the resolutions above referred to: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we hereby indorse and approve the resolutions of the board of national directors, the friends of Irish freedom, and the mayor and city commissioners of the city of Tulsa; and be it further

"Resolved, That we extend to President Wilson our best wishes for a safe and speedy voyage to Paris, with the hope that his labors for peace be crowned with success, and, to quote his own words when making the motion for the appointment of the league of nations committee, that the peace conference 'will not dare to compromise on this principle, that they are the masters of no people, but are there to see that every people in the world shall choose its own masters and govern its own destinies.'"

A. A. DAVIDSON, Toastmaster.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has the floor.

Mr. WALSH. I ask for order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HEFLIN. I was just going to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of cotton.

Mr. WALSH. I do not yield, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will all take their seats. There will be plenty of time. The gentleman from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, to continue, I was speaking about the pamphlet which was circulated by this organization during the elections of 1916 and had enumerated the four measures which were contained in that pamphlet, the vote for and against which had been set forth in the pamphlet by the committee having the matter in charge. The votes were set forth without characterization and without comment, except that those who voted for the measures indicated their preference for preparedness and those voting against the measures were voting against measures which would provide more effectual defense.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan makes the point that no quorum is present, and evidently there is none.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SABATH) there were 71 ayes and 1 no.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 238 Members have answered to their names—a quorum.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, to continue from the point where I was interrupted: In addition to the preparation and circulation of the chart, the league, at his suggestion and with his participation in their preparation, sent out news items, bulletins, and publicity matter, the plain intent of which was to impugn the loyalty of Members of Congress who had been tabulated as voting wrong on the eight test votes or any of them. It compiled a roll of honor consisting of 47 Members of the House of Representatives who had voted right, in the estimation of the league, upon all of the eight measures, and tabulated Members who had voted wrong as not 100 per cent American.

In addition to the chart circulated by the league, Mr. Orth prepared a questionnaire, which was sent to Members of the House asking them to bind themselves to vote in a certain way upon certain measures, and submitting inquiries in such a way that to have answered in any manner except as the league plainly desired would have been to bring down the condemnation of the organization, with attacks upon the Members' loyalty.

It was the purpose of Mr. Orth, according to his testimony, in sending out the questionnaire to furnish to the Members of the House of the Sixty-fifth Congress who might have been candidates for reelection an opportunity to correct any error in the chart or any injustice done them by the chart; and it was Mr. Orth's intention to circulate the replies to the questionnaire and to correct any unfairness "in the closing hours of the campaign."

In one or two instances where an explanation was attempted by Representatives of their vote or of their being recorded as not voting, Mr. Orth immediately engaged in a controversy, seeking to justify his action, and failed or neglected to correct the unfairness and manifest injustice done.

The committee of which Mr. Orth was chairman failed to consider, and he apparently did not appreciate, the many measures of vital importance passed by record votes subsequent to our entry into the war, and no credit was accorded the Members for the votes or work for the enactment of these many vital war measures.

The officials of the league, with three notable exceptions, strenuously contended that the activity of the organization as conducted by Mr. Orth was not engaging in a political activity, the three exceptions being the honorary president, Elihu Root; the honorary vice president, Alton B. Parker; and the executive secretary, Henry L. West, these gentlemen agreeing that such activity was political but not partisan.

While the literature of the league generally proclaimed that its work, as conducted by the congressional committee, was simply a campaign of education, its work was in no wise under the jurisdiction of its educational director, and in several instances its effort was directed against particular candidates in an attempt to defeat them at the election.

Now, Mr. Speaker, before presenting my conclusion on all the testimony, and because of the language of the resolution adopted by this House calling for an investigation, I desire to present to the Members present the by-laws of this organization and to ask your careful attention to the language incorporated in these by-laws. But before doing that, Mr. Speaker, I desire here and now to say that my presentation of this report is in no way——

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, no business has been conducted since a quorum was found to be present a short while ago.

The SPEAKER. Oh, yes; the Chair thinks there has been. The Chair will count.

Mr. RIORDAN (interrupting the count). Can the Chair pay attention to Members who are going out of the Hall now? There are many Members leaving the Hall.

The SPEAKER. There is no way of keeping them here if they want to leave. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-seven Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 228 gentlemen answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD——

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not do anything until we get rid of this call.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Not now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, to continue, I desire to read the by-laws of the National Security League.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is reading so fast we can not understand it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to read as fast as he pleases.

Mr. WALSH. These articles and the by-laws are all that I shall direct attention to in order to present now the conclusions which I desire to submit. From all the testimony the following conclusions are, in my opinion, fully justified: That the National Security League from its foundation contributed in a large measure to the work of arousing patriotic sentiment in the country, both before and after our entry into the war. Its campaign of patriotism through education was a commendable work. Its funds were secured chiefly from men engaged or interested in business enterprises of vast importance, although the membership fees from its eighty-odd thousand members were no insignificant amount. Its officials were, for the most part, inspired by patriotic purposes, but were in some instances not disposed to be frank in their testimony, and at least one of its officers has not hesitated to express sentiments hardly to be expected from persons directing an organization seeking to inculcate patriotism and love for our Government.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. QUIN. I think the conclusions the gentleman has reached are important, and I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi makes the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum has just been ascertained to be present only a moment ago and that this is a dilatory motion.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is not well taken.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws the point of order.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. COLLIER. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. WALSH. I prefer not to yield.

Mr. COLLIER. Then I shall not interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, to continue. Its congressional committee engaged in political activity, and in at least three instances sought directly to defeat a sitting Member of the Sixty-fifth Congress.

It circulated literature that carried the insinuation that Members who had voted upon measures selected by the league, and whose votes had been by it denominated as wrong votes, were not loyal.

It has filed no return or account of the expenditures made by the league in carrying on its activity, and while it is claimed that only $5,900 or thereabouts was expended in its congressional activity, this does not include salaries of those engaged, nor the cost of printing and circulation of literature other than the chart and questionnaire. This sum expended in the congressional campaign was collected particularly for the purpose, and some $8,000 was received for this fund.

Its activity through the congressional committee furnished information in such form as to invite most unfavorable and unjust criticism of the records of Members of the House of Representatives, and failed to lay all the facts before the people, whom, it is alleged, an effort was being made to educate. It is not contended that any evidence of malice in any particular instance is shown.

Its honorary officers were not cognizant of the detailed activities of the congressional committee, but freely expressed to your committee their disapproval of certain things done or sought to be accomplished. The honorary vice president expressed emphatically his disapproval of the congressional activity as conducted by Mr. Orth at a meeting of the executive committee.

The branch organizations at Chicago and Milwaukee operated independent of the parent organization at New York.

The Chicago branch sought directly to defeat FRED A. BRITTEN for nomination in the primaries in September, 1918.

The Wisconsin branch did not participate in either the primary or election campaign in Wisconsin.

The Federal statute requiring the filing of expenditures apparently includes within its scope an organization such as the National Security League when it engages in activity such as was conducted by its congressional committee during the national congressional elections in 1918——

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the gentleman withdraw the point; I have only two more sentences to read.

Mr. SNELL. I will withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. WALSH. The work conducted by the league through its congressional committee was not such as was contemplated or permitted under the charter granted by the State of New York. The above conclusions are respectfully submitted without recommendation. [Applause.]

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the majority report, and upon that motion I move the previous question.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understood I was to have recognition.

The SPEAKER. Of course, the gentleman is to be recognized as soon as we get through with this thing. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves the adoption of the majority report, and on that motion he moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BROWNE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to was laid on the table.

INDEPENDENCE OF IRELAND.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass H. J. Res. 357, the Irish resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to suspend the rules and pass the resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 357) requesting the commissioners plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the international peace conference to present to the said canference the right of Ireland to freedom, independence, and self-determination.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Texas is entitled to 20 minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER]. [Applause.]

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from Illinois proceeds, may we have the resolution read?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the commissioners plenipotentiary of the United States of America representing the United States at the international peace conference soon to assemble at Versailles be, and are hereby, requested to present to and to urge upon the said international peace conference the right to freedom, independence, and self-determination of Ireland, predicated upon the principle laid down by the President in his plea for an international league, that "all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed."

The Clerk read the committee amendment, as follows:

Page 1, strike out lines 1 to 9, inclusive, and page 2, lines 1 and 2, inclusive, and insert:

"Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the earnest hope of the Congress of the United States of America that the peace conference, now sitting in Paris, in passing upon the rights of various peoples, will favorably consider the claims of Ireland to the right of self-determination."

And amend the title.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER] is recognized.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Which resolution is offered, the original or the amendment? We can not amend on a motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The one that is read is the one.

Mr. MANN. He read both. Instead of the original joint resolution the committee reported by striking out and reporting the concurrent resolution. Now, the Clerk read both. I suppose we do not want to pass both.

Mr. FLOOD. We want to pass the substitute for the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the substitute again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the earnest hope of the Congress of the United States of America that the peace conference, now sitting in Paris, in passing upon the rights of various peoples, will favorably consider the claims of Ireland to the right of self-determination.

Amend the title so as to read: "Concurrent resolution expressing the earnest hope of the Congress of the United States that the peace conference will favorably consider self-determination for Ireland."

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, this is not a party question. It is a matter that has been brought to the attention of this House by more resolutions than have ever been introduced on any subject we have had to deal with in this House since the breaking out of the war. It is a question that millions of people in America are interested in and a question that liberty-loving people all over the world are anxious to have settled and settled right if we expect to have peace in the world.

We have been given hope by the declarations of our President that the rights of small nations would be considered if we met with success at the termination of the war. Hope, it is true, so far as Ireland is concerned, has been long deferred, but we have been encouraged in the new and widespread movement for the freedom of small nations to believe that Ireland's claims will at last be given consideration.

In his great message to Congress asking for a declaration of war on Germany on April 2, 1917, President Wilson said:

It is a fearful thing to lead this great, peaceful people into war, into the most terrible and disastrous of all wars, civilization itself seeming to be in the balance.

But the right is more precious than peace, and we shall fight for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts—for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free.

It would seem strange, indeed, in view of these facts, if the people of Ireland and men of Irish blood in America did not feel that it was but just to demand for Ireland the same rights as those to be accorded all the other small nations. We have a right to feel, and we do feel, that this Government at least is in honor bound to apply these principles without reservation to Ireland, as well as all the other small nations, demanding liberty, freedom, and independence.

We ask consideration of the resolution that has been favorably reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, expressing the earnest hope of the Congress of the United States that the peace conference will take up the question of self-determination for Ireland.

I introduced in the House some two years ago a resolution quite similar to the one we are called upon to consider, and when the peace commissioners were appointed I changed the resolution:

Requesting the commissioners plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the international peace conference to present to the said conference the right of Ireland to freedom, independence, and self-determination.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, after considering my resolution, reported the same to the House with this substituted, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the earnest hope of the Congress of the United States of America that the peace conference, now sitting in Paris, in passing upon the rights of various peoples, will favorably consider the claims of Ireland to the right of self-determination.

And the resolution is now before this House for action.

I am sure that this Congress will go down in history as perhaps the greatest Congress in the history of the Republic; it will be known as the war Congress; and by passing this resolution giving hope to the suffering people of Ireland, who have been oppressed for centuries, it will only be a fitting finish to our labors here if we pass it. [Applause.] What we who have labored in the cause of freedom and liberty for Ireland want is an expression from this House; we are anxious to have the resolution passed. It has been said that if we do pass the resolution it will have no influence at the peace conference. Well, it may; I am willing to take the chance. I am satisfied, if we pass it, that we may get action by the Senate before the Senate adjourns. If we do not, it will be an expression by this House that I am sure will cause our commissioners to at least bring our request to the attention of the peace conference in Paris. [Applause.]

Poland has at last been made free; the Czecho-Slovaks are free; and I am sure we all congratulate the people of those countries. Shall we allow it to be said that the people of Ireland must still remain in bondage? I am unwilling to believe it. If the peace conference does not arrange for a permanent peace in the world, then the peace conference will have been a failure.

Only a week ago I attended a convention of the Irish race in America, assembled at Philadelphia, with over 5,000 delegates in attendance from all parts of the United States. They adopted resolutions calling upon the President and Congress of these United States of America to urge the peace conference now in session at Paris to apply to Ireland the great doctrine of national self-determination, and to recognize the right of the people of Ireland to select for themselves, without interference from any other people, the form of government under which in future they shall live, and I want to read to you the last paragraph of those resolutions:

Upon the shoulders of our President and Congress rests, in the last analysis, the responsibility of the peace that shall be made. We urge them to act in accordance with the doctrines laid down on our behalf when we entered the war, and in accordance with the resolution recently adopted, almost unanimously, by the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, to the end that autocracy and militarism may be forever destroyed, and that the right of self-determination shall be given to all the people of the earth.

Let me give you a few reasons why we make the claim for freedom and self-determination for the Emerald Isle. I am indebted to the Irish National Bureau, Washington, D. C., for many of these facts and figures.

Ireland is a nation widely different from the English in race, tongue, traditions, and native culture.

In December, 1918, the Irish nation expressed itself in self-determination for an Irish Republic by over two-thirds majority vote of the electorate.

The Irish people gave this striking proof of unanimity—one that challenges the world to duplicate—notwithstanding the presence of a foreign army of over 200,000 men, with all but two of the leaders of the new national party in jail in England without charge or trial, with over 200 election workers and 3 successive campaign directors in jail without charge or trial.

Ireland gave over 275,000 of her sons to the British Army in this war, which was 6½ per cent of her whole population and about 40 per cent of her entire man power of military age (from 18 to 50).

What will the new leaders of Ireland do with the Ulster question?

They might well do as Washington did with his Ulster question in 1776, when 50,000 "loyalist" Americans fought with England against American independence. He ignored it. But the Irish Republicans mean to win over such of their Ulster countrymen as still remain opposed to the idea of an independent Ireland.

Hobson, Blythe, Morrow, and others of the Ulster Protestant leaders of Sinn Fein have every confidence that their neighbors will soon stand where their fathers did in 1783—for a free Ireland.

The Irish election of December last was made on one issue only: "Shall Ireland be independent of Great Britain?"

Over two-thirds of the members returned were of the Sinn Fein or Independence Party.

As their election posters stated: "The supreme and paramount issue is, 'To destroy the last link that keeps Ireland bound to England' (Parnell, Cincinnati, 1880)."

The election returns were:

Sinn Fein, of which one is from University	73
Unionists, of which three are from University	25
Devlin followers who may sit in Dublin Parliament as an opposition party (their platform was self-determination for Ireland)	7
	105

Before the December elections the Unionists had only 16 seats in Ulster. They have now made three gains owing to three-cornered contests against Republican and Dillon party candidates.

In addition to this, the Unionists have the five new seats that were in 1918 given to Ulster at the expense of southern counties.

This clever piece of gerrymandering enacted last year so added to the seats in Antrim County, of which Belfast is the county seat, that it alone has 14 members and the other 8 counties of Ulster have only 24 between them all.

Over two-thirds of the electoral districts have returned Sinn Fein Republican candidates.

Population of all Ireland is three-fourths Catholic and one-fourth Protestant, of which over one-fifth are Nationalists opposed to English rule.

In other words, over four-fifths of Ireland's population are already opposed to English rule in Ireland.

Ulster is, as a whole, 56 per cent Protestant.

Ulster is 44 per cent Catholic.

In five Ulster counties the Catholics predominate, being 81 per cent, 78 per cent, 74 per cent, 56 per cent, 55 per cent.

In four Ulster counties Protestants predominate, being 80 per cent, 69 per cent, 55 per cent, 55 per cent.

To advocates of the English scheme to cut out Ulster from the rest of Ireland I submit: If an Ulster minority in all Ireland—885,000 in the total for all Ireland of 4,390,000—has the right to demand a separate government, what about the rights of the Catholics of Ulster—695,000 out of the Ulster total of 1,570,000?

I will now cite a few of the reasons that demonstrate there is no impropriety in Congress intervening in favor of Irish freedom:

The precedent-making stand taken by the American Government in refusing to continue a treaty with Russia because of Russia's treatment of the Jews, purely an internal question.

American intervention against her historical friend and associate in the great war, illustrated by President Wilson's opposition to the secret treaties, which has caused their cancellation, notwithstanding the fact that the powerful French party, then and now dominated by Premier Clemenceau, was committed to the policy of annexing the left bank of the Rhine, as arranged by secret treaty with England, Russia, and Italy during the war.

The American Government's declaration of sympathy in favor of Greece during her struggle for independence, and American intervention which secured Cuban independence.

GENTLEMEN OF THE CONGRESS, WILL YOU NOT REDEEM THE PLEDGE OF THE CONGRESS OF 1778?

Ireland appeals to-day to the world, and particularly to America, to support her claim for self-determination.

Americans of Irish and Scotch blood, and millions of Americans besides, trust the Congress of to-day will redeem the pledge of the Congress of 1778.

"I am charged to assure you that means will be found to establish your freedom in the fullest and amplest measure," said Franklin in his address to the Irish people on October 4, 1778, writing out of the fullness of the powers delegated to him by Congress.

We appeal to you to pass the resolution unanimously that Ireland may be freed and that it may be forever recorded in history to the lasting honor of America and of you, gentlemen of the Congress.

Ireland has the most ancient continuous nationhood of all the countries of western Europe.

Yet the Irish people to-day are the only Caucasian people held subject by an alien people against their will.

In every generation since 1172 the sons of Ireland have sacrificed their lives for Irish freedom. In every generation they have repeated the protest of Donenail O'Niall, high king of Ireland in 1258, who denounced the invaders and declared that until the day of Ireland's freedom dawned the Irish people would unceasingly struggle "to recover our independence, which is our national right."

A roll of nations will shortly be called in the world-molding conference at Paris.

"America!" "England!" "France!" "Belgium!" and on through the list of peoples, free and being freed.

"Finland!" "Esthonia!" "Ukrainia!" and the rest. Each of these can answer "Here!"

When Ireland's turn has come, who will reply to the call?

Gentlemen of the House, America's support to-day to the Irish nation, so valiantly enduring, will redeem the pledge of Congress in 1778 and help to free America's first friend and ally.

Were Congress to refuse this support it would not alone break faith with all that is highest in American traditions and with the definite obligations laid upon this country by George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, and their glorious associates, but it would break faith with some more near, with the heroes who sleep in Flanders fields, and who now say:

I gave my life for freedom; this I know,
For ye who sent me told me so.

"Lafayette, we are here!" said Pershing at the French hero's tomb, with the thought of America's debt in his mind. * * *

"Ireland, we're standing by, and we'll see you through!"

Can America say anything less now to Ireland in the throes of her final struggle?

IRISH RELIEF FOR AMERICA.

The first trans-Atlantic Hurleys and Hoovers were Dublin men.

In 1675 "King Philip's War" laid New England waste. The only country in the world that sent relief to America then was Ireland.

An Irish relief ship sailed from Dublin for Boston on July 28, 1676, with a generous cargo which gave relief in 500 settlements.

Dublin Corporation sent three commissioners with the ship to attend to the distribution of what is known in New England annals as "the Irish donation."

IRISH MONEY FOR AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

America's Rebellion was prompted by the eternal spirit of Sinn Fein in the hearts of the people, and when the rebels were enduring indescribable hardships and Congress was unable to raise the money it was a group of Philadelphia gentlemen who subscribed the money to supply the Army with provisions and clothing. Of the total amount subscribed, £315,000, close to one-half was subscribed by Philadelphia Sons of St. Patrick and Hibernians.

Much has been said in history of Robert Morris as "financier of the Revolution" and how he later occupied a debtor's prison because of advances made to the Government, but we never hear of Oliver Pollock, a native of Ireland, who settled in Carlisle, Pa., in 1760, who made advances to the sum of $300,000, over $100,000 of which had not been returned to him at the time of his death; nor of Edward Fox, a native of Dublin, who was ruined by the large advances made to Robert Morris and associates. In 1797 these gentlemen still owed him $900,000. (Supreme Court Pa., 2; Norris Repts., 512.) Thomas Fitzsimmons also lent large sums to Morris to finance the revolution.

IRISHMEN IN WASHINGTON'S ARMY.

"Gen. Lee informed me that he believel fully one-half of the rebel army was composed of Irish."—Maj. Gen. Robertson to English committee of inquiry, 1779.

"The names and places of their nativity being taken down, I can answer the question with precision. There were scarcely one-fourth natives of America; one-half were Irish, the other fourth English and Scotch."—Ex-Speaker Galloway, of Pennsylvania, testifying before the same committee. (Royal Gazette, Oct. 27, 1779.)

The first troops to sail from France to America's aid were four regiments (all Irish) of the Irish Brigade, under command of Count Dillon.

Irish emigration increased as talk of American independence grew. After Franklin's mission to Ireland emigration leaped to 18,500 yearly, mostly men of every class, whose direct purpose was to bear arms in the Revolution.

While Burke and Barre pleaded in England for America an anti-recruiting society, known as the "White Boys," was organized in Ireland for the purpose of preventing enlistments in the regiments selected for the American campaign, and American privateers were welcomed in Irish ports, where they were supplied with provisions and information as to the whereabouts of the enemy war vessels.

"The most conclusive evidence of the prominence of the Irish race in the accomplishment of America's independence is to be found in the abundance of Irish names in the lists of soldiers of the Revolution."—Maginnis.

George Washington recognized the aid of the Irish in the American Revolution:

I accept with singular pleasure the ensign of so worthy a fraternity as that of the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick, a society distinguished for the firm adherence of its members to the glorious cause in which we are embarked. (December, 1781, when elected an honorary member of the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick, of Philadelphia.)

Again, in 1790:

I hope ever to see America amongst the foremost nations in examples of justice and liberality, and I presume that your fellow citizens will not forget the patriotic part which you took in the accomplishment of their revolution and in the establishment of their Government.

George Washington Parke Custis, adopted son of Washington, said in 1828, in an address upon an appeal for aid from Ireland:

And why is this imposing appeal made to our sympathies?

It is an appeal from that very Ireland whose generous sons, alike in the day of gloom and of our glory, shared in our misfortunes and joined in our success; who, with undaunted courage, breasted the storm which, once threatening to overwhelm us, howled with fearful and desolating fury through this now happy land; who, with aspirations deep and fervent for our cause, whether under the walls of the Castle of Dublin, in the shock of our liberty's battles, or in the feeble, expiring accents of famine and misery amidst the horrors of the prison ships, cried from their hearts, "God save America."

Tell me not of the aid which we received from another European nation in the struggle for independence; that aid was most, nay, all, essential to our ultimate success, but remember, years of conflict had rolled away. Of the operatives in war—I mean the soldier—up to the coming of the French, Ireland had furnished in the ratio of 100 for 1 of any foreign nation whatever. Then honored be the old good service of the sons of Erin in the War of Independence. Let the shamrock be entwined with the laurels of the Revolution, and truth and justice guiding the pen of history inscribe upon the tablets of American remembrance "eternal gratitude to Irishmen."

The Marquis de Chastellusi, a major general in Rochambeau's army, wrote in his "Travels" (Paris, 1786):

An Irishman, the instant he sets foot on American ground, becomes, ipso facto, an American. This was uniformly the case during the whole of the late war.

* * * Indeed, their conduct during the late Revolution amply justified this favorable opinion, for whilst the Irish emigrant was fighting the battles of America by sea and land the Irish merchants, particularly at Charleston, Baltimore, and Philadelphia, labored with indefatigable zeal and at all hazards to promote the spirit of enterprise, to increase the wealth and maintain the credit of the country.

Their purses were always open and their persons devoted to the common cause. On more than one imminent occasion Congress owed their existence, and America probably her preservation, to the fidelity and firmness of the Irish.

IRISH FRIENDS OF AMERICAN FREEDOM.

Commodore Jack Barry, the dashing sailor hero, who was the founder of the American Navy, was a native of Wexford, Ireland, a Gael of the finest type, keen, resourceful, audacious, and ardent.

The first naval engagement of the American Revolution was off Maine, fought and won under the direction of five sons of Maurice O'Brien, of Cork. The only naval battle on inland waters, in 1812, was won by Commodore Thomas MacDonough, son of an Irishman.

The first American officer to raise the American flag over a fortress in the Old World was Lieut. O'Bannon, of the United States Marines, in the Tripolitan War of 1805.

Gen. Anthony Wayne—Gen. Henry Lee, in his Memoirs (1808) writes of the Irishry of "Mad Anthony Wayne" and "the native temper of the troops he commanded. They were known by the designation of the line of Pennsylvania, whereas they might have with more propriety been called the line of Ireland. Bold and daring, * * * the general and his soldiers were singularly fitted for close and stubborn action, hand to hand, in the center of the Army."

Patrick Henry—Shall Ireland alone of all the civilized nations of the world remain in subjection to a foreign power?

"The thought is tragic—in the light of Ireland's long unceasing struggle for liberty, in the story of Easter, 1916, and in the ardent hopes of 20,000,000 of Irish blood overseas. For in the hearts of each of these is an echo of the ringing call of Patrick Henry, whose Irish blood prompted the cry that was Virginia's tocsin to revolution in 1776: 'As for me, give me liberty or give me death.'"

Nineteen generals in the Revolutionary Army were of Irish origin—11 of these born in Ireland—Sullivan, Lewis, Wayne, Montgomery, Conway, Noylan, Thompson, Maxwell, Irvine, Hand, Butler, Stewart, Knox, Clinton, Moore, Reed, Nixon, Cochran, Armstrong.

Ten signers of the Declaration of Independence were of Irish blood—Carroll, McKean, Rutledge, Hart, Thornton, Smith, Taylor, Reed, Paine, and Lynch.

Seven States had as their first governors men of Irish blood—Sullivan, in Massachusetts; Boyle, in Illinois; Clinton, in New York; Houston, in Georgia; Bryan, in Pennsylvania; McKinley, in Delaware; Denver, in Kansas; while Sir William Johnson, first governor of the Indians, was properly a MacShane, a sept of the O'Neill family.

The great majority of the first American teachers were Irish, because the penal laws forbade them teaching in Ireland. Approximately the names of 1,000 of them have been taken from authentic American records. Between 1775 and 1784 few of these teachers were at their desks. They were fighting for American freedom.

John Hancock's first teacher was Peter McLeuth, of Maynooth, Ireland. Daniel Webster's was William Evans, of Sligo, and John Dickinson, of Maryland, "The Penman of the Revolution," owes his forceful style to his Irish teacher, William Killen, who came to America in 1737 as a redemptioner.

Another Irish teacher, John Sullivan, of Limerick, was the father of two governors, one judge, an attorney general, a major general, and four officers in Washington' army.

Charles Thompson, who made the first copy of the Declaration, and John Dunlap, who first printed it, were born in Ireland. Gen. John Nixon, who first publicly read the Declaration, was a son of an Irishman.

Gen. Andrew Lewis was the son of John Lewis, of County Donegal, who killed his landlord in resisting an illegal attempt to eject him from his home, and with three sons he came to Virginia in 1732, being the first white settler in Bellefont, Va.

At a meeting of American citizens held in the City Hall, Washington, D. C., on June 20, 1826, for the purpose of transmitting a consolatory address to the people of Ireland, George Washington Parke Custis, Esq., of Arlington, Washington's adopted son, was invited to the chair, and John Boyle, of Washington, appointed secretary to the meeting, according to the United States Catholic Miscellany, Charlestown, Saturday, August 12, 1826. As soon as the meeting was organized, the following letter from the Rev. J. W. Fairlough, of Alexandria, was presented by Mr. Charles Murray, and read from the chair. The sentiments contained in the letter were favorably received by the audience:

To the chairman of the meeting of the friends of civil and religious liberty, in the City Hall, Washington.

SIR: Sorry I am that my manifold occupations prevent me from attending your meeting this evening. I hope the address to the people of Ireland, emanating from the metropolis of the free United States of America, will be consoling to, will be sympathizing with, our suffering brethren in persecuted Erin; will speak in streng, intelligible, and dignified terms, becoming the free citizens of a free country, the fellow kindred feelings which glow in the heart of every exile, of every free-born American. You can not express your feelings too strongly. Ireland demands your sympathy. Sympathize, then, with her as children who love their parents. Let it be known in Erin that Irishmen in America have not forgotten the land of their nativity; that the descendants of Irish emigrants have Irish blood still flowing in their veins; that they are still blessed with Irish feelings. Let Ireland know, from one extremity to the other, that the free citizens of America would be delighted to see the bonds of her slavery broken asunder, and rejoice to see her (in the language of her Curran) disenthralled from the domination of despotism by an act of unqualified, unconditional emancipation. I am, sir, an Englishman by birth, and I boast of having, both in England and America (as far as my poor abilities and opportunities afforded), been the steady advocate of persecuted Ireland. Let our sentiments, our feelings, be known throughout the whole British Empire. Let England feel ashamed of her conduct when she sees the whole world arrayed against her, deprecating her unnatural conduct toward her sister Ireland. I hope your meeting will be numerous and respectable. Present, Mr. Chairman, my most cordial concurrence with the wishes and object of the meeting.

J. W. FAIRLOUGH.

I can not conclude my remarks with any utterance more American than the speech of George Washington Parke Custis, chairman of the meeting:

I COME HERE AS AN AMERICAN.

In the address, which it is your pleasure that I should make from the chair, should I fail in producing that impression which I could hope to produce, and you might perhaps expect, let a failure be attributed to a state of broken health and spirits rather than to any want of zeal for the cause of civil and religious liberty, or want of sympathy for the cause of Ireland.

It is supposed that he, who has now the honor of addressing you, is connected by remote ancestral lineage with the family of Dillon. It may be so, or it may not be so, it is no matter; still, if there be a single drop in the current of my existence which flows from an Irish source it will ever be warm in my heart, while that heart itself is warm.

I came here as an American, I feel as an American, I shall speak as an American; it is not Irishmen alone that have congregated to this interesting bidding, not Catholics alone, for there are many here who worship at other than the Apostolic shrine. 'Tis a millennium of feeling where various tribes of men have assembled in love of one another to express their hatred of oppression and their sympathy for the oppressed.

Thanks to the good feeling which is abroad—and far may it spread—we have a most numerous and respectable assembly; but why are we content with this most spacious hall, why have we not to seek a wider arena? Because, forsooth, there are those who doubt the propriety of interference in the concerns of other people, potentates, or powers. I ask these skeptics, "Quid timetis," do you fear the old lion's growl? From our eagle's eyry, I "laugh to scorn" his rage. But, perhaps, there are Protestants who have scruples of conscience, and decline to interfere, even in opinion, with papal matters. If these are Americans, let me say: When you felt the full force of the lion's merciless fangs, who first gave you the aid, not of words, but deeds? There was a time when Americans were not sticklers in doctrinal matters; it was when to our wasted, war-worn ranks we were glad to receive the religionists of any creed, and found, to our comfort and to our independence, too, that a Catholic arm could drive a bayonet on the foe, and a Catholic heart beat high for the liberties of our country.

When our friendless standard was first unfurled for resistence, who were the strangers that first mustered round its staff, and when it reeled in the fight, who more bravely sustained it than Erin's generous sons? Who led the assault of Quebec and shed that early luster on our arms in the dawn of the Revolution? He who will live in everlasting memory and who rests in heaven—Montgomery. Who led the right wing of liberty's forlorn hope at the passage of the Delaware? An Irishman. Who felt the privations of the camp, the fate of battle, or the horrors of the prison ship more keenly than Irishmen? Look on this picture, Americans, which, though feebly, is faithfully drawn; then talk of interference, and I blush for my country.

Or will you seek further their merits to disclose? I cap the climax of their worth when I say Washington loved them, for they were the companions of his toils, his perils, his glories, in the deliverance of his country.

Nor was the feeling for our cause confined to this hemisphere. In Erin, and in the darkest days of our destiny, whenever it was told that we bore ourselves bravely in the field, though pressed by misfortune, and that liberty's pennon still flew, though shattered by the gale, a thousand—aye, a hundred thousand—times did the poor Irishman take off his hat and cry from his heart, "God save great Washington and the cause of America." And this, Americans, in the very Hon's jaws.

And with such revelations as these, can you, will you, dare you, Americans, talk of interference and withhold your voice from a general acclaim, which should thunder in this land till its echoes reach the Emerald Isle, in a prayer for her deliverance? If there is an American who does not feel for the wrongs of that country, which so nobly contributed to the establishment of our rights, I pronounce him recreant to the feelings of virtue, honor, and gratitude. And my country's self, if she decline to give only her poor opinions of the miseries of those who gave their toil and blood that she might be great, free, and happy when misfortunes next assail her, may she not find the friend she once found in Ireland.

This token will convey our greetings to Erin's distant sons, and when it arrives there they will exclaim, "There is yet a people who remember poor Ireland, and who, rejoicing in their own rights, can feel for the wrongs of others!" Let our scroll be inscribed, "From the land of liberty to the land of Montgomery."

IRELAND MUST NOT LOSE HOPE.

But let not Ireland despair. There is a tide in the affairs of nations, like that of men, which, taken at the flood, leads on to glory. The spring source arises in our happy empire, but see, its mighty current already flows to the peaks of the Andes, and, like the blessed Nile, fertilizes and renders plenteous all the regions within its reach. 'Tis the sacred, though restless, stream of liberty. It flows to the land of Leonidas, bearing on its bosom the corpses of her inhuman oppressors.

Behold the genius of Greece, as she towers above the shattered walls of immortal Missologhi; in the one hand she grasps the standard of the cross, the symbol of salvation to man, with the other she wields the avenging sword of her deliverance, bloodstained to the hilt, and cries to her oppressors:

"Now welcome fate,
And, if I perish, I will perish great;
Yet in a mighty deed, I will expire,
Let future ages hear it and admire."

Illustrious Greece, worthy of thine ancient renown, go on in thy proud career, till not a turbaned tyrant remains to pollute thy classic soil. Then, why should Ireland despair? The tree of liberty grows nowhere in a day. Though the soil be genial, its roots must long be moistened with the blood of heroes and of patriots ere its rise to grandeur, and shade and shelter the land.

Has Ireland no qualities to fit her for a better fate? Go to the senate and the bar; go where you will, you'll know her genius by the luster that it sheds around it—or will you rather to the fields of fame? When did Albion entwine a victor's laurel that Erin did not contribute full many a leaf from the plains of Abraham to the plains of Waterloo, from Wolfe to Wellington? And now that England will erect a trophy for the greatest of her triumphs, let it not be of unmeaning iron, let her search well that memorable field, and she will find enough of Irishmen's bones to raise a cenotaph as high as Pompey's pillar.

Permit me to conclude with the Invocation to Ireland, as uttered by the child of Mount Vernon on the day of independence, and under the venerable pretorium of the Revolution:

"Health and success to the Emerald Isle! My country's friend in my country's utmost need. May she soon be relieved from the Lion's grasp, for the Lion is of a kind that fondles ere it kills, whose blandishments lure but to destroy, while the Eagle suffers the smallest bird to wing his wonted way and to warble his hymns of praise in the pure melody of nature, the song of the soul. And when Ireland shall strike her harp to the wild notes of Erin and liberty the ocean breeze will bear to her shores the prayers of Americans, to cheer her in her glorious struggle and hail her regenerate in the rights of mankind.

"Ireland, thou friend of my country, in my country's most friendless days, much injured, much enduring land, accept this poor tribute from one who esteems thy worth and mourns thy desolation. May the God of heaven, in His justice and mercy, grant thee more prosperous fortunes, and in His own good time cause the sun of freedom to shed its benign radiance on the Emerald Isle!

"'Erin and liberty, Erin go bragh.'"

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. This resolution is reported as a substitute with change of title. The number is still "House joint resolution 357." Now, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] did report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs House concurrent resolution 68, which is the same thing. I think it would look a little better to pass the House concurrent resolution under title of "House concurrent resolution" than to pass it under the title of "House joint resolution."

Mr. FLOOD. The way I happened to introduce it——

Mr. MANN. I do not think anybody would object if the gentleman would do that.

Mr. FLOOD. It was just this——

Mr. MANN. I understand how it occurred.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER] had been working on this resolution for some years and had done a great deal of work on it, and it was the desire of this committee to report his resolution, a concurrent resolution, not a joint resolution, and so we agreed on the concurrent resolution as a substitute for a joint resolution. And then we had some question as to what the parliamentary status would be when it got in the House, and while that matter was being considered by the parliamentary clerk, I introduced this other resolution as a joint resolution. But after consultation it was decided that it was in perfect parliamentary form to report a concurrent resolution as a substitute for the joint resolution. Therefore we reported it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman wants it passed under the title of "House joint resolution 357," although it is a concurrent resolution?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; but we amend the title.

Mr. MANN. But you do not amend the number, and you can not.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH. To my mind the Irish question, like that of the world war, is a question of humanity, and the only way to settle it is justice.

When we review our own history and our own struggle for independence, when we consider the principles of liberty that brought forth this Republic and made it great and glorious, and when we proudly remember our time-honored, unchanging attitude as the friend and advocate of liberty-seeking peoples, how can this House think of disregarding an appeal of this kind?

When we study the history of the Emerald Isle and her seven-century struggle for freedom, when we reflect that we went into the war to defend liberty and civilization, to help to establish governments based on democracy and justice, and that we have emerged a potential factor in the readjustment of the world's problems, who in this House fails to hear the voices of consistency and justice urging us to support this resolution.

Now, what is it the Irish people ask Congress to do? Merely to express the hope that when the peace conference is passing upon the claims of the various peoples it will favorably consider the right of Ireland to self-government. Simply that and nothing more.

In considering this resolution let us not forget that 143 years ago our forefathers formed a little group of Colonies and declared them free and independent States and proclaimed these self-evident truths:

That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its power in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

When the fathers of the Republic proclaimed these truths they spoke not only for themselves and for their time but for all men and for all time.

And let us likewise remember that the Continental Congress forwarded an address to the people of Ireland setting forth its motives and objects and asking their sympathy and good will for the American cause, and that the Irish promptly responded and fought shoulder to shoulder with the Revolutionary patriots and poured out their blood as a free offering to American independence. This the Irish have always done whenever and wherever human freedom has been the issue.

And now it comes to pass that nearly a century and a half later, the spirit of 1919 being identical with the spirit of 1776, the Irish people appeal to the American Congress to do that for Ireland which Ireland gladly and willingly did for America when she, too, was struggling to free herself from the yoke of alien rule.

The people of Ireland and millions of men and women of Irish blood all over the world, ever faithful and devoted to the principles and patriotic aspiration of their race, join in the prayer that America will save the Emerald Isle from being excluded from consideration in a league founded on nationhood, at a time when liberty is to be accorded to nations great and small.

In the name of justice, consistency, and humanity how can we Americans disregard so reasonable, so meritorious an appeal? To ignore it at this time would be utterly repugnant to our traditions, to our ideals. And more than that, it would be a stain on our national honor.

Should any country be so unjust and unfair as to deny Ireland's claim to freedom at this time; should any country be willing to thus brand itself as a fraud and a hypocrite, let it not be said that the United States was a party to the perfidy by declining to do for Ireland that which the American heart, American instincts and justice admonished her to do.

Among us, I know, are those who question the prudence and propriety of bringing up this matter to the peace table just now. To my timid brethren let me say that it is among her proudest distinctions that America has always stood out conspicuously in the family of nations as the friend and sympathizer of the downtrodden; that her concern and compassion over and over again have found expression in deeds as well as in words, and that no consideration has deterred her in taking action when the rights and happiness of several million people are involved, like the case of Ireland.

Washington said to the French minister: "Having devoted the best years of my life to the maintenance of liberty, I rejoice whenever in any country I see a nation unfold the banner of freedom."

And from Washington down to Wilson these glorious sentiments have pervaded this land to the advantage of oppressed peoples.

Nearly a century ago our hearts went out to the South American republics when they were trying, like Ireland, to throw off an alien yoke. Nor was our sympathy limited to the New World. When the holy alliance included Prussia, Russia, Austria, and England, who united to protect all European governments no matter how tyrannical they were to the people they were ruling, and the Greeks rose against the Turks to free from Ottoman rule their land of countless beauties and associations, America did not hesitate to manifest her sympathy for the Greeks. So, too, when the French people rose against the Bourbons, the Poles against the Russians, and the Hungarians against the Austrians, the United States, as always, stood with the oppressed.

And, furthermore, let me remind you that neither our friendly relations with Austria nor her might as a powerful nation checked our country from extending our earnest sympathy and well wishes to the great Hungarian leader Kossuth, and heartily welcoming him when he visited the United States and addressed this House.

May I not remind you that when the Austrian envoy protested against the interest we were showing the Hungarian patriots he intimated that if it continued retaliatory measures, commercial or otherwise, might ensue, and that thereupon Daniel Webster, then Secretary of State, sent his immortal reply, which will always remain as a sound declaration of American policy. It seems particularly fitting to refer to it just now.

Webster said, in substance, that America was the friend and sympathizer of every people fighting for freedom. That this Nation was founded on the rights of men, the equality of all men before the law, the denial of kingly authority, and government of the people and by the people. He said further:

That any people of any power who were trying by every effort and at every sacrifice to enlarge their liberties would always command the earnest and enthusiastic sympathy of the United States.

And, again, neither fear of her mailed hand nor our friendly relations with England restrained us in 1878 from enthusiastically greeting the distinguished Irish leader Charles Stewart Parnell and inviting him to address our Congress on his plans for restoring self-government to Ireland. If I mistake not, the House expressed the hope that Parnell would succeed and home rule be granted to the Irish people.

Many other similar instances could be submitted, but time will not permit me to multiply them.

It was my pleasure to support this resolution in the Committee on Foreign Affairs as it is my gratification to uphold it here.

I support it not because I am of Irish parentage, proud as I am of that, but because I am an American and believe that this is a time when one should not only think and speak like an American, but act like an American.

It is unthinkable that at a time like the present, when liberty seems to be everywhere and freedom is to be accorded nations great and small, that any red-blooded American can find it in his heart to ignore Ireland's plea not to be made the solitary exception in the whole world to the beneficent influence of peace.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Texas consume some of his time?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I have no desire uselessly to consume the time of this House, but I opposed this resolution in the committee, and I feel that I should at least give to the House some of the views of the minority on the committee while this resolution is being considered.

For the Irish and their cause I have the most sincere sympathy. But, gentlemen, I take it that the internal affairs of the British Empire are of no official concern to the people of the United States, especially at this time when at Paris the peace conference is assembled and around the table are gathered our allies, one of which is Great Britain.

The resolution reads:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the earnest hope of the Congress of the United States of America that the peace conference, now sitting in Paris, in passing upon the rights of various peoples, will favorably consider the claims of Ireland to the right of self-determination.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the peace conference at Paris will not entertain any such proposition as is contained in this resolution; and, in the second place, it has no jurisdiction whatever over it, because Ireland is a component part of the United Kingdom, and that Empire is represented around the peace table by Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Balfour, just as our delegates represent all parts of the United States. The peace conference would have neither power nor jurisdiction to take up the claims of Ireland for self-determination, since the relations of Ireland to Great Britain are not involved in the settlement of peace among the nations at war.

Gentlemen of the Congress, my forbears came from Ireland, but I am not an Irish-American; I am an American [applause]; and I place my country's interests and my country's welfare before the welfare of any other country on the face of this globe, and I am not willing to imperil the success of the peace negotiations at Paris in bringing to a conclusion the most stupendous struggle that ever staggered the world and in which we poured out on the fields of Flanders and France our best blood and billions of dollars of our money, for the sake of gratifying the promptings of a sentiment; no, not even for Ireland.

Gentlemen of the House, all of you do know that whatever action this House may in its wisdom decide to take, it will avail nothing. Nobody on this floor believes that in response to this resolution the peace conference will halt its labors one moment.

Nobody believes or entertains a glimmer of hope that the body sitting in the other end of this Capitol will pass this resolution. So why make ourselves ridiculous in the eyes of the world simply to gratify a sentiment that all of us do entertain—that the Irish may in their own way and through their own efforts within the law attain independence and self-government?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is there anything more in this resolution than the expression of a desire for the right of petition?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Oh, I take it that there is.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In reading the proceedings of the peace conference it appears that certain of the small countries have asked for certain things. I have read this resolution very carefully, and have reached the conclusion that there is nothing in it except an expression of the right of petition. I want the gentleman's interpretation of that.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the gentlemen on that side of the Chamber seem to have come to the conclusion, rather tardily, after filibustering here a good portion of the night—they have, for some cause, suddenly become converted to the Irish cause.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will permit, I for one stated that I was in favor of this resolution.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. To be sure. I do recall that the gentleman from Pennsylvania did make such a statement.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So that I was not one of those who attempted to filibuster against it.

Mr. DYER. Nobody has filibustered.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I question whether the gentleman from Texas is accurate in his statement that anybody has filibustered. I have read the resolution. I repeat, it seems to me to be merely the expression of a desire for consideration on behalf of a small nation asking for justice. That is the way it impresses me.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will say in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the small countries that are having the question of self-determination applied to them are countries which prior to this war were under the dominion of our enemies. Austria-Hungary fell to pieces, and the German Empire is being broken up, and it is with those peoples that the peace conference is dealing.

So far as I have been advised, the peace conference is not considering, nor will it be called upon to consider, the political separation from Great Britain, Italy, France, the United States, or any other of the allies of any colony, dominion, or dependency of the respective nations.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Is it not a fact that they have agreed to take part of Poland away from Russia?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I do not understand they have agreed to anything yet; and as far as Russia is concerned it may be observed that she long ago ceased to be an active participant with the allies in the prosecution of the war and, for all practical purposes, became an ally of the central powers.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. If you gentlemen will come at me singly, I will answer first one and then another, if I can.

Mr. KEATING. I am sure the gentleman can answer this.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will if I can.

Mr. KEATING. Does the gentleman mean by the statement he has just made that when we sent our boys to help to fight for self-determination we meant self-determination only for those nations that were under German rule, and not for all the small nations of the earth?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman from Colorado did not vote for war in order to enable small nations to have self-determination, and I did not vote for it for that purpose, and the resolution for a declaration of war would never have passed this House but for the fact that Germany had violated American rights and had sunk American ships and had taken American lives upon the high seas. [Applause.]

Of course, it was gratifying to me, as it doubtless was to others, that in fighting primarily for American rights we could also fight the battles of the world and civilization and that having triumphed we can impose conditions of peace that will liberate peoples long oppressed and misruled by our enemies and their allies.

Mr. PHELAN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. PHELAN. Does the gentleman mean to assert that America ought to uphold the just cause of a liberty-seeking people against our enemies and not uphold the just cause of a liberty-seeking people simply because they have been under the rule of one of our cobelligerents in this war?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will answer the gentleman's question by asking him one. If I am to take the sentiment implied by his question as being true, the gentleman from Massachusetts would be willing to-morrow to vote for a resolution to declare war against Great Britain in order to establish the independence of Ireland?

Mr. PHELAN. The gentleman has no such proposition here.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. You have this one here, and that is the one I am talking about.

Mr. PHELAN. But I do say that the American people ought to have the courage to express the hope that a people seeking liberty in any part of the world may get that liberty. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman's zeal is very admirable, and I applaud him for it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman tell me whether, in his opinion, there will be anything left of the peace conference or the peace table if this resolution passes?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I do not know that I caught the exact meaning of the gentleman's question.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will it break up the peace conference for us to pass this resolution?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I do not think it would make a big dent in the peace conference whether we passed it or not.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman will admit that if the United States had not intervened in the war it is likely that the allies would have lost.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I am not going afield into a lot of speculation; I am talking about this resolution.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman admits that unless the United States does exert its influence there is not much opportunity for the peace-loving people of Ireland to get independence.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I do not admit that. If the reverse was true, I would take it that when the resolution passed and was signed by the Speaker the Irish would immediately realize their ambition.

Mr. HAMILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. HAMILL. When the gentleman says that this resolution would have a negligible effect on the peace conference at Paris, does he want us to believe that the peace conference holds this House of Representatives in such contempt as to pay no attention to anything it approved?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I do not think the peace conference would regard this body as ridiculous except as it makes itself so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman recalls that the House took action on behalf of the Jews, looking to the abrogation of the treaty with Russia?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. We had a treaty with Russia.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman recall the fact that we asked relief for the Roumanian Jews as affected by the Berlin treaty?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I do not remember the details. I was not a Member of the House at that time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is there anything in this except the statement by the House of Representatives——

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. This is a concurrent resolution, and if it is sincerely presented you hope for action by the Senate.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, a request by Congress that the peace conference give careful consideration to the claims of the Irish——

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. If the gentleman's contention is true it means nothing.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It could not embarrass the peace conference. They can approve of the suggestion of the House of Representatives or disapprove of it.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Of course, it can. The gentleman's suggestion but emphasizes my view that it is not properly our concern.

Mr. HAMILL. Will the gentleman yield for one further question?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I again yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. HAMILL. Does the gentleman think that the House of Representatives would render itself ridiculous by asking the peace conference to consider favorably the right of a distinct nation to come under the rule that they be given the right of self-determination?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. In reply to the gentleman from New Jersey, I will say that I have never had any information that there is any Irish question pending before the peace conference, and so I think it would be ridiculous to ask them to take up something that was not before them and which does not directly affect our national interests.

Mr. HAMILL. One more question.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I can not yield any more, because my time is limited.

Mr. HAMILL. Is it not a fact that there are even submerged nationalities in Russia which will very likely be taken up by the peace conference, although there has been no declaration in regard to it?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I do not know of any, and my declarations already made regarding Russia still apply.

Mr. HAMILL. Will the gentleman answer yes or no?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I have yielded to the gentleman several times, but I decline to be cross-examined or badgered in police-court style. I will yield to courteous questions.

Mr. HAMILL. My question is—the gentleman states that the peace conference would not consider any claims that were not published in the program. I say that is not so; that they will very likely take up questions of nations that have been submerged——

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Have they taken up Ireland yet?

Mr. HAMILL. I do not know. I think there would be no more impropriety in Congress passing this resolution than the declaration of the President in the Senate before we entered the war for a free and united people.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I am not passing on the President's position or what he has said. I am speaking on my own authority and nobody else's. I am responsible to no one but my constituents and my country. I want to say that if the English Parliament to-morrow should pass a resolution suggesting that it would be very much pleased if the United States should relinquish the Philippine Islands or give them independence I, as an American citizen, would bitterly resent any such action on the part of the British Parliament. [Applause.]

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. And on the other hand, if the British Parliament or any other parliament should suggest to the United States that it would view with a great deal of pleasure our setting up an independent Government in Porto Rico, I would resent it from the bottom of my feet to the crown of my head, and so would every other man on the floor of this House. Yet we feel called upon by solemn act of this Congress to suggest to Great Britain that we think we might be able to run her affairs a little better than she is running them herself.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DECKER. What sentiment does the gentleman entertain relative to a man, an Englishman, who once said, "If I were an American, as I am an Englishman, I would never lay down my arms"?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I think the sentiments expressed by the great Pitt during our war for independence, quoted by the gentleman from Missouri, would have made him a much better American than Britisher.

Mr. DECKER. But would it not make him a better man?

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a minute?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Is the gentleman opposed to the resolution?

Mr. MASON. I am for it.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will give the gentleman a minute if I have the time.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to agree with the gentleman from Texas, that under ordinary circumstances it might be deemed a piece of impertinence for us to pass a resolution regarding what would be considered a domestic question from Great Britain, just exactly as we would consider it a piece of impertinence for them to pass a resolution in their Parliament regarding the Philippines; but I ask the gentleman whether under the circumstances when, with the cooperation, if not the initiative, of great Britain we are considering a league of nations, in which we are asked to guarantee territorial integrity of the nations to become a party to the league, that does not open the door and give us the right to express our opinions as to what shall be the territorial boundaries we are supposed to guarantee?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. In the first place, the initiation of questions that affect the foreign relations are no business of the House of Representatives. The negotiation of our foreign affairs, by the Constitution, is placed within the hands of the Executive, except when required to be ratified by the Senate. In reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD] I would say that instead of agreeing to his contention, it seems to me that now would be a most unpropitious time to select for such action. We have now in Paris commissioners seated around the peace table. Around that table are gathered our allies, with whom we fought side by side, and whose blood was mingled with ours, whose treasure was poured out with ours. Yet we say to our commissioners, "We need the cooperation of these allies in order to bring about a satisfactory treaty of peace, we need their assistance in order to maintain and carry out any league of nations, or any other international agreement which we may enter, but the first thing you do when you get there, you must insult our most powerful, our most influential, and our greatest ally by suggesting to her that she permit us to suggest how she shall run her internal affairs."

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MASON. I desire to call the gentleman's attention in the one minute I have to the difference between the situation that seems to be in his mind and the situation as it is in mine. Six months ago our allies were in trouble. Six months ago the President of the United States, when we were at war and when the world was suffering, made a splendid suggestion as terms of peace. Among those terms was one that the little peoples of the world should not be moved from one nationality to another, governed by force, and without their consent. Great Britain and all of her allies and our enemies finally accepted these terms. Great Britain never raised the question. She can not now do it. She consented to those terms when she was in trouble, when she was broken in health, broken in money, broken from every military standpoint. When we made the suggestions through our great President that these were the terms of peace it was to me as sacred as if the men had got around the table and signed them. As the gentleman says, it was sealed with the blood of our boys. Great Britain agreed to that doctrine of self-determination, and she certainly can not complain of it now, after the sacrifice we have made in men and money. We ask her to keep the treaty she made when we asked them to agree to self-determination for the little peoples of the world.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois is always interesting and he is always brilliant. I remember sometime ago listening to him here with rapt attention as he repudiated the doctrine that the United States should enter or fight in any war to settle real estate titles in Europe or anywhere else. [Applause and laughter.] Oh, it seems——

Mr. MASON. We did enter into the war and we agreed to settle real estate titles when the war was settled. Let us keep our agreement.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the doctrine of self-determination of small countries would apply with equal force to Porto Rico, and I know the gentleman too well to believe that he would view with complacency a resolution by the British Parliament suggesting to Uncle Sam what our course should be with regard to that dependency of this Republic. And I know his sentiments too well to believe that he would look with satisfaction upon a resolution by the British Parliament as to our course with reference to Mexico in North America or the Republics of South America.

Mr. Speaker, I am neither insensible nor indifferent to the aspirations of any people for independence and self-government—from whatever quarter it may come my heart is always deeply sympathetic to any call of a people or nation for liberty and political autonomy, and I fervently hope that the Irish problem may soon be settled in such a manner as to insure the contentment and happiness of that unhappy and distressed island.

But, Mr. Speaker, the issues at stake at Paris are so vital and of so much consequence to the United States, we have so much involved that depends upon the complete harmony of action by our representatives and those of our allies, that I am unwilling to do anything, however slight, that may improperly and needlessly offend an ally or alienate from our President the cordial cooperation and support of an ally.

Mr. Speaker, thousands of our brave soldiers died on foreign battle fields, many others will return maimed and crippled, millions more were under arms ready and willing to fight and die, if need be, and our citizens at home poured out their money freely and lavishly at the country's call—all of these sacrifices have been made in order that a just, a durable, an honorable and righteous peace may be secured to the United States and her citizens, now and hereafter. To that noble ambition America dedicated her resources and her very life. I am unwilling to jeopardize the realization of that accomplishment. I am unwilling, even for a moment, to participate in action that may embarrass or hamper the President of the United States, our great leader at the peace conference, as he struggles with the seasoned diplomats of the Old World, in his labors to bring peace to a distracted and distressed world, weary and worn with war and its hideous horrors.

Mr. Speaker, I am for America first. I can not vote for a resolution that I believe to be inimical to the interests, safety, and peace of my country.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for one minute to permit me to ask him a question.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I object. It is 20 minutes to a side and I can not get any time at all.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STEDMAN]. [Applause.]

Mr. STEDMAN. Mr. Speaker, for many years I have been interested in the future of the people of Ireland.

I have been attracted to them by their love of liberty, by their attachment to their homes, by their appeals for justice to this Republic, whose friend they have ever been and whose theory of government, whose traditions, and whose declarations forbid the exercise of sovereignty over a weaker nation against their will by armed force.

Gibbon, in reviewing the incidents of ancient times, their effect upon the fortunes of mankind for good or evil and the mighty convulsions which once shook the universe, lamented that the world would never again witness events so fraught with importance to the destiny of the human race.

The tragedy, which during the last few years has had practically the entire world for its theater—events the culmination of which in their importance have had no parallel—show how manifest was his error and mistaken his belief.

There is no era in the world's history which will compare with the present either in interest or importance. It has been signalized by events which will be characterized by future ages as among the most splendid achievements of mankind.

Chief amongst these will be the blessings of liberty vouchsafed to weaker nations long oppressed, filling their homes with a new, a happy, and joyous life.

Among these nations, none—no, not one—will appeal more strongly to the hearts of all mankind than Ireland.

The resolution now being considered expresses the earnest hope of the Congress of the United States of America, that the peace conference at Versailles in adjusting the rights of various peoples will favorably consider the claims of Ireland to self-determination.

I esteem it a high privilege to vote for the resolution, and it is to me a very great pleasure to do so. In the brief space of time to which I must restrict myself it would be impossible for me to give fully the reasons for my cordial support.

Where can be found in this broad Republic an American citizen who will dispute the doctrine that government shall exist only by consent of the governed?

Will some one furnish an argument which has for its basis the inalienable rights of man why Ireland alone should be excepted from this rule?

If gratitude be deemed a virtue among nations as well as individuals, what think you would be the estimate of the civilized world of a Republic which forgets that the blessings of freedom enjoyed by its citizens were won by the aid of a people whose appeal to them for right and justice should prove to be all in vain?

Have we so soon forgotten the unfailing friendship of Ireland for America?

The first decisive victory of the Revolutionary War for the American cause was won at Moore's Creek Bridge, not far from Wilmington, N. C., in February, 1776, when a band of Tories surrendered to Gen. James Moore, a descendant of Roger O'Moore, a leader of the Irish rebellion of 1641. Some of his descendants still live in Wilmington, N. C. Col. Roger Moore, one of them, died there only a few years ago.

The first general officer killed on the American side was Gen. Richard Montgomery, who gloriously fell in front of his men at Quebec, December 31, 1775.

Gen. Montgomery was born in Ireland and settled in the State of New York in 1775.

The first commodore of the American Navy was an Irishman—John Barry, born in County Wexford in 1745.

That the Irish people assisted largely in the formation of this Republic is known to all men conversant with the history of its struggle for independence.

Read, if you will, the names of those who signed the Declaration of Independence. Amongst them will be found John Hancock (President of the Congress), Matthew Thornton, John Hart, James Smith, George Taylor, George Reed, Thomas McKean, Charles Carroll, Edward Rutledge, Thomas Lynch, Robert Treat Paine, names which will never be forgotten; nor should we forget that each one and every one of them was born in Ireland or was of Irish descent.

It is difficult to find a reason or a pretext why we should hesitate to adopt this resolution. It has been suggested that England fought by our side in the war with Germany. Admit that England is the sincere friend of this Republic; the more earnest should be our desire that she should adopt the true and just course toward Ireland, for thereby she will add to the happiness and prosperity of her own people, and embellish with a new and unfading luster the glory of the British Empire.

The unselfish, unchanging, and heroic conduct of the Irish race in behalf of America can never be obliterated from its traditions or history. Their appeal for the right of self-determination should find a cordial welcome in the hearts of American Representatives, and both prompt and decisive action by them without delay.

The adoption of this resolution is demanded by a principle of government recognized wherever freedom dwells and liberty has a home.

It will gratify the people of every land who admire chivalric courage and enduring fortitude.

It is not always the power of the conqueror which exercises a controlling influence upon the destinies of mankind. It is often the heroism of the vanquished which impresses upon the minds of men lessons which never fade.

The glories of the British Empire may be forgotten, but the patriotic heroism of the Irish race through a struggle for liberty of over 700 years will gild the pages of history through all the ages to come and attract the admiration of the brave in every civilized land. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN].

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I, too, speak at this moment as an American Congressman, and I would be ashamed of the blood that is in me if I kept silent when an opportunity is afforded to speak a few words for liberty and justice for the land where my father and my mother first saw the light of day.

Mr. Speaker, if there be any man in this House who maintains that this question is not one of international concern, that man does not know the story of Ireland's seven centuries of suffering. The Irish people and their sons and daughters in America and in other lands are filled with hostility to Great Britain wherever they are found because of the cruel treatment their suffering kinsmen have ever received. This hostility has disturbed, and will continue to disturb, the tranquillity of nations wherever the Irish have settled and their influence is felt. Unless Ireland is given self-determination as a result of this war, it will be the only nation in Europe after the war held in a condition of subjection and England will be the only tyrant.

Ireland's case an internal one? Ireland's case unlike that of Poland or Serbia? Ireland not a nation? Let me remind my friend that Ireland has never ceased to be a nation. Let me remind this House that away back in the ages even, in the days of the decline and fall of the Roman Empire, when all in Greece but her sun had set, when education had become a patent of nobility, and learning the almost invaluable possession of the sifted few, the lamp of learning still burned as brightly in Ireland as ever burned the sanctuary lamp for centuries before the shrine of St. Bridget in Kildare. The arts and sciences fled to her for refuge and found warm welcome and cordial entertainment; poetry found in her a home; the arts of war were not neglected; religion marked the activities of her people; and, withal, in the tenth century, the Irishman is acknowledged to have been the most complete, the best rounded product of nature to be found among the children of men.

To us to-day the Irishman is known as an immigrant; he is popularly supposed to be restless, to be dissatisfied with his present situation; to be content to fight for the liberties of any land but his own. Nothing can be further from the truth. Read the history of Ireland anew and be convinced. Come with me and tell over again the story of Brian Boru, of Clontarf, and the Boyne Water, and then ask yourselves if Irishmen have no love for the soil, no yearning for an abiding city. But this little island could no more contain the enthusiasm for liberty among her people than Macedon confined the ambition of Alexander the Great. Her mission was truly apostolic, and the histories of France and Spain and Chile and Peru are made richer far by the names and deeds of MacMahon, Prendergast, O'Higgins, O'Donnell, and Gen. Lynch.

Irishmen do love their native soil; they left it because her free air had become vitiated by oppression; but as Napoleon, no matter where he might be, whether in the craggy Alps, facing the pyramids in Egypt, with their 40 centuries looking down upon him, bravely enduring the snows of Russia, or sadly peering out from the pitiless rock St. Helena over the more pitiless Atlantic, always kept one eye on the city of Paris, so the Irish immigrant, whether enjoying the rich civilization of America, to which he has made such important contribution, or threading the pathless forests of remote Australia, or endeavoring to wrest from Nature the secret of the North Pole and an open sea, always keeps an eye on his motherland and prays for her deliverance and her restoration to the sisterhood of nations.

You, sir, have read, and read carefully, the history of Ireland and her sons. You have melted into tears at the story of Patrick Sarsfield, and you have had your pride roused, aye, even to the bursting point, where, as you saw him lying, bleeding and dying, at the battle of Lannes in France he took a handful of his heart's blood, threw it toward heaven, and cried, "Would that I had another life to lose for poor Ireland!" This, then, is the spirit of the Irish immigrant; love and loyalty for the land of his adoption; love, loyalty, consecration for the land of his birth, the land where his fathers died.

Mr. Speaker, during the decades of England's misrule Ireland has mourned the departure of millions of her children as she bade them go forth to enrich other nations, leaving herself poor, indeed. Her misery broke the heart of Charles Stewart Parnell, and then she broke her own over his grave. But out of the heart and oppression, out of the heartbreak, the death, the contradictions, the trials, the tribulations, and the woes, there appears on the horizon the dawn of a new day for Ireland. I see the Ireland of my fathers join hands with my mother America in gratitude for all this Republic has done to create a better sentiment and, I hope, arouse the conscience of Englishmen. I see her bless the name of Washington so dear to-day to Americans, and place it by the side of those of Brian Boru, Sarsfield, Grattan, Wolf Tone, Emmet, O'Connell, and Parnell; and I hail the fulfillment of the prophecy of the great English Cardinal Newman: "I look toward a land both old and young—old in its Christianity, young in its promise of the future; a nation which received grace before the Saxon came to Britain and which has never questioned it; a church which comprehends in its history the rise and fall of Canterbury and York, which Augustine and Paulinus found and Pole and Fisher left behind them. I contemplate a people which has had a long night and will have an inevitable day! I am turning my eyes toward a hundred years to come, and I dimly see the Ireland I am gazing on become the road of passage and union between the two hemispheres and the center of the world. I see its inhabitants rival Belgium in populousness, France in vigor, and Spain in enthusiasm."

Mr. Speaker, with God's help and the continued and convincing efforts of this Republic, I hope for self-determination for this little isle.

Let us tax, torture, and torment invention to find a language rich enough for epitaph for Robert Emmet; burrow into the very bowels of the earth to find a gem of purest ray serene upon which to engrave the story of his life. For the prayer of the young martyr of the rebellion of 1798 is about to be answered and is to take her place among the nations of the earth.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. KENNEDY].

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. Mr. Speaker, on the 4th day of March, 1778, just 141 years ago to-day that archetypal son of liberty—Robert Emmet—was born; and while his eyes were first opening upon the light of Old Erin, the American troops from Maine to the Carolinas, fighting for American independence, were actually bristling with Irishmen. What a coincidence that on the anniversary of that Irish patriot the American Congress is considering a resolution in behalf of self-determination for Ireland—the very principle for which Emmet fought and died! [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, one of the brightest ornaments of his age and Nation was Henry Clay, the first and ablest Speaker of this House. No greater champion of the liberties of mankind ever lived upon this earth. In the course of a speech delivered by him in the Senate of the United States on February 2, 1832, is found this remarkable passage concerning Ireland:

> In some of the visions which have passed through my imagination I have supposed that Ireland was originally part and parcel of this (American) continent, and that by some extraordinary convulsion of nature it was torn from America and, drifting across the ocean, was placed in the unfortunate vicinity of Great Britain.

Thirty-two years after Henry Clay had made that statement John Bright, a well-known English statesman, while speaking in the British House of Commons against coercion in Ireland, said:

> I believe that if to-morrow the people of Ireland had their will they would, had they the power to do so, unmoor that island from its fastenings in the deep, and would moor it at least 2,000 miles to the west of its present position.

It is this unfortunate vicinity to Great Britain which has been the obstacle to Ireland's political and commercial advancement during all the course of her history. In the present state of world affairs I venture to say that if Ireland were to-day a subject nationality upon the Continent of Europe, there would be no need of the pending resolution in this House. Her name would long since have been found on the list of the smaller nationalities whose rights are to be settled upon the principle for which young America fought and won the great war.

Mr. Speaker, the resolution we are now considering embodies a fundamental principle, based, as it is, upon the doctrine that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. Upon this side of the Atlantic, at least, that doctrine has for a century and a half been an accepted article of political faith. It was hoped that the developments of the recent war would give it a wider and more universal application. Indeed, the doctrine must be universally applied if the civilization of the earth is to be preserved.

A well-known English writer, Gilbert K. Chesterton, recently said:

> Civilization will never have saved its soul alive until the hope of Kosciusko is realized and the epitaph of Emmet written.

The hope of Kosciusko was the freedom of his native Poland, and that hope is now being realized, for it is universally conceded that the erection of Poland into a free and independent State will be one of the developments of the peace conference.

But what of the epitaph of Emmet? Will Ireland, too, take her place among the nations of the earth as one of the consequences of the war? That is precisely the question which inspires the pending resolution. Ireland is the only one of the subject nationalities which participated in the war that has been left unmentioned in the catalogue of those already singled out for self-determination.

When America entered the great world war the President of the United States in a single sentence summed up the great principles for which we would participate in the struggle. In the early days of April, 1917, he addressed his memorable war message to the joint session of Congress, during the course of which he said:

> We are glad to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberties of its peoples—the German peoples included; for the rights of nations, great and small, and the privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience.

The utterance of this remarkable sentence brought new hope to the struggling races of the world, for they thought they saw in it the dawn of a new day—the day of their final deliverance. Among the most prominent of them was the Irish race, which for seven and a half centuries has been fighting to regain the liberties they anciently possessed. Their contribution to the success of the struggle is well known and admitted in every quarter of the world. [Applause.]

Now the war is over, the victory is won, and the representatives of the various nations are in conference on the soil of France, there to formulate the terms upon which the peace of the world is to be settled. While mention has repeatedly been made of the various smaller nationalities whose rights will be determined at the peace conference, thus far, at least, we have not heard that a single word has been uttered by any voice of authority concerning the rights of the Irish people. For this reason millions of advocates of Irish freedom are requesting Congress, the mouthpiece of the American people, to speak, now that freedom and liberty are everywhere in the air, and make known to the world, but particularly to the representatives at the peace table, the hopes and expectations of the American people respecting the case of Ireland.

Mr. Speaker, the resolution now before us will be the expression of America's voice. It is based upon a time-tested American doctrine; it is purely American in spirit; and the principle it seeks to apply is the one in defense of which, we are told, American blood was freely shed on the battle fronts of the Old World. Our young men fought not for any selfish consideration. They had none. "They fought," says the President of the United States, "for the privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience," and they believed that when the fight was done that privilege would be everywhere extended. But now in the day of our triumph there seems to be one exception to the privilege: Ireland's case will be side-stepped, notwithstanding the lofty declarations of purpose for which the war has been waged.

But, sir, whatever course others may see fit to take—whether they be Presidents or Parliaments—let this House at least stand upon its high ground of equity and justice and press the program it accepted in April, 1917, so that Ireland, too, may be treated in the liberative spirit of the hour.

For centuries Ireland has been fighting for the exercise of her fundamental right of self-government; and if exception is made of her case in the coming universal reckoning, does anyone believe that the peace of the world will be settled? Anyone who thinks that liberty can be crushed in Ireland has yet to learn the history of that race. Her sons have fought for liberty on a thousand battle fields and they will still fight on until foreign rule forever retires from the soil which covers the ashes of their fathers.

No one, of course, will have the hardihood to maintain that Congress is not acting within its rights in passing the pending resolution. Some, perhaps, may doubt the propriety of this procedure, holding that this resolution concerns the domestic affairs of another nation. If such a position be tenable, then the same line of reasoning must apply to the smaller nationalities on the Continent of Europe unless, forsooth, the rule of action be that a conquering nation may dictate to the enemy it has whipped but must be painfully silent concerning the unjustifiable practices of a cobelligerent. If such is to be the guiding rule of the peace conference, then Kaiserism has not alone taken the count. The avowed ideals in defense of which the war was successfully prosecuted will have suffered mightily in the hour of the final reckoning. The claim is made that the Irish question is a domestic problem; yet British statesmen themselves concede their inability to solve it. You may think as you like and justify your conclusion upon any premise you desire, but you can not deny that the people of Ireland are forced to live under a sovereignty under which they do not wish to live, a thing which the President, our leading figure at the peace conference, said—and we applauded him when he said it—no people should be forced to submit to. It was the President himself who made the issue, and the doctrine he proclaims takes Ireland's case out of the pale of England's domestic concerns and lifts it to a higher level for international consideration. If it is not considered at the peace conference, it will be because righteousness can not be enforced against the stubborn objections of a dominant power.

Self-government, Mr. Speaker, is the natural government of man. This may not be the belief of kings or kaisers or so-called statesmen who offer the claims of minority politics as the rightful solution of the Irish question. But self-government, nevertheless, has always been the post upon which patriots have planted themselves wherever men have been known to strive for political freedom. In this so-called period of universal emancipation Great Britain has her chance to concede to Ireland what she is anxious to bestow upon the smaller nationalities of Europe. Let her release her grasp upon Ireland, for the rightful aspirations of Irishmen to freedom can never be successfully stifled. If England fails to grasp this, her supreme opportunity, it will be the monstrous blunder of the peace conference, and, like the ghost of Banquo, it will come back again to plague her in the future.

Why should not Ireland be given the right of self-determination? Ireland was a nation when England was but a Roman colony; and, apart from the right of self-government, which for centuries it has not possessed, it is in all other respects substantially a nation to-day. Ireland still has her national traditions, her national culture, her national customs, her national literature, her national poetry, her national eloquence, her national spirit and patriotism; and what is of the highest importance, she has always had the national self-consciousness to preserve them. These are the essence of nationality, but Ireland has even still more; it has a unique position in the physical world—a geographical entity that needs no ethnological experts to circumscribe it. The ocean alone forms its boundary.

Though subdued for centuries, Ireland still breathes forth a national character which she has preserved through all the days of her subjection. She lacks but one element of sovereign nationhood—the right to govern herself. Give her that right, and let her, too, inhale the free air of liberty. Her station in the Atlantic between the Old World and the new makes her the entrepôt of both, where long since her people would have grown powerful and prosperous if the vigilant jealousy of England had not rendered her natural resources and natural advantages nugatory. Her ideas of expansion were never military. They were always moral and intellectual. She is a nation whose sons can say of her:

> We have wronged no race, we have robbed no land,
> We have never oppressed the weak,
> And this, in the face of heaven, is the nobler thing to speak.

[Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the contribution of Irishmen to American independence and the gratitude of early American patriots toward Ireland are shown in the following letters of Rev. Michael Earls, S. J., a fellow student of mine in the early nineties at Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass., where he is now the professor of language and literature:

[From the Worcester Gazette.]

AMERICA'S DEBT TO IRISH WILL NOT BE FORGOTTEN NOW, SAYS FATHER EARLS—QUOTES FROM REVOLUTIONARY DOCUMENTS TO PROVE THAT HALF OF THE AMERICAN ARMY WHICH WON INDEPENDENCE FOR COLONIES WAS MADE UP OF MEN FROM IRELAND AND SAYS HE IS CONFIDENT THAT SERVICE WILL BE REPAID NOW.

To the EDITOR OF THE GAZETTE:

SIR: In a letter to the Irish-American Historical Society (Nov. 12, 1896), Senator Hoar, whose name honors our country as well as our city, wrote: "The facts in regard to this most important contribution to our national life ought to be collected and preserved. * * * The Irish race has done a great service to America." And it is in the spirit of this recommendation that I send as a supplement to my last letter a few more facts about Ireland's contribution to our country in the dark days of the Revolution. Gratitude is one of the prime marks of American culture. We kept our eyes on France during the early years of the war, and our hearts beat high with sympathy for her when the Hun set upon her in 1914. We had not forgotten France, nor her hand to us in the years of our great war for freedom. And likewise American gratitude manifests itself to-day when Ireland, calmly announcing her declaration of independence, looks to the great Republic in the West. France is witness to our abiding spirit of gratitude; Ireland does not expect us to fail. For Ireland remembers that the scion of Mount Vernon, Washington's adopted son, said with deep sincerity: "The shamrock should be entwined with the laurels of the Revolution. The rank grass had grown over the grave of many a poor Irishman who had died for America ere the flag of the Lillies floated in the field by the Star-Spangled Banner."

Turning then to the facts, which, in the words of Senator Hoar, "ought to be collected and preserved," I wish to recall the first statement made in the previous letter: Our special ambassador, Franklin, and our Continental Congress looked to Ireland for sympathy and help in the Revolution; and, secondly, before we note the extent and worth of this Irish contribution, let us bear in mind, without further insistence on the point, that it was a labor of supreme difficulty for Ireland and her sons to carry into effect the earnest will and heart they had for America's freedom. Here, then, is a partial list of some of the leading names and the testimony of some notable authorities with regard to the efficiency of the Irish assistance. Again, I string in plain line these statistics and facts without any effort at the embellishments of rhetoric.

First. The testimony taken only from Franklin's correspondence, now in the possession of the American Philosophical Society. Glance at a few excerpts from 100 Irish letters to Franklin:

James Shanley, writing from Paris, May 28, 1777, says that "he had left Ireland about seven weeks before to offer his services to the American cause," and "there are many staunch friends of that cause in Ireland, but they dare not declare themselves." A Franco-Irish officer, O'Meara, May 14, 1777, expressed "great desire to serve the American cause." Count O'Donnell, a colonel in a Polish regiment; Baron O'Cahill, commandant of French troops; and Capt. O'Heguerty, from Nancy, wrote similarly to Franklin in that same year. In 1779 Robert O'Connell wrote from Paris offering to "take care of American consular interests at any of the Spanish ports." Capt. McCarthy More wrote from Boulogne, July 4, 1781, "to enter the service of the United States." Chevalier O'Gorman recommended Dr. John O'Connor, who "desired to serve America either in the Army or in the hospitals." And in the same year Henry O'Neil applied to Franklin for a commission in the American Army. A commission, too, was asked for Capt. James Byrnes, commander of a merchant vessel; and the Black Prince was given to the command of Capt. Patrick Dowlin; and Capt. Luke Ryan wrote Franklin from Dunkirk that "he expects to have a large cutter completed soon, and if his abilities deserve Franklin's protection, begs for a rank in the American Navy, since he regards the American cause as his own."

These are but a few facts gathered from 100 letters of Franklin's Irish sympathizers.

Second. Some notable "firsts" in the American Army and Navy:

Practically the first blow in the Revolution was struck by the son of a Limerick schoolmaster, John Sullivan, who captured the Fort of William and Mary, December 13, 1774. First stroke at British sea power, made by Jeremiah O'Brien off Machias, on the coast of Maine, May, 1775. Montgomery—every American schoolboy knows of his heroism; see what, in the British Parliament, Lord North said of him: "He was brave, he was able, he was humane, he was generous; but still he was only a brave, able, humane, generous rebel. Curse on his virtues; they've undone England." That was Montgomery of Raphoe. Andrew Brown, of Ulster, was mustermaster general in the American Army; Stephen Moylan, brother of the Bishop of Cork, was aid-de-camp to Washington; John Barry, of Wexford, was founder of the American Navy; and the famous Pennsylvania line, the bulwark of American defense, was called "the line of Ireland."

Third. The numerical strength of the Irish in the American forces.

From the Pennsylvania Gazette, August 11, 1773, we learn that upwards of 18,000 people left Dublin to settle in various parts of America in the first months of that year. The most exacting and conservative estimates made by recent-day research state that between the years 1763 and 1774 the arrivals from Ulster numbered 33,600 and from other parts of Ireland 88,400. It is well to note these figures because of a prevalent platitude that used to have place in certain pages of so-called American history, namely, that these Irish are to be known as "Scotch-Irish," a designation that does not speak true of either end of the hyphen. Now, to these numerous emigrants who joined loyally to the American cause (not "Loyalists" of the kind that sailed out of Dorchester Bay St. Patrick's Day, 1777) must be added the numbers who came as soldiers to the American forces. To name but one, in 1779 Count Arthur Dillon addressed a petition to the French war office on behalf of all the Irish soldiers in France, and he sailed from Brest—Brest, so Americanized during the past year—with 2,300 troops. From the Carolinas to the coast of Maine the American troops "bristled with Irishmen," a clause used in the report about the New Jersey line. Even in Massachusetts our State archives give the names of 147 Irishmen among the minutemen at Lexington, 258 at Bunker Hill, and 78 in the company at the siege of Boston.

AMERICAN ARMY HALF IRISH.

Four. The testimony of the foe about the Irish numbers.

In the course of a debate in the Irish House of Commons, April 2, 1784, the Hon. Luke Gardiner stated: "I am assured from the best authority that the major portion of the American Army was composed of Irish, and that the Irish language was as commonly spoken in the American ranks as English. I am also informed that it was their valor determined the contest, so that England had America detached from her by force of Irish emigrants." At an investigation into the causes of the defeat held in the British House of Commons (see British House of Commons Report, vol. xiii, p. 303) Maj. Gen. Robertson, who had served 24 years in America, was asked: "How are the provincial corps composed—mostly of native Americans or of emigrants from various nations of Europe?" He answered, "Some of the corps were mostly natives. I remember Gen. Lee telling me that he believed half the rebel army were from Ireland." Joseph Galloway, who, though a native of Pennsylvania, became a violent Tory in 1778, replied when asked by members of the British House of Commons (ibid., p. 431) about the constituents of the American Army, "The names and places of their nativity being taken down, I can answer the question with precision. There was scarcely one-fourth natives of America, about one-half Irish, the other fourth English and Scotch."

To this testimony from English sources let us add the clear American statement of George Washington Parke Custis, spoken from Mount Vernon: "Of the operations of the war, I mean the soldiers, up to the coming of the French, Ireland had furnished in the ratio of 100 for 1 of any other nation."

Here, then, are some of the facts which "ought to be collected and preserved." They show that America's great petition to Ireland, as manifested by her ambassador, Franklin, and by the Continental Congress, received a generous response. And America, grateful to France, will prove the abiding spirit of her gratitude toward Ireland. It is not men or money that Ireland looks for in this great hour of her declaration of independence; she has reason to expect the voice of America, speaking in her behalf at the peace conference. Justice to small nations was our profession in arms; our gratitude accentuates our profession of justice.

Thanking you again, dear editor,
Sincerely,
FATHER EARLS, S. J.

FATHER EARLS SHOWS HOW EARLY AMERICAN PATRIOTS FELT TOWARD IRELAND—QUOTES FROM HISTORICAL DOCUMENTS THAT WHEN AMERICA ASSERTED ITS CLAIM FOR SELF-DETERMINATION CONGRESSES, AMBASSADORS, AND PEOPLE LOOKED TO IRELAND FOR SUPPORT OF GREAT PRINCIPLE EMBODIED IN DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

To the EDITOR OF THE GAZETTE.

SIR: In this day of geographical and historical reconstructions, it is no surprise to find verified the old truism that history repeats itself. A long list of these verifying instances is a matter of easy information for any reader of current journals. I wish to mention only one of these historical coincidences, one which, while it is a point of international interest, is especially arresting the attention of our country during these days of high anticipations. I mean the Irish question—the right of Ireland, as of any other nation, small or great, to self-determination. This right in general has been asserted by England in her manifest proclamations during the years of the war, and is the very heart of President Wilson's appeal to the country at our entrance into the war; and in particular, the exercise of this right in Ireland's case is the solemn avowal of vast congresses of men meeting in free assemblies in Australia, Canada, and in every one of these United States. Ireland's case has received an affirmative vote, almost unanimous, throughout the world, and if it does not receive a similar vote at the peace conference millions of America's most devoted sons will feel that the war was in vain—the solemn pledges of unselfish, magnanimous America remaining unfulfilled.

But it is not upon this point that I direct your attention; we can await the issues of the peace conference with American confidence, knowing, as a great orator said the other night in Newport, that "God will preside over the destinies of nations, and President Wilson is on the American job." I wish merely to show you a coincidence of history in the present American interest and sympathy toward Ireland. We are aware. I trust, the vast assemblies in the United States have voiced forceful and dignified petitions to President Wilson in Ireland's behalf; petitions that had the strength of the Rocky Mountains in the West; that caught up the unanimous voices of the South, rippled along the Great Lakes and became a sonorous voice like Niagara's; and had the four-square support of the Atlantic seaboard. In this great chorus from America, Massachusetts played her part; of our State in this regard we can repeat Webster's proud words, "Massachusetts needs no encomium." Our Congress, in both Houses, put the matter deep into consideration for fuller and more determined consideration upon a later day.

Now, this is the page which repeats history. For looking back to our colonial days, when America asserted and won its claim for self-determination, our Congresses and our ambassadors and our people looked to Ireland for support of the great principle embodied in our Declaration of Independence. I shall do no more than string together in a straight line the documented proofs of this assertion, and I can the more easily do this since I have just now received the proof pages of a new book, "A Hidden Phase of American History," done by the historiographer of the American Historical Society, a book soon to be on the shelves of every American library.

First. Benjamin Franklin, diplomatic agent of the United States, twice visited Ireland and was cordially received everywhere by the people, in 1769 and 1771. He wrote:

"All Ireland is strongly in favor of the American cause. * * * I send you four pamphlets written in Ireland by Irish gentlemen here, in which you will find some excellent well-said things." (Letter to Dr. Samuel Cooper, of Boston, dated London, Apr. 27, 1769.)

"In Ireland among the patriots I dined with Dr. Lucas. They are all friends of America, in which I said everything I could to confirm them." (Letter, London, Jan. 13, 1772.)

"I found them (the Irish) disposed to be friends of America, in which I endeavored to confirm them, with the expectation that our growing weight might in time be thrown into their scale, and by joining our interest with theirs, might be obtained for them, as for us, a more equitable treatment from this nation (England). There are many brave spirits among them. The gentry are a very sensible, polite, friendly, and handsome people. Their parliament makes a most respectable figure, with a number of very good speakers in both parties, and able men of business." Franklin goes on to mention the courtesy of the parliament toward himself. (Letter to Thomas Cushing, Delegate to the Continental Congress.)

These citations, out of a large list that might be given, are sufficient to show that report was made to America by our special envoy. America looked to Ireland for help and sympathy, as Ireland now looks to America in this great hour of her declaration of independence. One liberty-loving people called to another: America summoned the Irish Parliament and the Irish people to the cause of American liberty; Ireland repeats the summons for the cause not merely of Irish liberty but of human rights—the cause for which America went to war.

Second. The address to the people of Ireland, adopted at a meeting of the Continental Congress at Philadelphia, July 28, 1775. Only the following excerpt need be given to show the mutual sympathy existing between the two countries:

"You have ever been friendly to the rights of mankind; and we acknowledge with pleasure and gratitude that your nation has produced patriots who have nobly distinguished themselves in the cause of humanity and America. * * * We sympathize with you in your distress * * * In the rich pastures of Ireland many hungry parricides have fed and grown strong to labor in its destruction. * * * God grant that the iniquitous schemes of extirpating liberty by the British Empire may soon be defeated."

Again, on October 2, 1775, in a resolution introduced by the Committee on Trade and passed unanimously by the Continental Congress, Ireland is mentioned as "a people who have always manifested a noble regard to the rights of mankind and have been friendly to these much-injured Colonies."

Third. The testimony of a leading American after the Revolution. The adopted son of Washington, George Washington Parke Custis, speaking for the cause of Ireland in City Hall, Washington, D. C., July 20, 1826, said in the course of his notable speech:

"In Erin, and in the darkest days of our destiny, whenever it was told that we bore ourselves bravely in the field though pressed by misfortune, a thousand, aye, a hundred thousand times did the poor Irishman take off his hat and cry his heart, 'God bless great Washington and the cause of America.' And this, Americans, in the very lion's jaws."

Mr. Custis enumerates some of the distinguished sons of Ireland who served under the American command, and then adds:

"Permit me to conclude with the invocation to Ireland as uttered by the child of Mount Vernon on the day of independence, and under the venerable praetorium of the Revolution: 'Health and success to the Emerald Isle! My country's friend in my country's utmost need. May she soon be relieved from the lion's grasp, for the lion is of a kind that fondles ere it kills, while the eagle suffers the smallest bird to wing its wonted way to warble its hymns of praise in the pure melody of nature, the song of the soul. Ireland, thou friend of my country in my country's most friendless days, much injured, much enduring land, accept this poor tribute from one who esteems thy worth and mourns thy desolation. May the God of heaven in His justice cause the sun of freedom to shed its benign radiance on the Emerald Isle.'"

Franklin, the Continental Congress, Mount Vernon, and Washington's son—surely these are a goodly company for Americans of this day who ask for Ireland that boon of liberty which America once asked Ireland to labor for in America's urgent need.

Thanking you, dear editor, for the space given to this letter,

Sincerely,

FATHER EARLS, S. J.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN].

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, the session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, which will be remembered as the war Congress, is drawing to a close. The Members of the Congress, who will never forget the memorable night when they declared through their vote that the state of war thrust upon the United States by the Imperial German Government be formally declared, will also carry away with them the great feeling that within the life of the Congress this war has been ended in peace with victory.

The United States fought for its rights as a Nation; also, the United States voiced the truth that all nations and peoples should of themselves have the right to determine their government.

The principles for which we fought have been secured. Their application should be general, not partial, else they lose their force. The right of Ireland to self-determination is no less pronounced than the right of Poland, of Jugo-Slavonia, of Czecho-Slovakia.

President Wilson, after laying down his 14 conditions of peace, concluded with these words:

An evident principle runs through the whole program I have outlined. It is the principle of justice to all peoples and nationalities, and their right to live on equal terms of liberty and safety with one another, whether they be strong or weak.

Previously, at Arlington, Va., Mr. Wilson had stated:

One of the principles which America held dear was that small and weak States had as much right to their sovereignty and independence as large and strong States.

On February 11, 1918, speaking before Congress, the President said:

National aspirations must be respected; peoples may now be dominated and governed only by their consent. "Self-determination" is not a mere phrase.

President Wilson recently set sail to return to the United States from the peace conference, leaving from the port of Brest, the same port from which Count Arthur Dillon sailed in the Revolutionary War to bring military help to the American Colonies in their fight for independence. On being greeted at Boston, President Wilson told his hearers that the world looked to America with hope, because of the disinterestedness of our purposes and our aims.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives has favorably reported out joint resolution 357—

That it is the earnest hope of the Congress of the United States of America that the peace conference now sitting in Paris, in passing upon the rights of various peoples, will favorably consider the claims of Ireland to the right of self-determination.

Neither the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee nor any man on the committee, according to the RECORD, has expressed any doubt of the committee's jurisdiction in the premises. This body, which has the power to declare war and fight it through to a successful conclusion, has the power to suggest to our commissioners.

Whatever the sentiment in the United States at large regarding the Irish question in the past, I think it is patent today that the opinion of the United States is, "Why should Ireland be omitted in the application of the principle of self-determination?"

The very history of Ireland is her greatest eulogy. The dying hands of her every generation have thrown to her living children the torch of liberty to be borne sometimes in adversity and travail, at other times in triumph, but always onward and onward. When, in the homeland, oppression became persecution, there went from Ireland to the four corners of the world her emigrants, carrying to America, to Canada, to Australia, to continental Europe the dream of a free country. Irishmen have fought under every flag for liberty. Are they to be denied liberty under their own?

Ireland's flickering lamp of hope is brightened by the prospect of action on her long-deferred claim for self-government at the peace conference. Resolutions have already been adopted by several States, through all of which runs the evident feeling that self-determination should be applied to friend and foe. The British people and the liberal British press favor self-determination for Ireland.

In every democracy majority rule obtains. The majority in Ireland has already expressed itself, and emphatically, for self-determination. The Irish have an aptitude for political government if any people have. With them law and order are paramount. Anarchy finds among them no disciples. Class hatred is foreign to their nature. They have no part in bolshevism. They yield to no race in patriotism and citizenship.

The Irish question has attracted the attention of the world, and those who would pass it by at times do so by stating it is a purely domestic question. If it is a domestic question, it is domestic for Ireland alone. For the rest of the world it is a question of the application to one people of principles recognized by all nations to be just. If it is other than a domestic question, it is an international problem, and therefore the world is concerned. The peace conference will be occupied in the adjustment of world differences.

To America Ireland's cause should appeal more than to any land. In 1776, when our Republic was established; in 1812, when it was saved from destruction; in 1861, when the Union was threatened, Irishmen in large numbers responded to the call to arms and wrote for themselves undying fame in history. In 1914, when chaos seemed the fate of European civilization, it was the Irish who led Britain's vanguard across the channel and died in large numbers among the first 100,000 in the retreat from the Belgian border, while the French and the rest of the British came up. In 1917, when America threw her weight into the scale of justice, sons of Irishmen, proud to be called American citizens, were among the first to volunteer, and formed no inconsiderable part of the American Expeditionary Force and the United States Navy. These men wrote as indelibly in blood on the fields of France a declaration of independence for the world as did their ancestors in former wars sustain with their blood the Declaration of Independence of the American Colonies.

To an Irishman may be attributed popular form of government in the Colonies, and men of Irish blood were among the framers of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States.

America is the champion of oppressed peoples. Whether we find the rôle a delicate one to perform or not, it is our position in the world to-day.

As such we ask that Ireland be not overlooked in the settlement of the world's problems, but rather specifically included. The question should be presented to the peace conference. The Irish nation is one of the oldest in Europe. Ireland had her own code of laws and her own language. Her vast contribution to the education and civilization of continental Europe long centuries before the English invasion is a historical fact. Ireland never surrendered her national rights. She has fought against forced rule in every century since 1172. The so-called act of union, passed in 1800 by a Parliament in which four-fifths of the Irish people had no representation and to which only a small portion of the 300 members were elected, has been described by Gladstone himself in words that will always condemn it, when he said:

> I know of no blacker or fouler transaction in the history of man.

Geographical location or claims to govern should be no barrier to her demands for consideration—with the other dependencies knocking at the door of the peace conference. If when the names of the dependencies are called at the conference no delegate is there to respond for Ireland, then should not the United States request that she be heard, that the principle of justice to all peoples and nationalities may be applied? Such a principle to carry force should be universal in its application. A race, like an individual, is entitled to a day in court and a just verdict.

Arabia, Palestine, Mesopotamia, Syria, Armenia have claims for liberty from Turkish domination; Bukowina, Transylvania, and Bessarabia desire again to be associated with Roumania; the Jugo-Slavs are coming into their own; Albania wants its freedom; the Italian Irredenta, Triest, and Trentino find their dreams for consolidation with Rome on the eve of realization; Bohemia, Moravia, and Slovakia will soon be the Czecho-Slovakian nation; the free government of Poland has already been recognized; Finland desires to set her own house in order; Lithuania yearns for recognition.

Ireland has lived on hopes and promises and visions long enough. It is time for her to take her place among the free nations of the world.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] seems to think that the British Parliament and the British foreign office at this late day would consider it an insult if the House of Representatives passed this resolution which expresses the sentiment of not alone the Congress of the United States but also the sentiment of an overwhelming majority of the people of this country in favor of Irish freedom, and the right of the people of Ireland to determine the form of government under which they shall live.

The President of the United States a year ago last February stood on this rostrum, and the British Government and the British people, and all of our allies, were willing to stand behind his declaration at that time to the effect that the United States of America and her allies were fighting for democracy, and the right of the people of the world to govern themselves, and pledging this Nation and its allies to secure for the small nations the right of self-determination. The President of the United States did not state that this principle applied only to the people of the central empires, but made a positive declaration that it was intended to apply to the people of the world.

If England wanted to object to the application of this principle to her dependencies and colonies that was the time for her statesmen to make known their position, but in the language of one of her generals she had her back to the wall then fighting and victory was not even in sight. England never protested officially or otherwise against President Wilson's declaration, laying before the world the 14 points as a basis of peace, the right of self-determination of small nations being one of the principal points in that declaration.

Is this Congress and the people of this country going to hold off now and refuse to Ireland the same consideration that we all agree should be given to the Serbs, the Poles, the Czecho-Slovaks, the Belgians, and the Jews?

Why, only the other day the President of the United States received a delegation of the leading Jews of the country, who called to present the claims of the Jews of the world for the establishment of an independent Jewish state in Palestine. The President, without reservation, and rightly so, told them of his sympathy with this movement and offered his assistance as head of our delegation to the peace conference to see that this independent state was established. Because one of our allies in this war might see fit to contend that the Irish question is a domestic question, are we as a Nation to stand idly by and not lift our voice in protest and let it appear to the people of the world that the only people upon which we shall impose our ideals are those nations that we conquer? And are we going to take the position that we will deny to the people in our own dominions, as well as in the dominions of our allies, the fundamental principle of the right to choose their own form of government?

I am in favor at home and abroad, wherever people differ racially and in their national feelings and aspirations, of giving them the right to determine the form of government under which they shall live, and we could find no better time than right now, in the closing hours of the Sixty-fifth Congress, to express ourselves unanimously on the Gallagher resolution, which will give courage to the people of Ireland in their effort to choose their own form of government after a struggle of over 700 years.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN].

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I would not get started in half a minute, and the only thing I know to do is to ask leave to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD on self-determination for Ireland.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Pennsylvania. I do not intend to continue. I might get warm. [Laughter.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN].

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I rejoice at this opportunity to give my unqualified support to the resolutions relative to the consideration by the peace conference of the claims of Ireland for self-determination. Quite contrary to the assertion on this floor that this matter is no concern of us, I assert that a liberty-loving American people, who themselves enjoy the blessings of freedom and independence, are always concerned in the struggle of any people seeking their own independence. Moreover, it is not only proper but also imperative for a people who under free institutions have enjoyed a measure of prosperity and happiness beyond that granted any other people in history to express the hope—and this resolution is thus moderate—that the rights of Ireland shall at least be considered at the peace table. What claim has Poland or Bohemia or any other small nation that Ireland has not? If Ireland had been under the domination of one of our enemies—Germany or Austria, for example—there would be no need for resolutions in this House; her independence would have been promised and guaranteed even before the peace conference gathered together. With all the justice of their righteous claims, shall the Irish people alone be denied even their demand for consideration at the conference simply because they are under the sovereignty of one of our cobelligerents in this war? Was this war fought that democracy be bestowed on those nations hitherto ruled over by our enemies, but denied one small nation ruled over by one of our cobelligerents, herself proclaiming the war—a war for democracy?

I am confident that these questions will be answered by us this morning with an emphatic and unequivocal declaration for universal democracy. When I spoke some weeks ago before the Committee on Foreign Relations of the House upon the Gallagher resolution I was confident of the favorable action of the committee. This morning I am again confident of favorable action on this resolution by this House. I am profoundly gratified that as one of the last legislative actions of this House before the control of the House passes from us the Democratic Party shall have the honor of putting through this body the resolution declaring our sympathetic support in behalf of the long-suffering but virtuous and noble people in their struggle for independence. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana is recognized for one minute.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I am interested in the liberty and the happiness and the peace of the Letts and the Finns and the Ukrainians, but I am much more interested in the liberty and the peace and the happiness of the beautiful Emerald Isle, and I feel that I can say to those people across the seas to-night, "We be of one blood, you and I." And it does seem to me that the least that this great Nation of ours can do, offending no one, is simply to express our opinion that around the table in Paris the claims of Ireland to govern herself shall be considered. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island is recognized for one minute.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I congratulate the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Sixty-fifth Congress on favorably reporting the Gallagher resolution as amended. I congratulate the Rules Committee on bringing in a rule to make this resolution in order. Let it be known to all men that under a Democratic administration, headed by Woodrow Wilson, who gave those talismanic words to the world, "the right of nations to self-determination," this Congress, by virtue of the action of two Democratic committees, is privileged to raise its voice in behalf of that gallant nation across the sea, which has never given up its nationality, and to express the hope that the peace conference will favorably consider the right of Ireland, the "Poland of the Seas," to self-determination.

I am reminded as I speak that to-morrow will be the one hundred and forty-first anniversary of the birth of Robert Emmet, the youthful Protestant patriot, who gave his life ungrudgingly for the cause of liberty and his country. He expressed the wish that his epitaph should not be written until his native land had taken her place among the nations of the world. And it was a southern statesman, Robert L. Taylor, who eulogized Emmet in these glowing sentences of poetic words:

If I were a sculptor, I would chisel from the marble my ideal of a hero. I would make it the figure of an Irishman sacrificing his hopes and his life on the altar of his country, and I would carve on its pedestal the name of Robert Emmet.

If I were a painter, I would make the canvas eloquent with the deeds of the bravest people who ever lived, whose proud spirit no power can ever conquer, and whose loyalty and devotion to the hopes of free government no tyrant can ever crush. And I would write under the picture "Ireland."

If I were a poet, I would melt the world to tears with the pathos of my song. I would touch the heart of humanity with the mournful threnody of Ireland's wrongs and Erin's woes. I would weave the shamrock and the rose into garlands of glory for the Emerald Isle, the land of martyrs and memories, the cradle of heroes, the nursery of liberty.

Tortured in dungeons and murdered on scaffolds, robbed of the fruits of their sweat and toil, scourged by famine and plundered by the avarice of heartless power, driven like the leaves of autumn before the keen winter winds, this sturdy race of Erin's sons and daughters have been scattered over the face of the earth, homeless only in the land of their nativity, but princes and lords in every other land where merit is the measure of the man.

America entered the great world war after great deliberation. She went into it to maintain her rights, and in making the world safe for democracy to help destroy the power of any nation on earth to jeopardize the peace of the world again. In seeking to bind the world in peace, America is resolved that justice shall be done to the great and powerful and the small and weak alike. When the treaty of peace is signed, America wants no discontent or grumbling. What a mockery it would be to apply the principle of self-determination to one nation and refuse it to another. And so this great House of Representatives to-day will gladly, I am sure, raise its powerful voice in behalf of one of the oldest nations in the world—Ireland. [Applause.]

England must take notice of her own liberal thought, her liberal press, and the powerful expression of labor in Great Britain all crying out in unison for justice to Ireland. To the liberty-loving men and women of Great Britain America adds her voice to-day asking England to proclaim by her action at the peace conference that the era of evasion and broken promise is passed, and that Ireland shall take her place among the nations of the world with her aid and consent.

We are about to put the peoples of the world in charge of their Governments. We are about to discard forms and to seek that substance containing the eternal verities. We are about to right ancient wrongs and by our actions give proof and promise of a better future for all the world. Alsace and Lorraine is to be given back to France. Poland is to be reestablished, and bitter memories are to be softened in the knowledge that once again that land of valor and chivalry will be a nation. The dreams of the Czecho-Slovaks for a national status are to be realized. The boundaries of nations are to be made to conform to racial alignment, and the seeds of antipathy among peoples are to be destroyed.

Let America's voice then, both here and abroad, be lifted up for a nation whose claims to liberty and justice are founded on absolute right and strengthened by the ready sacrifice which her sons and daughters have made in every land when freedom needed champions. Justice to Ireland by the peace conference will prove the reality of earnestness and good faith, and denial of justice will make a laughing stock of the allies' professed sentiments for democracy. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Rhode Island has expired.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Reserving the right to object, I wish to say that there are as many Republicans desiring to vote for this resolution as there are Democrats. This is not a partisan proposition.

Mr. DYER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker——

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Rhode Island extending his remarks?

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have heard a good deal of Irish-American talk here to-night. There is no Irish blood in me, but I am for this resolution. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I fully agree with my colleague from California [Mr. NOLAN] that not only the Irish but also the Jews are entitled to their freedom and independence. [Applause.] I hope that both of these for centuries oppressed and persecuted peoples will secure it. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, knowing what oppression means I have at all times advocated and aided in its elimination wherever possible. It was for this reason that I was impelled to work to secure freedom and independence for the Czecho-Slovak, Jugo-Slav, and Polish peoples, and it is for the same reason that I am in favor of freedom, justice, liberty, and self-determination for Ireland.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. No; I regret that I have not the time.

The people of this nationality have demonstrated their fitness for self-government as well and have proven that they are deserving of our sympathy. To them, in a large measure, credit is due for our great and glorious victory. Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied that the American people sympathize with the aims and aspirations of the oppressed people of Ireland. We have a right to request, yes, to demand, that Ireland shall be accorded the right of self-determination. We are not appealing to the enemy, but are appealing to one of our allies, our friends, whom we have saved from defeat and destruction, for whom we have made such sacrifices. Have we sacrificed our blood and all to make Great Britain so strong that she could refuse with impunity to consider the pleas of oppressed nations and peoples? There should be no hesitancy on the part of this House to make the request that due consideration be given to the aspirations of Ireland for self-determination, and I feel that it, as well as all other small nations, are of right entitled to their freedom and liberty. It is for that reason that I have advocated and worked for the passage of this resolution, which I am satisfied, notwithstanding a well-planned filibuster on the part of certain gentlemen on this side, and a still larger number on the other side, will pass. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, owing to the way the time was divided, I could not get time. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, after all, this resolution is not butting into the affairs of Great Britain. It is not seeking to intervene with Great Britain in its domestic affairs. This resolution only expresses the earnest hope of the Congress of the United States that the peace conference may favorably consider the claims of Ireland. That is a hope which we have the right to express, without interfering with Great Britain. [Applause.] I think we ought to express the hope that is in the hearts of Americans and in the heart of America, that Ireland shall have her show at the peace conference and that the peace conference may so work out the terms of peace that when the final terms shall be agreed upon Ireland will be given independence. [Applause.] What is the harm in expressing a hope like that? We are undertaking to do much more than that with the other nations—the little nations now dependent upon the allies. Certainly no harm can come from our putting in concrete form the soulful spirit of America, which swells and rises high on the tide in favor of giving all nations independence, if possible, and expressing the hope that Ireland will achieve her right to govern herself when she now governs the rest of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes on the subject of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I object.

Mr. DECKER. I rise to move that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] have five minutes to address this body.

The SPEAKER. That motion is out of order.

Mr. DYER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York have three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I object.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I ask unanimous consent to speak for three minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Had not the gentleman from New York obtained two minutes in his own right when the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] asked three minutes for him?

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may have the opportunity now to speak for three minutes. He will soon be away from us——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York have the opportunity to address the House for three minutes.

Mr. DYER. Does the gentleman from Iowa object?

The SPEAKER. It is the business of the Chair to put that question. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I have lost entirely too much energy in fighting for the chance to speak for three minutes. Still I am grateful, as others have had only one minute each.

Nearly two years ago, during a dreadful and agonizing night, a night which we will never forget, this Congress voted for war by an overwhelming majority. We began our service in the Sixty-fifth Congress by the first act in a tragedy, a declaration of war, and it is a glorious thing that the war Congress ends with a message of love, which will promote the peace of the world. [Applause.] For there can be no peace when a whole people feels aggrieved.

When you deal with nationality you deal with a thing that does not lend itself to rational analysis, a thing that is not subject to the laws of reason, but which is powerful because of that very fact. When you deal with the feeling of nationality you deal with sentiment, with emotion, with a passion which defies the laws of logic.

The Irishman who wants to be an Irishman and not an Englishman or a Frenchman has a right to live an Irishman as against the rest of the world. [Applause.]

This resolution merely asks for the Irish people the right of self-disposal, the right of self-government. The form of self-government and the extent to which the Irish people will cooperate with the rest of the peoples of the world will depend upon the method of cooperation that will be worked out by the statesmanship of mankind, by the new wisdom of the world in a peace conference. I hope that when Ireland is free she will not use her freedom for hatred and revenge, but that she will be a star added to a constellation of free commonwealths, shedding a kindly and cheering light for the whole of humanity. [Applause.]

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD some remarks that I have written on this resolution.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I request that all Members who desire to extend their remarks in the RECORD on this resolution may have leave to do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all who wish to print remarks on this resolution may do so. Is there objection?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of cotton.

Mr. GOULD. I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD]?

Mr. HEFLIN. I object.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman——

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Virginia whether his request to extend remarks on granting the Irish freedom would confine it to the Democratic side of the House?

Mr. FLOOD. I do not think the gentleman so understood my request.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There are a number of Republicans in favor of this resolution and there are many good Irishmen in my district. [Cries of "Regular order!"] I reserved the right to object—and I do not object, but I wanted to have it understood that this is not a partisan proposition.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, there is ample precedent for the action of Congress in the passage of such a resolution as this. For a hundred years we have enacted laws that would be a precedent for this resolution.

I am for this resolution, because it propounds a sound principle and because it is an entirely proper resolution for Congress to pass.

It expresses the hope that the peace conference will tender its friendly advice to England in reference to the Irish problem—a problem which must be settled before we can be assured of an enduring peace; a problem which must be settled before the world will believe that our victory for democracy was complete. [Applause.]

The propriety of Congress to pass such a resolution as this has been questioned. I have thought of this phase of the question very carefully and have reached the conclusion that there is no impropriety in Congress taking the action outlined in this resolution, but that, on the contrary, it is entirely proper and right for Congress to act in this matter. [Applause.]

We went into the great war to protect our rights and to defend our honor, but after we became belligerent the spirit of America broadened the scope of the war, and we not only fought for our country and its rights but we also fought for the future of humanity—for those universal sanctities that mark us as higher than the beasts; for honor, truth, justice, and an enduring peace, and for the principles that will assure such a peace. [Applause.]

The principle of this resolution is redolent with those ideas, full of the spirit which animated our soldiers who did the fighting and who whipped the German armies to their knees.

The Irish people constitute the only distinct branch of the Caucasian race so situated that it could be erected into an independent nation, and asking to have its rights considered, whose liberty or whose right of self-determination is not being considered by the peace conference; and I might add that in point of antiquity, in point of culture, in point of courage, in point of love of liberty, it stands as high as any branch of the Caucasian race and is superior to many of its branches. [Applause.]

While the peace conference is providing for the independence of Poland and Czecho-Slovakia and of other nationalities, let us ask it not to forget the rights of the brave and liberty-loving people of Ireland. [Applause.]

It has been urged as an argument against this resolution that the Irish in Ireland threatened to resist the conscription law. Let me say that out of 750,000 men of military age in Ireland, 275,000 of them volunteered in this war. This was nearly 40 per cent of the men of military age in that country, and the proportion of those who went into the war compares favorably with Scotland, Canada, the United States, and most countries that were engaged in this fight for human rights.

And I am told that after Parliament had passed a conscription act an investigation by the British authorities showed that so many men had volunteered in Ireland that the enforcement of conscription would have added but a few thousand men to the army, and therefore the British Government decided to abandon the enforcement of that law.

Such a showing entitles the splendid people of Ireland to the consideration of the friends of democracy and the right of self-determination everywhere. [Applause.]

Not only do the character and genius of the Irish people appeal to our consideration, but the manner in which they have been misgoverned and oppressed demands our sympathy.

The statement of one fact will demonstrate the misrule of England in Ireland. The population of Ireland 75 years ago was nearly 9,000,000; to-day it is less than four and a half million. Then Ireland was the fifth country in Europe in population; to-day it is not among the first 15. In that period every other country in Europe has increased its population. England's population has increased 150 per cent, while that of Ireland has been cut in half. In that time the decrease of Ireland's population has wiped out one-third of the Episcopalians, one-third of the Presbyterians, and more than one-half of the Catholics.

Despite the large birth rate in Irish families, every section in that country has suffered an amazing depopulation, due to the unhappy economical conditions, the decay of industries, and the unsettled state of the country brought about by English misrule.

Could a stronger argument be advanced by the people of Ireland for discontinuance of English rule? In this great hour, when governments are being reformed and when people long oppressed by tyranny are emerging into the sunlight of liberty, let us urge England to unselfishly and voluntarily discontinue the misrule of Ireland.

It is my profound conviction that the Irish people should constitute a nation with all the attributes, interests, and rights of nationality, and I hope and believe that this House will concur in that conviction.

A willingness on the part of the Government of Great Britain to permit the ascertainment of the will of the Irish people would be a decisive and honorable precedent for governments similarly situated in the future, and would do as much to insure the peace of the world as anything that any nation or group of nations could possible contribute to this splendid purpose. [Applause.]

The Irish people, whose kindred are woven into the warp and woof of our national life, and who have contributed materially to the downfall of the autocracy of the world, declare, and have long declared, that they are misruled, and have asked for, insisted upon, and fought for the right to determine for themselves their government and its form.

I believe in Ireland's right of self-determination. The Committee on Foreign Affairs believe in it. The Committee on Rules believe in it. And therefore we are here to-day to plead the cause of Ireland's sons and daughters that they may stand erect, redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled on her own sacred soil. [Applause.]

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the battle fronts of Europe and the peace conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask to address the House for one minute on this resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of this resolution. Ireland has struggled long for its independence. Out of the great world war there should surely come to the people of Ireland the right of self-determination. I hope the peace commission will recognize this just and rightful claim of Ireland. We in the United States have every reason to give due consideration to this important question. In every war in which this country has fought those of Irish descent have been faithful and true. It is said that one-half of the Continental Army were from Ireland; that not less than 40 per cent of the enlisted men in the Union Army were of Irish blood. In the present war it is said that one-third of the Army and over 40 per cent of the Navy are of Irish blood. In view of this splendid record of our own citizens who hail either themselves or their ancestors from Ireland, I feel that it is just and right for this great country to lend its moral influence in asking that the peace commissioners allow the people of Ireland to form the kind of government that they wish. Let us hope that one of the results of this great war will be the republic of Ireland. [Applause.]

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute on this resolution.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, I object to any further remarks.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the peace conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the resolution.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, before that is put I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Was general leave to print granted on this resolution?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I think not.

The SPEAKER. The recollection of the Chair is that on the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] all gentlemen were permitted to extend their remarks upon this resolution. The Chair does not think he can be mistaken about that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds had voted in favor thereof and that the resolution was passed.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. MASON (interrupting the count). Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MASON. I understood the Chair to announce the result that in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds had voted for the resolution and that it had passed.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my demand for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and thirty-seven Members present—a quorum. So the resolution is agreed to.

Mr. GORDON. But a division was demanded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri withdrew his demand for a division, but the Chair will put the division. Those in favor of passing the resolution will rise and stand until counted.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the yeas and nays. All those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Twenty-five Members—not a sufficient number.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, was not a division pending?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the demand for the yeas and nays superseded the demand for the division.

Mr. MANN. While in a way it does and while the yeas and nays can not now be ordered, having been refused by the House, it seems to me that the Speaker ought to count.

The SPEAKER. In order to establish beyond all question, the Chair will take the division.

The House divided; and there was ayes 216, noes 45.

So, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the resolution was passed.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a statement for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 10851, with a Senate amendment, and agree to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for that in a moment.

CLERKS TO MEMBERS.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 436, providing for the appointment by each Member of the House of Representatives of one secretary and one clerk, whose names shall be placed on the rolls and paid in monthly installments, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That hereafter each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner of the House of Representatives shall have for clerical assistance necessarily employed by him in the discharge of his official and representative duties one secretary at $2,000 per annum and one clerk at $1,200 per annum, whose names shall be placed on the rolls and who shall be paid in monthly installments by the Clerk of the House of Representatives. Such secretary and clerk shall be appointed by the Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner and certified to the Clerk of the House of Representatives at the beginning of his term of office, and shall be subject to removal at any time by such Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner, with or without cause; and Representatives and Delegates elect to Congress whose credentials in due form of law have been duly filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in accordance with the provisions of section 31 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, shall be entitled to the benefits of this provision.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect July 1, 1919, and that the appropriation for clerical assistance for the fiscal year 1920, carried in the act "making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes" shall be applied during said fiscal year in the manner above set forth.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to suspend the rules and pass the resolution. Is a second demanded?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish it to be understood I am not opposed to the resolution, but I would like to have some time——

Mr. MANN. We would like to understand what the resolution is.

Mr. CAREW. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Mississippi if in drawing his bill he has considered the effect of the language which he will find in volume 31 of the United States Statutes at Large on page 968, where it says:

It shall not be lawful to appoint or employ in any position under the House of Representatives more than one person at any one time, or to require, or permit any such person to divide with another any portion of his salary or compensaiton while so employed.

Does not the gentleman think that that would forbid a Member from having three persons to do the work of his office? And does it not require to have just two, and no more and no less?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. No more, but not less. He can appoint one secretary at $2,000 a year, and let it go at that.

Mr. CAREW. Then he will have a vacancy in the case of a clerk at $1,200 a year?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes.

Mr. CAREW. Now, a great many of us have often employed more help at one season of the year than at another. I know that I have had half a dozen girls working in my office at certain seasons of the year, and only had my secretary working at other seasons of the year. Does not the gentleman think that I will be embarrassed if I want to continue that practice if the measure he proposes is enacted?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I think so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would it not relieve the situation if the gentleman put before "$2,000" and "$1,200" the words "at the rate of"?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. What does the gentleman mean?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. One secretary "at the rate of."

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I do not think so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would not that enable a Member, if he wanted to shift a secretary and take another, to do so?

He might want to employ two clerks instead of one, and use the money for two clerks instead of for one. That is one of the complications in my office.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I want to ask the gentleman having the bill in charge whether the $240 that has been allowed additional to the help here in the Government would go to the secretary and the stenographer?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE HELM, OF KENTUCKY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from North Carolina to withdraw that for a special purpose. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] desires to ask for a recess as a mark of respect to the memory of his late colleague, Mr. HELM.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I will withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina withdraws the point of no quorum.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I deeply regret to have to announce to the House the death of my colleague, Hon. HARVEY HELM, of Kentucky, who died at Columbus, Miss., on Monday. I send to the Clerk's desk the following resolution, which I ask to have adopted.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 623.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. HARVEY HELM, a Representative from the State of Kentucky.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, before putting the last part of the resolution, I desire to state that it was the request of Mr. HELM that there be no committee of the Congress appointed to attend his funeral, and in obedience to that wish no request is made.

Mr. Speaker, some of us who served with our friend, and who will not be Members of the next Congress, when there can properly and fittingly be paid tribute to his memory and to his public services, would like the privilege of printing in the RECORD remarks in connection with his life and character. I ask unanimous consent that those of his colleagues who desire to do so may have that privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that Members may have the privilege of printing in the RECORD remarks touching the life and character of Mr. HELM. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RECESS.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following additional resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now stand in recess until 9 a. m.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to; accordingly (at 7 o'clock and 18 minutes a. m.) the House stood in recess until 9 o'clock a. m.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House (at 9 o'clock a. m., Tuesday, March 4, 1919) resumed its session.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until 9.30 a. m.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FOSTER). The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until 9.30 a. m. Is there objection?

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to suggest to the gentleman that there is pending upon the Suspension Calendar a bill that came over from the Senate, which has been reported out by the House Judiciary Committee, extending the time of the going into effect of section 10 of the Clayton amendment to the antitrust act. The purpose of this bill is to give the short-line railroads of this country a better chance to live through the conditions which now obtain. It will take but a few minutes for the House to dispose of it one way or the other. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his request, but will give us a chance, at least, to submit this matter to the judgment of the House.

Mr. MANN. Let us see if we can reach an understanding about anything of this sort. It is now 9 o'clock. Probably there will not be a quorum here before——

Mr. KITCHIN. Not before 10 o'clock, anyway.

Mr. MANN. That is, there will not be a full attendance. I will not say that there will not be a quorum. I will assume that there is a quorum here now. There will not be a full attendance before half past 10. There are some things that have to be done at the end of a session of Congress. It is not desirable to get tied up on something. As far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to sit here and let gentlemen ask unanimous consent to pass bills if they will agree not to row about it if they do not get unanimous consent.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield.

Mr. RAKER. There is a little bill here that has passed the Senate, to which I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois, as well as the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina, providing for an additional judicial district in northern California. I do not think there will be any objection to it, and we can consider it while we are waiting. It has passed the Senate.

Mr. MANN. I do not know that there will be any objection to anything; but I am not going to help the House get into a condition where we may get into a row and then have to call the roll, and then probably get along to the point where we can not even offer a resolution, which I want to offer before the session expires, in regard to the Speaker.

Mr. RAKER. I think the suggestion is a wise one; and if we can take up these matters by unanimous consent, then if there is any objection we will not try to argue or make any points of order.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I do not think there are enough people here so that we ought to bring up any bills, even by unanimous consent.

Mr. RAKER. We recessed until 9 o'clock, and Members are all supposed to be here. Let us try it and see what we can do.

Mr. SUMNERS. I do not understand that the gentleman from North Carolina objects.

Mr. KITCHIN. I suggested a recess until 9.30.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think there is a better chance of bringing this matter up after 9.30, if the gentleman does not object to a recess now.

Mr. SUMNERS. Of course I know what that means, and I have no intention of running up against the situation——

Mr. MANN. There is some chicken feed here that might properly be disposed of—probably nothing of great importance.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. We have got this clerk bill, that we might just as well put through while we are waiting.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. SUMNERS. I will reserve the right to object just a minute longer.

Mr. RAKER. Here is a matter to which there is no possible objection.

Mr. SUMNERS. If I may have the attention of the gentlemen present for just about a minute additional, I wish to say a word about this resolution dealing with the situation which confronts the short-line railroads, and to put the responsibility upon the House.

Mr. MANN. Do not put the responsibility on me. I refuse to assume it, because I tried my best to beat that proposition when it went into the law.

Mr. SUMNERS. Excepting the gentleman from Illinois. There are about 35,000 miles of these short-line roads. Let me make this informal statement——

Mr. KITCHIN. Go ahead and make your statement.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Speaker, there are about two and a half million dollars tied up in these short lines, of which there are some 800. The big roads are free from the effect of section 10 of the Clayton Act and are being taken care of financially by the Government, while the little roads have to depend largely upon local support, and in order to get necessary local credit it was shown before the Judiciary Committee these short lines must permit the creditor some voice in their management.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The matter of the short-line roads has been for weeks and months before the Interstate Commerce Commission and considered in every aspect, and I think the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] or the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] ought to be here when that matter comes up.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill 2910, providing for an additional judge in the northern district of California.

Mr. MANN. That will not go through.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. There is a matter of unanimous consent now pending.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. ROGERS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROGERS. The situation when the House recessed about 7 o'clock was that we were actually considering a bill presented by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS]; I would like to inquire whether that should not automatically come before the House at this moment, to the exclusion of other matters.

Mr. RAKER. That was temporarily laid aside by unanimous consent.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, since the gentleman desires to take up the bill of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], which never will pass the Senate, and use the time in that way, I will withdraw my request.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass this joint resolution.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has already moved to suspend the rules and pass a bill some hours ago, and I had some time on it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the Reading Clerk, or some one, made a slight mistake in the legislative appropriation bill about the clerk hire item. As the amendment that is in the bill was first agreed to in the House it read like this:

> For clerk hire of each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner, for clerk hire necessarily employed by him in the discharge of his official and representative duties, $3,200 per annum.

I asked unanimous consent to strike out the word "hire" where it appeared the second time, after the amendment was agreed to. That unanimous consent was granted. But the clerk, whoever it was, inadvertently struck out the word "hire" where it first appeared. So that it is now the law reading like this:

> For clerk of each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner, for clerk hire necessarily employed by him in the discharge of his official and representative duties—
> And so forth.

It should read:

> For clerk hire of each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner, for clerk necessarily employed by him in the discharge of his official and representative duties—
> And so forth.

That would still be in the singular, "clerk necessarily employed by him." But the statute provides that where the singular is used the plural shall be considered as imputed, if it is a reasonable conclusion or if it be considered necessary.

I think that language of that provision as it was intended to be passed, and probably as it is passed, will be construed to mean that each Member is entitled to $3,200 in payment of clerk or clerks employed by him. Then the question arises how that is to be paid.

Well, we have a number of items in this bill. The paragraph just above this provides for four stenographers to committees. The paragraph just above that provides for six official reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House without saying anything at all about who shall pay them, and they are not listed under anybody who does pay them. These items come in under a list heading above the official reporters, office of Postmaster, to which they do not relate. My construction of that is—and I think it is the only construction that can be made—that the Clerk of the House will pay these clerks to Members, and that each Member will have the right to certify to the Clerk the name of one clerk, or a dozen clerks if he chooses to, with salaries the total of which will not exceed $3,200. It seems to me that is the proper and only construction that can be made of the statute.

It is not to be assumed that Congress has made an appropriation here which can not be expended.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. COLLIER. If the gentleman's construction be true, what is the necessity for a change?

Mr. MANN. If that construction be true, there is no necessity for change, save in this one respect, and that probably will not arrive. The provision of the statute is not inactive and, of course, does not take effect until the 1st of July next. It does not apply to Members elect. The provision of the statute which is now in force as to this fiscal year, which makes the appropriation up to the 1st of July, provides for the payment of clerk hire to Members elect. We are all Members elect, or will be in less than three hours. We will then be no longer Members of Congress. Under the law we are Members elect. If there were not to be a special session of Congress before the 1st of July, a resolution like this would be quite essential.

Mr. COLLIER. That is, like the Humphreys resolution.

Mr. MANN. Yes; to obtain clerk hire at all after the 1st of July—but as it is perfectly certain, owing to the failure of a number of the appropriation bills, in support of the Government, after the 1st of July, that there will be a special session before the 1st of July—Members of Congress will have the same opportunity when the special session is called to provide in reference to this.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. There is this other thought that the gentleman has not yet stated——

Mr. MANN. I have not quite finished.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. About its being permanent law.

Mr. MANN. There is this thought. I may not be correct about the construction of the statute. While I think inevitably that will be the construction of the statute, still I have learned through some experience that it is pretty hard to tell what either an auditor or a comptroller will find about the statute, and probably the Clerk of the House would not feel warranted in paying out the money without consultation with the auditor or the comptroller.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Just for a question. I do not know that I will have the time.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I will give the gentleman what time he wants.

Mr. MANN. The Humphreys resolution provides directly for a salary of $2,000 and $1,200, making a total of $3,200. It would not give to any Member the right to have one clerk at $2,200 and another at $1,000. It would not provide for three clerks at $1,000 each for two and $1,200 for the third. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WELLING. I have not had an opportunity of hearing all of the gentleman's statement, which is always clear, but I understand there is no difference in the Humphreys provision, which has been presented to the House and the legislation already enacted, so far as the amount of compensation is concerned.

Mr. MANN. There is no difference so far as the total amount is concerned, if it can be drawn.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I hesitate at this late hour to take any of your time with a question of personal privilege.

Mr. MANN. What time does the gentleman think he would want?

Mr. LUNDEEN. Oh, four or five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I understand that I have the right to proceed for one hour without unanimous consent, but I thank the gentleman from Illinois, nevertheless. In September last the papers here in Washington and elsewhere all over the United States published articles in which I was termed a Hun. It was stated that I should be sent back to the Kaiser. The reason for this was that I had voted against the war resolution. It was stated that I was voting against the appropriations for prosecuting the war. I voted for all the bills to prosecute the war. I favored volunteers, having once served during the Spanish-American War as a volunteer myself. I volunteered to go with the Roosevelt volunteer divisions, but the President refused our services.

I have no desire to go into this question at length now. You have heard these questions of personal privilege repeatedly on the floor of this House, but I want to answer these charges, and I ask that I may have the privilege of revising and extending my remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of loyalty.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I want to say that no man ever questioned my loyalty to my face, nor will he ever do that. I received letters questioning my loyalty and abusing me. I replied and said that I would meet the writers on the platform or elsewhere, but that I did not desire them to question my loyalty in my presence, because it would not be well for them to do so.

This disloyalty business has been carried entirely too far by some people throughout the country. The Nonpartisan League has been termed disloyal. The Socialist Party has been called disloyal; all labor unions have been termed disloyal. The German-American Alliance, 2,000,000 members, all called disloyal. The labor people called business men disloyal profiteers. We have gone too far with this thing. As a matter of fact, the American people are all loyal; the whole people were loyal. There may have been a few men with criminal intent. Those men were punished; but the American people as a whole were loyal and they stood by their country, and I am proud of the fact that the boys from the Northwest, from Minnesota and Wisconsin and Michigan, men who were accused of disloyalty, were the very men who stood the brunt of battle at Chateau-Thierry, a battle where these regiments met the enemy, men of their own flesh and blood, and beat them back. They were true, genuine Americans.

ALL MEMBERS OF CONGRESS FROM MINNESOTA BUT ONE, CALLED DISLOYAL.

The great State of Minnesota has 10 Representatives and 2 Senators in the Congress of the United States. These men, in the exercise of their honest judgment as loyal and patriotic citizens and faithful representatives of the people of their State, cast their votes in Congress to warn Americans against sailing on vessels of foreign belligerents through the war zone.

Because of their vote 11 were denounced as Kaiserites by that large part of the press which was more active in promoting the interests of certain foreign nations than they were in protecting the lives of American citizens. Only one, Senator NELSON, was called a patriotic American, while men whose distinguished service to their State, lasting through many years, like Senator Moses E. Clapp, Representatives Sydney Anderson, Franklin F. Ellsworth, Charles Russell Davis, Carl C. Van Dyke, George R. Smith, Charles A. Lindbergh, Andrew J. Volstead, Clarence B. Miller, Halvor Steenerson, and Thomas D. Schall, equally patriotic, were branded as disloyal and unpatriotic.

As for myself, during the world war, I have voted and will vote all the money and all the supplies necessary for our brave soldiers wherever they may be. They must be loyally supported. Let this be so; nevertheless, we can not and will not yield our right to discuss the conduct of the war, our right to demand terms of an honorable peace, our right of petition, and our right of assembly. Neither will we spare tender-skinned officials from scathing denunciation as to their official acts whenever we feel that they are yielding ground to foreigners and abandoning the sacred and time-honored principles of patriotism established by our forefathers. Autocracy which masquerades in the garments of democracy is as obnoxious to a free people as the variety which openly wears a crown.

THEY WANTED TO INTERN ROOSEVELT.

Men lost their heads in a whirlwind of false accusations. So bitter was the feeling aroused that a large number of people circulated a petition in Oklahoma, if we may believe the daily press, asking that Col. Theodore Roosevelt, world-famous citizen and former President of the United States, be interned during the period of the war because of his criticism of Wilson and the administration. Yet Roosevelt freely denounced many of his fellow citizens as disloyalists and Huns.

The Irish-Americans were, of course, termed disloyal because they sought self-determination for Ireland. There is a man, I believe by the name of McGee, from Minneapolis, autocrat and member of the Public Safety Commission of Minnesota, who appeared before the Senate committee and slandered the patriotism and loyalty of the people of Minnesota. This man talked like some kings of old of jails and of firing squads because men had dared to exercise their constitutional right of free speech; he questioned the loyalty of the Swedish-Americans of the great Northwest whose ancestors discovered America 500 years before Columbus set sail to our shores, forgetting that John Hanson, whose statue was placed in Statuary Hall by the State of Maryland, was the first "President of the United States in Congress" during the Revolutionary War; unmindful of the fact that Swedish emigrants always lay aside their foreign allegiance at once, and become industrious and patriotic citizens. They fought in every war—the Revolutionary War, the War of 1812, the Mexican War, the Civil War, the Spanish-American, and the World War. They have never been found wanting. The Swedish people first of all the nations in the world recognized American independence. No punishment is too severe for this character assassin who so traduces and slanders our very best citizens.

388 MEMBERS OF CONGRESS CALLED DISLOYAL.

When the President of the United States before the election enjoined us to be neutral in thought as well as act he was denounced as a pacifist and disloyal. The now infamous National Security League, later investigated and denounced by Congress, and whose immense contributions, running into millions, came wholly from Wall Street—with the exception of $38—accused as disloyal 388 Members of Congress, including Mr. CLARK, Speaker of the House; Majority Leader KITCHIN; Minority Leader MANN; and other distinguished and famous statesmen were blacklisted by this crowd of political slanderers. This crowd of pretended patriots were found, upon investigation, to be nothing but scheming profiteers. My friends, those who coin gold out of patriotism must be eliminated from our national life.

Mr. Bryan and Mr. Ford and many other distinguished and patriotic citizens were denounced in the most scathing terms. Many of our most prominent citizens were even threatened with death. I myself have been in receipt of the vilest possible letters, breathing threats of insult, injury, and death. During the first months of the special session there came to my office many threats of death; and I want the world to know, and my record shows it, that I could neither be bullied nor threatened into any vote or act contrary to the right as God gave me to see the right.

Many leading college professors, educators, and ministers of the gospel throughout the country were likewise hounded. Unheard-of and cruel punishments were pronounced by the courts. Men and women were sentenced to 20, 30, and even 40 years of imprisonment. In this land of the free the methods of the Spanish inquisition were revived.

The chairman of the Committee of Public Information, Mr. George Creel, now issues a statement to the press: "Never was a country so contraespionaged." He cites a multitude of cases where foreign-born citizens and others were frightfully abused and hounded, though they did all in their power for Uncle Sam, both in men and money. They were continually trailed by secret-service men, and permit me to add that the Government offered them no protection. The war-mad press says Mr. Creel refused to publish the truth about these good citizens, and instead invoked mob law upon their heads. An army of 250,000 officious volunteer sleuths, in addition to all the regular State and city secret-service men, combed the country, and permit me again to say that they committed outrageous invasions upon the liberties of the people.

MEMBERS OF CONGRESS SPIED UPON AND HOUNDED.

Every Member of Congress who spoke in favor of the McLemore resolution warning citizens to keep off the munition ships entering the war zone was denounced as a traitor to his country. Many famous Senators were branded as disloyal and pro-German. Cartoons were common in which the iron cross was hung on our leaders. Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Mr. Stone, of Missouri; Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, of Wisconsin (three times candidate for the nomination of President); Senator NORRIS; Senator VARDAMAN; and Senator GRONNA, all these branded as disloyal. Senator Lane, of Oregon, was hounded to his grave. Senators on the floor declared that Senator Lane was a martyr to his political convictions, his heart and constitution being broken down by the vicious assaults of his merciless critics.

THE NATIONAL SECURITY LEAGUE HIRED CHARACTER ASSASSINS.

The National Security League blacklisted me as undesirable for reelection and sent Col. Theodore Roosevelt, world famous citizen and ex-President of the United States, to Minneapolis to denounce me as a Hun who ought to be sent back to the Kaiser.

I do not believe that Roosevelt fully comprehended the pack he was training with. The colonel was very impulsive and very quick spoken. These men knew this and took advantage of it and whispered in his ear words of slander, which he loudly trumpeted abroad. It is enough to know that the now infamous National Security League sent him to Minneapolis to denounce me.

The National Security League has just been investigated by Congress, and in the hearings in part 5, page 398, we find these words by Mr. Menken, president of the organization:

Mr. Roosevelt went twice to Chicago to speak at those meetings. I had the honor of going with him. On another occasion Mr. Roosevelt went across the continent for us.

On page 411 we find that one Emerson McMillan, head of the American Light & Traction Co., with office at 40 Wall Street, New York—

Gave for special purposes always. He wanted the distinction and privilege of meeting the outlay of the league in connection with Mr. Roosevelt's trips, and he always insisted upon paying whatever money we were out of pocket for those trips, and he did it on two occasions. He gave $4,250.

So that the now infamous National Security League was sending the colonel about the country to denounce LA FOLLETTE, GRONNA, and myself, as well as others, as Huns and disloyal. It was this organization that accused 388 out of 435 Members of Congress as being disloyal. This was so brazen that Congress investigated these self-anointed and self-appointed patriots and found them to be a pack of profiteers, vultures preying upon patriotism, the very last men qualified to preach patriotism and loyalty to our citizens.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN COL. ROOSEVELT AND CONGRESSMAN ERNEST LUNDEEN.

(Copy of wire of Oct. 2.)

Hon. THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
Oyster Bay, N. Y.:

The newspapers have it that you term me a shadow Hun and that you wish to present me as a free gift to the Kaiser. The malicious prevaricators who have assailed my record have no foundation whatever for their accusations, and I am astounded that without hearing from me you should have denounced me as you did.

As you well know, I am a Spanish War Veteran; have served as private, corporal, sergeant, first sergeant, color sergeant, lieutenant, and captain in the Minnesota National Guard for 10 years; shot on a national championship rifle team in 1909; offered a regiment to protect our border in our recent Mexican trouble.

Further, my record in Congress is as follows: Voted against the war resolution, voted for volunteers, voted against conscription for foreign service. I voted for the Roosevelt volunteer divisions and have no apologies to offer for having done so, unless I should ascertain that you are not the advocate of the square deal that I supposed you were. I voted for national food control, for $20,000,000,000 in appropriations for war, the largest the world has ever known. I voted for every war measure asked for by the administration, except the war resolution and conscription for foreign service.

I have always advocated an adequate, a sane and sensible program of preparedness in State and Nation, and have so voted. Further, I offered my services in this war and stand ready to join the volunteer divisions which are authorized by Congress.

Do you still question my citizenship? Am I still in your mind a "shadow Hun"? In the belief that my enemies have misled you with twisted and distorted statements, uttering falsehoods to you in my absence, I wire these facts for your further information.

ERNEST LUNDEEN,
Member of Congress.

On October 4 Col. Roosevelt wrote me as follows:

I would be glad to see you and go over the matter in person.

I wired him that my record will stand daylight anywhere; and on October 12 the colonel wired me from Stamford, Conn., making an appointment for the following Sunday afternoon at 2.30 p. m.

On October 14 I met Col. Roosevelt at Stamford, and in the hour I spent with him there he carefully reviewed my record.

UNITED STATES HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., November 1, 1917.

Hon. THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
Metropolitan, New York City.

DEAR COLONEL: In the campaign of 1916 Woodrow Wilson went before the people on a plea for peace. His followers everywhere gave out the slogan, "He kept us out of war." It was openly charged that the Republicans would plunge us into the world war. It was loudly proclaimed that Wilson would keep us out of war. This was the Democratic campaign cry in Minneapolis. The President carried our city by a very large majority. Colonel, I considered this a mandate from the people—a command I could not disobey.

An advisory referendum resulted in a heavy majority against war. This referendum was mailed to my district from Washington March 30, seven days before war was declared, and if the postal authorities failed to deliver a portion of those letters until after the declaration of war, that was no fault of mine. Further, you will remember that the President suddenly shifted the date of the special session of Congres from April 16 to April 2, cutting short our time by two weeks. My enemies have stated to you that I conducted a referendum after war was declared. That I brand as an unqualified falsehood.

I stand foursquare for volunteers for foreign service. I believe that the President made one of the greatest mistakes of his life when he refused to accept the tender of your services to America in the world war. Had he done so, a much-needed wave of enthusiasm and support would certainly have swept the country. Should the President change his mind and finally accept your volunteer divisions, already authorized by Congress, I hope to be honored with a place in your command. I am as ready as any man to stand by my country. I can not say that I always stand by the President; he never stands still long enough.

In the summer of 1914, before the world war began, I delivered a chautauqua lecture at Fort Dodge, Iowa, in which I advocated a special session of Congress to bring about an immediate and adequate, a sane and sensible, program of preparedness. This is exactly the policy you set forth in The Foes of Our Own Household: "Had we prepared in advance we could have put a couple of million troops in the field last April and the war would have been over now. As it is, we have so far done nothing." From boyhood I have stood strong for preparedness against that evil day when America would be at war. On page 31 of your book you say: "For the last three years our foremost duty, to ourselves and to the world, has been to prepare." During the last three years I have constantly urged my fellow citizens to prepare.

My wire to you of October 2 gives my record as a soldier and veteran and Member of Congress. I carried the slogan "America first" on my campaign literature, and when my term is completed and my record is made up it will show America placed first in every vote given. I can not, however, and will not, yield my right to discuss the conduct of the war. I will enter my protest whenever inefficiency and incompetency lifts its head to trouble the people.

The above is, in substance, the statement I made to you at Stamford, Conn., Sunday, October 14, at which time we discussed my record.

For the future, it is my purpose to advocate preparedness, which you have advocated, single handed and bravely, against those timid and deceitful men who know only the desire for office and render mere "lip service" to their country.

You stand for a square deal, and I know, Colonel, that my record is such that America's greatest citizen will never question my citizenship. Whatever I am able to do for my country will be whole-heartedly given to the end of the road.

Sincerely and respectfully, yours, ERNEST LUNDEEN.

NOVEMBER 7, 1917.

MY DEAR MR. LUNDEEN: I thank you for your frank and manly letter. I understand now, as I did not before, the reasons that influenced you in your vote against the war, and while I can not agree with you, I appreciate your point of view, and I do not question your loyalty. In effect, you say that President Wilson won his campaign last year on a plea for peace, on the cry that "he kept us out of war," the charge being that the Republicans would plunge us into the world war; you say that this was the Democratic campaign cry in Minneapolis; that the President carried your city by a very large majority; and that you regarded yourself as bound by a mandate by the people. While, as I have said, I do not agree with you as to your action, I do entirely sympathize with the bewilderment of an honest man under such conditions. As you point out, the election was won under false pretenses, and a very great part of the difficulty that now confronts this Nation in arousing a proper war spirit is due to the fact that for two and a half years preceding our entry into the war our governmental leaders dulled the moral conscience of the people by arguments against our so entering it; arguments which were just as untrue and unjustifiable then as they are now. Naturally, it takes time to get people who have been misled back to the right course, the very course which they have for two and a half years been told was the wrong course.

Of course, you are absolutely within your rights in discussing the conduct of the war. It is exactly as important that there should be truthful criticism of official acts that are wrong as that there should not be untruthful attacks upon acts that are right, and you render a service to the public when you censure the gross unpreparedness of this Nation and point out where the responsibility lies and do all you can to remedy all that is inefficient and incompetent in the handling of the war. The criticism must be truthful and must not be made in a captious spirit; but I believe that in this country during the last three years even more harm has been done by the foolish persons who have protested against truthful criticism of the administration when it was wrong than by the men who have supported it when it went wrong and have opposed it only when it went right.

As for the future, our duty—your duty, my duty, the duty of all good Americans—is clear. Every measure that the administration takes for the efficient prosecution of the war we shall heartily support. We must send our troops to fight beside our allies abroad, because if we do not do so, then some time or other we shall have to fight without any allies at home. We ought to introduce at once as our permanent national policy the principle of universal obligatory military training and military service for all our young men. We must back up the liberty loans. We must fearlessly insist upon the utmost efficiency in the handling of the war. We must fearlessly criticize whatever is wrong. Above all, we must insist that there shall be no inconclusive peace; no peace that is not based upon complete and overwhelming victory. We are in this war, and we must put it through. Then we must continue our preparedness, so that never again shall we be put in a position so humiliating as that in which we have been during the last nine months. Never again must we be caught so unprepared as to be obliged to trust to the strength of others and not to our own trained strength for our safety.

Very sincerely, yours,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Hon. ERNEST LUNDEEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

FALSE PRETENSE ELECTED WILSON, ROOSEVELT SAYS—"KEPT US OUT OF WAR" STAND REASON, T. R. TELLS CONGRESSMAN.

(By a staff correspondent. Special.)

WASHINGTON, December 18.

The lack of a "proper war spirit" in the United States to-day is attributed by Col. Roosevelt to the "kept-us-out-of-war" propaganda which won President Wilson's reelection.

Col. Roosevelt no longer regards Congressman LUNDEEN, of Minnesota, as a "shadow Hun" because he voted against the resolution declaring war with Germany. Moreover, Mr. Roosevelt, now that he understands how it all happened, sympathizes with Mr. LUNDEEN, who explains that the people of Minneapolis in large numbers had voted for Mr. Wilson in the belief that he would keep them out of war. Mr. LUNDEEN considered their action a "mandate he was bound to obey."

TELLS OF SERVICE TO UNITED STATES.

Roused by what he considered an unjust attack, Mr. LUNDEEN spent an hour with Col. Roosevelt last October and set forth his position in detail. The substance of the interview is contained in letters given out by him to-night, including the fact that he is a Spanish War veteran, has served for 10 years in the Minnesota National Guard, offered a regiment to protect the border in the recent Mexican troubles, voted for every war measure, except the war resolution and conscription for foreign service, has always been an advocate of preparedness, and offered his services in the present war. Mr. LUNDEEN further remarks that he is as ready as any man to stand by his country.

"I can not say," he admits, "that I always stand by the President; he never stands still long enough."

NOW UNDERSTANDS POSITION.

"I thank you for your frank and manly letter," Mr. Roosevelt wrote in reply. "I understand now as I did not before the reasons that influenced you in your vote against the war, and while I can not agree with you, I can appreciate your point of view, and I do not question your loyalty. In effect you say that President Wilson won his campaign last year on a plea for peace on the cry that 'he kept us out of war,' the charge being that the Republicans would plunge us into the world war; you say this was the Democratic campaign cry in Minneapolis; that the President carried your city by a very large majority; and that you regarded ourself as bound by a mandate of the people.

SYMPATHIZES WITH HIM.

"While, as I have said, I do not agree with you as to your action, I do entirely sympathize with the bewilderment of an honest man under such conditions. As you point out, the election was won under false pretenses, and a very great part of the difficulty that now confronts this Nation in arousing a proper war spirit is due to the fact that for the two and a half years preceding our entry into the war our governmental leaders dulled the moral conscience of the people by arguments against our so entering it, arguments which were just as untrue and unjustifiable then as they are now."

Later, when I voted against war with Austria, the colonel suffered another outburst which was also widely published. In this he did not question my loyalty but severely attacked my vote.

I did vote against war with Austria. The Austro-Italian boundary dispute was no affair of ours. I am not interested in the real estate titles of Europe.

One organization petitioned Congress to bring about my expulsion. I was expelled from a number of organizations, one in particular because I said that I would rather follow in the footsteps of Washington and Jefferson and the giants of the Republic than follow in the footsteps of the two-by-fours who are now leading us into European entanglements.

The following verses from my brother, Corpl. David Lundeen, now serving with the American Expeditionary Forces in France, were received January 2, 1919:

HIS VOTE.

Bright shone the sun upon the hopes of his to-morrow,
Which surely power and fame to him would bring,
And all seemed destined in the course of time to augur
For him the best that gods could give or man could sing,
Then came that hour of awful crisis,
When souls were tried, and all that man holds dear
Was in the scale.
What was the right?
What was the wrong?
No man could tell,
Except by that clear guide
That God has placed in minds of men,
That each may know and feel.

For years we stood upon the brink of war.
Some said that it must be,
While others argued long, and won,
That we must stay at peace, and free
To bind the wounds of a warring world.
The people's voice, the voice of God,
Had chosen men who promised on their faith
To strive and keep the beast of war away.
And so the chief was placed where he had been,
The leader for another day.

Among the leaders of the day was he,
Who wished his Nation well,
Who lived in firm belief the people's will should rule,
And in the school of life
His faith had grown in that belief.
The passions of the hour raged strong,
And brave, indeed, was he
Who dared, in that great hour,
To stand among the few
Who listened not in quiet
To men who whispered;
But bravely asked the common man—the sovereign man—
What was his will.
But such a man was he;
And in that great and dawning hour
He stood among the leaders of his time
And made his maiden speech.
Bravely he spoke, quite unafraid.
The verdict of his people,
The verdict of his heart,
And who shall say, when passion's hour is gone,
He did not play by far the nobler part?

Let not the men to whom we do intrust
The power to act forget
The men who placed them where they are.
We must be fair, and either say
That man is generally not qualified,
Not fit to rule, or, sovereign
In his state and life,
And fit to choose the peace or strife.
No man or group of men must cast the fatal vote,
And place, without the people's choice,
The fatal coat of war
Upon the Nation.
No braver deed was ever done
By any man than he performed
When facing all the scorn and hate
Of selfish, keen, but small-souled men.
He faced them unafraid
And spoke his people's will.

To my big, brave brother, who dared, in the greatest crisis in history, to live true to the pure principles of democracy, and who told those of his colleagues who tried to cow him into deserting his principles and his people that he would see them in hell first.

DAV.

SENATOR DENOUNCES ENTIRE REPUBLICAN PARTY AS DISLOYAL.

During a special election in 1918, held in New Hampshire, Senator J. HAMILTON LEWIS, spokesman for the Wilson administration, made a speech which consigned the entire Republican Party to the traitor class.

He said that if the voters wanted to stand by the President and be loyal they must vote for the Democratic candidate for Congress, and that if they voted for the Republican candidate they would be standing by the Kaiser.

The voters paid slight attention to this appeal, however, and elected the Republican candidate to Congress, no doubt greatly to the consternation of the Senator from Illinois.

It is only one more illustration of the vile tactics adopted by the Wilson administration to bully the public and maintain control; and to boot, the Senator from Illinois himself, in the regular election in 1918, lost his seat in the Senate, and I presume now feels that the entire State of Illinois, the third largest in the Union, is supporting the Kaiser.

Behind much of the professed patriotic loyalty activities of individuals and organizations is an element of selfishness and profiteering. Men who were most vociferous in proclaiming their own patriotism and denouncing an alleged lack of it in others have been proven by the record of the war to have profited from the war to such an enormous extent that their motives can not escape being open to suspicion by all fair-minded people.

THE PHARISEES OF PATRIOTISM.

Loyalty to the United States of America is not a matter of mere lip service. There are Pharisees of patriotism as well as Pharisees of religion, men who praise our Government without stint in public while secretly they plan raids on the National Treasury through profiteering schemes.

The stakes for which war profiteers play are so huge that they can afford to spend, and do spend, enormous sums of money to control and influence every possible instrumentality for shaping public opinion favorably to their ends and purposes.

Their favorite means of molding people's opinion are the press, the pulpit, and the politician. Heavy contributions to the campaign funds of the political parties, liberal donations to church and charities, accompanied by the largest publicity, financial help for friendly newspapers without any publicity at all, are among the most approved methods used by those large financial interests who make the most profits out of war and preparation for war.

THE INDEPENDENCE OF THE PRESS.

John Swinton, former editor of the New York Herald and New York Sun, in responding to a toast on the "Independence of the Press" at a meeting of newspaper editors and writers in New York said that there was no such thing as independence of the press, that editorial writers sold themselves to the highest bidder; that they were merely mental prostitutes; that everyone present knew that newspaper writers were not hired to tell the truth, but were on the staff to write according to instructions.

THE PURCHASED PRESS.

Representative MCLEMORE, in a speech in the House on August 3, 1917, said:

A distinguished Member of the United States Senate, in discussing this highly interesting news item on the floor of the Senate a few days ago, expressed himself as follows:

"This statement is being sent out by Mr. Hoover about himself, in order that he may thereby glorify himself by having it printed in all the papers of the country. It is, I assume, sent out at Government expense."

And no doubt the papers printed it, and which recalls a very interesting item concerning many newspapers published in this country. The item referred to is taken from pages 3320 and 3321 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Sixty-fourth Congress, second session, and is as follows:

"Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, under unanimous consent, I insert in the RECORD at this point a statement showing the newspaper combination, which explains their activity in this war matter, just discussed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]:

"'In March, 1915, the J. P. Morgan interests, the steel, shipbuilding, and powder interests, and their subsidiary organizations, got together 12 men high up in the newspaper world and employed them to select the most influential newspapers in the United States and sufficient number of them to control generally the policy of the daily press of the United States.

"'These 12 men worked the problem out by selecting 179 newspapers, and then began, by an elimination process, to retain only those necessary for the purpose of controlling the general policy of the daily press throughout the country. They found it was only necessary to purchase the control of 25 of the greatest papers. The 25 papers were agreed upon; emissaries were sent to purchase the policy, national and international, of these papers; an agreement was reached; the policy of the papers was bought, to be paid for by the month; an editor was furnished for each paper to properly supervise and edit information regarding the questions of preparedness, militarism, financial policies, and other things of national and international nature considered vital to the interests of the purchasers.

"'This contract is in existence at the present time, and it accounts for the news columns of the daily press of the country being filled with all sorts of preparedness arguments and misrepresentations as to the present condition of the United States Army and Navy and the possibility and probability of the United States being attacked by foreign foes.

"'This policy also included the suppression of everything in opposition to the wishes of the interests served. The effectiveness of this scheme has been conclusively demonstrated by the character of stuff carried in the daily press throughout the country since March, 1915. They have resorted to anything necessary to commercialize public sentiment and sandbag the National Congress into making extravagant and wasteful appropriations for the Army and Navy under the false pretense that it was necessary. Their stock argument is that it is "patriotism." They are playing on every prejudice and passion of the American people.'"

From the manner in which the papers are eternally advertising, without charge, the game of Mr. Herbert C. Hoover, of Red House, Hornton Street, London, England, and publishing daily boosts of the "Miracle man" written in his own office, they—the newspapers—are evidently doing their best to stand squarely by the contract of the 25 papers alluded to in the item extended to the RECORD by Mr. Callaway and quoted above.

When we have, as at present, an income-tax law which provides for absolute secrecy of the income-tax returns of the men who profit by war, it is not easy to know just who is behind the financing of the vast stream of publicity which fills all the avenues for reaching and influencing the minds of the people favorably toward the policies most profitable to the mighty financial powers who move behind the scenes.

THE TRUE MEANING OF LOYALTY.

Loyalty to one's country means loyalty to the truest and best interests of that country. What, then, are the best and truest interests of our country? "Salus populi suprema est lex." The safety and welfare, the health and deliverance of the people is the supreme law. Safety from what? Safety from all the dangers that menace them, domestic as well as foreign. Their welfare, that all may be well with them; that peace, prosperity, and happiness may be their general condition. Their health, moral and intellectual, as well as physical, and their deliverance from all bondage to old tyrannies, ignorance, and oppression.

What will it profit the people of the United States if we are victorious in our wars against foreign foes and find ourselves an easy prey to the power of the money kings at home?

One of the wisest Americans of the nineteenth century warned us that the gravest dangers to the Republic come not from without but from within.

The United States of America has always been victorious in her wars with other nations. Her people pay no tribute extorted by the arms of any foreign conquerer, yet millions of our soldiers, invincible on the battle fields, own not a foot of their country's soil, for which they have offered their lives and shed their blood.

A hundred million people, one of whose favorite maxims of foreign policy is "Millions for defense, but not one cent for tribute," are every year meekly surrendering in enforced contribution to the monopolistic trusts and parasites more than one-half of all the wealth their toil produces.

THE ARISTOCRACY OF WEALTH.

By force and cunning this American autocracy of money levies tribute on every pound of food we eat, on every yard of cloth we wear, on every roof that shelters our heads, on every ton of fuel that warms our homes, from the milk that feeds our babes to the shroud that wraps our dead, everything must pay tribute to monopoly. They have seized the great bulk of the machinery of production. They are fast monopolizing our natural resources. These private monopolists have seized the public highways. The railroads, telegraphs, telephones, pipe lines are instruments of their power wherewith to oppress the people. They have profaned the temple of liberty; they seek to corrupt courts, control Congresses, and purchase Presidencies in order that they may give a color of sanction and legality to the most gigantic system of national robbery in the whole record of time, and in so doing have sought to make the people's Government founded solely to protect the public welfare an instrument for oppressing the people.

"That the organization of industry and commerce has come to be the principal factor in modern countries, that political power lies in the control of that organization, and that this control has, in the United States, fallen into the hands of groups of financiers who do not even pretend to use it for the advancement of the public welfare," is a most dangerous situation for any nation to be in.

The greatest curse of the world to-day is the evil alliance of private greed and corrupt government. "The children of this unholy wedlock are war, red ruin, and the breaking up of laws."

Loyalty to the United States requires that a citizen should not only fight for his country, but he should think and speak and write and work and vote for his country as well. Our Government must not only be powerful abroad, it must be just at home. In the very day and hour when the armies of the Roman Republic had conquered every country in the known world, the Government at home fell a prey to a corrupt oligarchy of wealth, and the great Roman historian Pliny mournfully records that—

It was great estates that ruined Italy.

We can not be too watchful lest America may meet a similar fate while we are engaged by the glamour of our present vast adventures in foreign war and secret diplomacy.

FREEDOM OF SPEECH AND FREEDOM OF THE PRESS.

War should be the very last resort for the adjustment of disputes. For from the moment that nations engage in war they begin to destroy liberty, not only the liberty of their foes but the liberty of their own people at home. It was well said by a wise New York lawyer at the beginning of the present war—

The first casualties of the war are free speech, free press, and the right to peaceably assemble. Yet article 1 of amendment to the United States Constitution reads: "Congress shall make no law * * * abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." (Harry Weinberger in the New York Evening Post.)

"Liberty is the mother of order, not the daughter." If America and the other nations are to have the blessing of order, peace, and prosperity they must have liberty first. Under the urgency of pretended war necessity we deprived our people of many of their dearest liberties. We apparently adopted the heresy born in the brains of the monarchists and militarists of the Old World, that a free people is not as valiant in war as are the subjects of autocratic rulers.

But all history belies this false doctrine. Everywhere in the records of the human race "the freer nation stands forth like Saul among his brethren, taller and fairer," mightier in arms as well as in arts, and so to-day, as in other days, we may safely follow the principles laid down by the champions of liberty in all ages of the world.

Says Wendell Phillips:

If there is anything that can not bear free thought, let it crack.

Blackstone, the great author of the Commentaries, says:

Every freeman has an undoubted right to lay what sentiments he believes before the public; to forbid this is to destroy the freedom of the press.

Oliver Cromwell said:

No good government has anything to fear from paper shot.

In the famous Virginia Bill of Rights, unanimously adopted June 22, 1776, is this clause:

The freedom of the press is one of the bulwarks of liberty, and can never be restrained but by despotic government.

Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations (seventh edition, p. 604), said:

The liberty of the press might be rendered a mockery and a delusion and the phrase itself a byword if, while every man was at liberty to publish what he believes, the public authorities might nevertheless punish him for publications. * * * Their purpose has evidently been to protect parties in the free publication of matter of public events and public measures, and to enable every citizen at any time to bring the Government and any person in authority to the bar of public opinion by any just criticism upon their conduct in the exercise of the authority which the people have conferred upon them. * * * The evils to be prevented were not the censorship of the press merely, but any action of the Government by means of which it might prevent such free and general discussion of public matters as seem absolutely essential to prepare the people for an intelligent exercise of their rights as citizens.

Paris Figaro says:

In Madrid I learned that there was complete freedom of the press; that, provided I did not speak about the power of the Government, religion, politics, morals, high officials, or other notables, operas, plays, or anything having to do with anything else, I was perfectly free to print whatever two or three censors nosed through.

The great crime is repression of honest thought. James Russell Lowell expressed well the spirit of the makers of our Government when he said:

Let liars fear,
Let traitors turn away;
Whatever we have dared to think,
That dare we also say.

Milton well said:

Give me the liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely according to conscience, above all liberties.

Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free. (Bible.)

Let the people know the truth and the country is safe—said Lincoln.

Having faith in these eternal principles of liberty and right proclaimed by the founders and preservers of the Republic, and by the friends of freedom everywhere, I voted against the espionage-censorship bill, and at this session I introduced a bill to repeal it.

What constitutes a State?
Not high-raised battlements or labored mound,
Thick wall or moated gate,
Nor cities proud with spires and turrets crowned;
Not bays and broad, armed ports,
Where, laughing at the storm, rich navies ride;
Not starred and spangled courts,
Where low-browed baseness wafts perfume to pride.
No! Men, high-minded men,
With powers as far above dull brutes endowed,
In forest, brake, or den,
As beasts excel cold rocks and brambles rude;
Men who their duties know,
But know their rights and, knowing, dare maintain,
Prevent the long-aimed blow,
And crush the tyrant while they rend the chain.
These constitute a State.

IF YOU CONSCRIPT MEN CONSCRIPT WEALTH.

The following letter from former United States Senator Pettigrew, of South Dakota, lays down a principle which is a great improvement on the present plan, both of financing and fighting future wars:

AUGUST 24, 1917.

Hon. ERNEST LUNDEEN,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Last February, while I was at Washington and before war was declared on the part of the United States, I published an article in one of the single-tax papers advocating that in case we went to war with Germany we should hire the men to do the fighting and draft the money, instead of drafting the men and hiring the money. This statement attracted considerable attention, and the Socialist papers have been advocating this plan ever since.

The report of the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, has been received and shows that 357,000 persons receive an income of $1,200,000,000—that is, they paid taxes upon that amount. Of course, that does not include those who did not make a report or swore their income through at less than it was; nor does it include artificial persons, and therefore the income of these 357,000 people was probably nearer $2,000,000,000 than $1,200,000,000. The ones who receive this amount of income only include incomes exceeding $3,000 per year. In other words, from all incomes are deducted $3,000, leaving a balance of $1,200,000,000 for 357,000 persons.

Now that the conscription bill has been passed and the Government has conscripted 1,000,000 men to do the fighting, I propose that Congress pass a law conscripting this $1,200,000,000 a year and pay it to the million men who are conscripted to lay down their lives in order that these people may continue, from year to year, to gather these incomes. This would give each soldier $100 per month and enable him to decently support his family, if he has one, or send it to his parents who have paid the expense of rearing him and giving him an education.

If we are going to "make the world safe for democracy," wouldn't it be a good idea to commence in the United States and, having drafted a million of our boys to do the fighting, let us draft $1,200,000,000 from our millionaires? It was the laborers of this country who produced all of this wealth. These 357,000 produced none of it. They exploited the laboring people out of it by cunning, by manipulation, with the assistance of the laws and the lawyers and the courts and the machinery of legislation and the Government.

Why not, then, during the war, appropriate this excess profit and pay the men that do the fighting? Why should we violate the Constitution and issue bonds in order to get money to pay the men who sacrifice their lives? Congress is in session and if the administration has any interest in making the world "safe for democracy" they could order their "rubber stamps" at the Capitol, the House and Senate, to pass this law conscripting wealth and it would go through at once.

I have carefully read some of the legislation that Congress has enacted recently, and, while I do not advise anyone to violate the provisions of the law, I advise everyone who has any interest in democratic institutions to urge the repeal of the law with regard to conscription and the law suppressing freedom of assembly, freedom of speech, and freedom of the press. In my opinion these laws and the law declaring war violate the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States, and the Ten Commandments, and everyone of those laws should be immediately repealed if we have any interest in the maintenance of democratic institutions.

(Signed) R. F. PETTIGREW.

AMERICA FIRST.

With the thought of "America first" ever before me, I am convinced that while we are supposed to be fighting to establish democracy abroad, we must be on the alert to see that the democracy of our great, free Republic at home is preserved inviolate. The ever-growing tendency since our entry into the war has been, and now is, to more and more abridge the constitutional rights of our own people. Concentration of authority in time of war may be a military necessity.

Responsibility for the successful prosecution of the war should be undivided so far as such singleness of responsibility is consistently possible. But this should not and does not mean that the free people of our great Republic are called upon to renounce, either temporarily or permanently, every constitutional right guaranteed to them by our form of government. It does not mean that the Constitution of the United States is to be regarded as an obsolete scrap of paper.

Many and strenuous efforts have been made in Congress and out to prevent the discussion of our war activities. I for one can not and will not yield my right to discuss the conduct of the war. I shall never vote to abridge the right of my constituents to discuss the conduct of the war. I shall enter my protest by word and vote whenever I see that incompetency and inefficiency are lifting their heads to hinder and trouble the people.

The President's avowed purpose in entering the war was "to make the world safe for democracy." It is inconsistent with our professed aims and not in conformity with our history, our Constitution, our traditions, or our American spirit to allow our rights as a free people to be insidiously curtailed. Our time-honored institutions of a free press and free speech must be maintained. No republic can long endure which does not safeguard these rights.

The abolition of slavery was one of the objects for which the Civil War was fought to a victorious conclusion. The American people must not bow their heads to the yoke of a moral serfdom more degrading in its effects than any chains of physical bondage.

Such slavery is enforced when the people of a free nation are denied the right of assembly and the privilege of discussing freely and frankly the conduct of the war, its objects, and the terms on which an early and an honorable peace may be accepted. Honest constructive criticism is no less helpful than sincere commendation. The right of the people to express either must be maintained. Otherwise our avowed intention to make the world safe for democracy will prove a hollow mockery.

Less than three years ago, on July 10, 1916, Mr. Wilson said in a speech at Detroit, Mich.:

I am one of those who believes, absolutely believes, the Virginia bill of rights, which was the model of the old Bill of Rights, which says that a people has a right to do anything they please with their own country and their own government. I am old-fashioned enough to believe that, and I am going to stand by that belief. (Page 1481, Appendix, 64th Cong., 1st sess.)

These words of President Wilson express in a nutshell the doctrine of self-determination. We must not depart from that doctrine, though Mr. Wilson sidesteps this principle in the case of Ireland. We must not renounce the right of a free people to rule their own country and government.

RUBBER-STAMP CONGRESSMEN.

In my work in Congress I have had ever before me the interests of my constituents and the high ideals for which our Nation stands. I have never voted for any measure opposed to those interests and those ideals, even though it bore the stamp of approval from the party in power. The people of Minnesota are not a "rubber-stamp" people. They want no "rubber-stamp" Congressman to represent them.

I never make the mistake of confounding blind obedience to presidential dictates with patriotism. Servility to any man, however great, is not patriotic service to the Nation. In the future, as in the past, in private or public life, my slogan remains "America first."

"Keep your mouths shut!" That is the command to-day. I challenge that command. We who are Americans will not long permit any one man to seal our lips. When we lose free speech and a free press our liberties are gone. The leaders here have lost their heads—what other conclusion can we draw. The people, and the people alone, can bring them to their senses. The 1918 election has helped in that respect, and there will be more elections in the near future. Congressmen are representatives of the people. The President is their hired man. They have a right to free speech. We are a law-abiding people. The minority are constantly yielding to the laws of the majority; but we have a right to seek their repeal, to strike them from our statute books. These critics will give their lives for our country if need be. They insist on free speech on the conduct of reconstruction. They feel that they are entitled to their opinions and that they should be consulted. And who shall say that they are wrong? The voice of the people is still the voice of God.

La Follette's Magazine says:

In times of peace the war party insists on making preparation for war. As soon as prepared for war, it insists on making war. If there is no sufficient reason for war, the war party will make war on one pretext, then invent another, possibly more effective pretext after war is on.

Before war is declared the war party assumes the divine right to denounce and silence all opposition to war as unpatriotic and cowardly.

After Congress has been bullied into a declaration of war, the politicians, the press, and the mercenaries of the war parties assume authority to deny the right of American citizens to discuss the necessity for the war or the ultimate object and purpose of the declaration of war.

To-day secret service men, United States district attorneys, United States marshals, United States court commissioners, and other Federal officials are rankly abusing their authority on every hand. People are being unlawfully arrested, thrown into jail, denied the right to employ counsel, or to communicate with their friends, or even to inform their families of their whereabouts; subjected to unlawful search; threatened, intimidated, examined and cross-examined, the most sacred constitutional rights guaranteed to every American citizen are violated in the name of democracy.

It appears to be the purpose of those conducting this procedure to throw the country into a state of terror, to coerce public opinion, stifle criticism, suppress discussion of the issues of the war, and put a quietus on all opposition.

As a climax to all this, President Wilson, in his address at Washington, June 14, gave utterance to this threat:

"Woe be to the man or group of men that seek to stand in our way. * * *"

It is time—

Says La Follette's—

for the American people to assert and maintain their rights.

An American citizen has the right to discuss the issues of this war; one citizen may believe it inevitable, another may think it regrettable; each has the same right to express his opinion. An American citizen may state his opinion that we are not justified in prosecuting this war for the purpose of dictating the form of government which shall be maintained by our enemy—or our ally—and not be subject to punishment at law. He may denounce the policy of sending our boys to die on European battle fields for annexation of territory or the payment of war indemnities or the carrying out of trade agreements, and be within his legal rights. He may express the hope that an early peace may be secured on the terms set forth by the new Russia and by President Wilson in his speech of January 22, and he can not be lawfully sent to jail for the expression of this conviction.

THEY LOWER THE AMERICAN FLAG.

For many months I have observed a United States delivery car in the court of the House Office Building carrying a British flag without any American colors. During the recent parade in Washington, while with a party of friends, we observed people carrying British flags along the line of parade. On the same day, in front of the Congress Hall Hotel, a United States Government car marked "For official use only" was flying a large British flag at the head of hood, and below, on either side, two small American flags. My secretary repeatedly took photographs, which are now in my possession, of instances of citizen's subordinating their own flag to flags of other nations, a most unhealthy sentiment in American life.

But what can you expect with a President eating from gold plate in the Buckingham Palace with the King of England and the Emperor of India, sleeping in the many-roomed palace of Prince Murat, and occupying the royal suite of Kaiser Wilhelm the Second on the George Washington, formerly a German liner. Evidently some of us have departed from plain democracy. I doubt, however, whether this man who so indulges himself will ever measure up to the great Democrat Thomas Jefferson, who rode horseback to the Capitol in the long ago. There are enough Americans who love their own flag and place it above all others, and who will in the near future sweep all foreign sentiment from America, including foreign officers on our pay rolls. We have large numbers of foreigners on our pay rolls at this very time, when everyone knows there is nothing under the sun that man can do which can not be accomplished by our own business men and officers.

I am in favor of turning these foreigners loose, cutting them off our pay rolls, and showing them the nearest way home.

During the 1916 campaign "America first and absolute neutrality" was my sole and only platform. At this time the Wilson administration was loudly shouting that if the Republicans were elected they would throw the country into war; that if they were elected we would have peace. It will be a long time before the people again put their faith and trust in the leaders who betrayed us. The truth is not in them. If the Republican Party now misuses its opportunity, surrendering the trust of the people to the great monopolies, beware of a third party electing many officials in future elections.

BRING OUR BOYS BACK HOME.

It is now time to bring our boys back home. We have a right to discuss legislation for their welfare.

"There were surely some rough spots in this war for the poor 'doughboy,' and he will never forget them. I can not help but realize that there are but two royal families in the world who never suffered nor appeared in the casualty lists. One was the royal family of Germany and the other the 'royal and reigning' families of the United States. If I am wrong, I wish some one will stop me and set me right." (Congressman (Captain) ROYAL C. JOHNSON, of South Dakota.)

As a matter of fact, the reports show that the German royal family did suffer one casualty in the war. But our own "royal and reigning" families held forth far in the rear of all battle lines. There were more generals who lost their lives during the Battle of Franklin in the Civil War than lost their lives in the entire world war. I have this on authority of the famous soldier and statesman, Gen. SHERWOOD, for many years the oldest Member of Congress. This shows that it is safer to be a general in the world war than a Member of Congress, since we lost one Member through an automobile accident.

It all goes to show that in war the only man who risks his life for his country is the doughboy on the firing line and his immediate superiors. This may have something to do with the fact that so few generals have come out of the war with any great popularity.

PRESIDENT WANTS MEMBERS OF CONGRESS HUNG.

The Washington Post of March 2, 1919, published the following news item:

Nothing serves to emphasize so strikingly the bitter feeling that has been engendered on both sides of the controversy over the league of nations as the address which was made by President Wilson to the members of the Democratic national committee at a luncheon at the White House Friday.

Not until yesterday did the news begin to leak out that the President used violent language in speaking of the opponents of the league. When members of the committee were asked about the President's remarks they at first declined to enter into particulars, several of them saying the President had used language which they did not think he would like to have repeated.

In substance, the President is reported by these informants as declaring that he despised the character of those who are fighting the league of nations, and that he "loathed their pigmy minds." He is reported as having added that he would have to consult a dictionary to adequately express his opinion of these Senators.

In a final outburst of indignation the President is reported as having said that the heads of those who are opposing the league were only fit to serve as "knots to prevent their bodies from unraveling," and that if he had his way he would hang them on a gibbet as high as heaven, but that the gibbet would not be erected in the direction of heaven.

In the same speech the President urged the Democratic national committeemen to hurry back to their States and call meetings of their State committees for the purpose of getting indorsements of the league. He asked them also to do everything in their power to persuade Republican State committees to join them in nonpartisan indorsements.

This is the most unusual piece of news concerning high officials in both the legislative and executive branches of the United States Government that has been published in many a year. No denial has been made.

Senator SHERMAN on March 10 ably replied, stating that these words constitute a felony, and that men are now in the penitentiary at Leavenworth for saying less than this of officers of the United States Government.

When a President of the United States at a secret conference of the national executive leaders of his faction in the Government declares that if he had his way he would "hang" the Members of Congress who oppose him "on gibbets as high as heaven, but pointing in the opposite direction," it is time for all good citizens to take note of whither this Government is drifting. Not only to take note but to discipline this stiff-necked autocrat.

IMPEACHMENT AND REMOVAL FROM OFFICE.

Members of Congress are gradually reaching the conclusion that the welfare and safety of the country will be best served by the impeachment and removal from office of an autocrat who recognizes neither Congress nor the law; neither Constitution nor the traditions of the Republic.

Gentlemen, I thank you for your attention. [Applause.]

APPENDIX.

Gilbert E. Roe, a learned and able member of the New York bar, has contributed the following interesting and instructive analysis of the espionage law, which I believe it would be greatly to the interest of every citizen in the United States to read and study:

REPEAL THE ESPIONAGE LAW.

The President told us yesterday that the moment the armistice was signed he took the harness off from business, but he did not say anything about taking the halter off from free speech. Industry, he tells us, is unshackled; but the embargo on ideas remains, and we may as well acknowledge that it will remain unless the people themselves take whatever steps are necessary to remove it. I venture the opinion that for more than a year past there has not been a member of this club who has dared to say what he or she thought about the most vital policies of the Government of this country in those particulars most intimately affecting the lives of all the people. The President spoke eloquently yesterday concerning the wrongs of the unfortunate people of Belgium and France, but I did not observe that he said anything about the wrongs of our own people. When the President arrives in Europe let us hope that he will learn that political prisoners have been freed over there, and this may perhaps remind him of hundreds of his fellow countrymen who are deprived of their liberty here for political offenses. He may perhaps even learn that, of all the warring countries, this is the only one that treats political offenders like common criminals—except that it treats them more harshly.

But you have asked me to speak on the espionage law. I have the law here—both the act of June 15, 1917, and the amendment of May 16, 1918. But its enumeration of the things you can not say or do or write is so long that if I took time to read the whole law I should not have time to say anything else. So I am just going to read section 3 of Title I, the section under which most, although not all, the prosecutions have been conducted, and the section which, in conjunction with Title XII, is relied upon to give the Post Office Department the right to censor your mail and suppress radical publications.

Section 3 of Title I is as follows:

"Whoever, when the United States is at war, shall willfully make or convey false reports or false statements with intent to interfere with the operation or success of the military or naval forces of the United States or to promote the success of its enemies, and whoever, when the United States is at war, shall willfully cause or attempt to cause insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny, or refusal of duty in the military or naval forces of the United States, or shall willfully obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service of the United States, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 20 years, or both."

Now, that is rather a harmless sounding law. But the way it works is this: Some pacifist says he does not believe in war; that all war is murder. Immediately a Federal district attorney is directed to take the case of this malefactor before a grand jury and have him indicted. The indictment is returned almost as a matter of course upon the demand of the law officer of the Government. Then this enemy of the people is haled before the trial jury, and right here is where you become aware of how smoothly the system works. The mind of the jury has been carefully prepared for months in advance by a controlled press to find the defendant guilty. The mails have been closed to radical and independent publications which might suggest that one had the right to opinions even in war time. The vigilante committees have terrorized the community from which the jury is drawn. The officers of the Intelligence Service, so called, of the Army and Navy have raided the homes of citizens, seizing their papers and their effects, and even their persons, without a warrant and without the least legal authority, and have thereby demonstrated that they are above the law. The patriotic organizations and the Creel bureau have flooded the country, at the expense of the people, with fantastic tales calculated to excite the passions and inflame the imagination of the ordinary citizen, until impartial judgment has become impossible on questions relating to the war.

Finally, and not the least important, a Federal judge, who holds his job by appointment of the President, often charges the jury on the law, and sometimes on the facts as well, in such way that conviction is practically certain When the humble and unsophisticated citizen, whose only offense was that he hated war and abhorred its bloodshed and its cruelties, comes out of the hurly-burly of the trial and has time to catch his breath, he finds himself duly branded as a criminal and sentenced to a punishment more severe than is often inflicted for robbery, rape, or murder.

Again, some Socialist, dreaming of the brotherhood of man, the federation of the world, when the war drums shall throb no longer, ventures to say that he sees no good in the workers of one country killing those of another. Forthwith he is apprehended as a German propagandist, as an agent of the Kaiser, and a tool of autocracy. And he gets very short shrift in the courts, if for no other reason than that he is a Socialist. I will take time here to call your attention to the case of just one Socialist, of which I speak from personal knowledge. Last summer I defended a young man before a court-martial at Camp Dix who was charged with violating the ninety-sixth article of war. The charge was as follows:

"Charge I: Violation of the ninety-sixth article of war.

"Specification 1: In that Americo V. Alexander (No. 1773144), private, Medical Detachment, base hospital, Camp Dix, N. J., did, at New York City, N. Y., on or about the 28th day of May, 1918, with intent to interfere with the successful operation of the military forces of the United States, make the following statements in the presence and hearing of various persons: 'You can get out of active service when drafted by refusing to do any military duty on ground of conscientious scruples. Your failure to register as such on questionnaire would not prevent your now asserting your rights. You might be put in the guardhouse and even court-martialed and sentenced to 20 years, but you would never be forced to serve. You might expect pretty rough treatment, but if you were a true objector and stuck they would do nothing to you. One objector at Camp Dix had been beaten, gagged, kicked, and gassed while in the guardhouse, but, having stuck, he was all right now; this matter was being kept very secret. He got a job in the base hospital, and the Army was very glad to get him to do anything, as the other objectors did not work and were only an expense,' or words to that effect.

"Specification 2: In that Americo V. Alexander (No. 1773144), private, Medical Detachment, base hospital, Camp Dix, N. J., while holding himself out to be a conscientious objector, was at New York City, N. Y., on or about the 28th day of May, 1918, active in propaganda to the prejudice of the successful operations of the military forces of the United States in that he advised, counseled, and attempted to persuade various persons to state that they were conscientious objectors when the said persons would be inducted into the military service of the United States under the provisions of the selective-service act."

This, you see, in military language, charged a violation of the espionage law. We took about a week to try the case, and substantially the entire contest centered about the truth or falsity of those charges. There were some minor charges involving the young man's temporary refusal to work while seeking advice from superior officers immediately following his arrest, thinking that it might interfere with his rights as a conscientious objector. But when reassured upon this point he promptly abandoned that position and thereafter was a model prisoner. I will say also that he accepted noncombatant service upon his induction into the service as a conscientious objector. He had managed the supply department of the base hospital at Camp Dix so effectively as to be complimented by officials at Washington and had been suggested for a commission by his commanding officer, which he had refused because he was a conscientious objector.

Now, the singular, and, so far as I know, unprecedented thing about this trial was that the court-martial found the young man "not guilty" of the charge I have just read to you, and the record which I hold in my hand so shows. But when the record came to me after it had gone to Washington and passed through the hands of a reviewing officer, it showed that the finding of the court-martial in this respect had been reversed. As the members of the court-martial, which consisted of eight officers, heard all the testimony and were the only officers who ever did hear the testimony or any portion of it, I was curious to know who it was that had decided that he could render a better decision on the facts without hearing the testimony than the members of the court-martial could who did hear it. And so I went to Washington, and after a day's inquiry from department to department I was able to locate the record in one of the innumerable offices of the War Department and was allowed even to look at it, although told that it was a private record, and that I could not take a copy of it. I did, however, examine it sufficiently under the eye of the officer, who kept both the record and myself in sight, to find out that the person who discovered that the court-martial had been all wrong in its findings was a first lieutenant named William J. Martin. I have not the remotest idea who Mr. Martin is in private life, but he seems to have signed himself "Judge Advocate" at Camp Dix, although I know he had absolutely nothing to do with the trial of the case, for I know well Capt. Lilly, of the New York bar, the judge advocate who will try it, and who tried it most ably for the prosecution. But this Lieut. Martin wrote the opinion—indorsed by the general, who, like himself, had never heard any of the testimony—which reversed the findings of "not guilty" by the court-martial; and the point of my calling your attention to this is the reason assigned for the reversal. I quote two sentences which I was able to copy from the opinion of Lieut. Martin. They are as follows:

"In view of the fact that this man is a Socialist, and, as such, opposed to all law and order, I can not see how he could have been classed as a conscientious objector. * * * The testimony shows that he is not opposed to war as a conscientious objector but is opposed for the same reason that the Russian government is opposed to it and belongs to an organization that is opposed to all forms of order and systems of government."

The word "organization" has a line lightly drawn through it, done apparently after the opinion had been filed, and the words "radical element" written above. Read either way, the statement is wholly false.

And the finding of "not guilty" of the court-martial on the charge I have read was reversed, and Mr. Alexander, whose crime appears to have been that he is a Socialist, is undergoing 20 years' imprisonment. I wonder how many other men and women are undergoing punishment in this country to-day because they are Socialists. Why, if this had occurred in Belgium during the German occupation and had been perpetrated by a German court-martial, we should dramatize it, and put it in the movies as an illustration of German atrocities. If the Supreme Court of the United States, composed of nine great judges, presumed to reverse the finding of a jury in a criminal case on conflicting testimony, it would be a ground for impeaching the members of that court.

But suppose the worst of all—assume that some citizen, misguided, if you please, had a doubt about this war's being altogether a war for democracy, or even had a suspicion that trade rivalries and ambitions between European nations were at the bottom of the war, and that, perhaps, it might have been just as well if we had kept out of it, and having such doubt or suspicion, had expressed it in a speech or in a publication—you know what would have happened to such a person without my reciting it. Such a one were lucky if he only went to prison for 10 or 20 years. Just to contrast the condition into which we have allowed ourselves to sink with conditions where at least some freedom of speech exists, I am going to read you a few sentences from Prof. Shapiro's Modern and Contemporary European History (Houghton Mifflin; $3.50). It has been off the press only a few weeks. Prof. Shapiro is known to many of you. He is an associate professor of history in the College of the City of New York and one of the foremost historians of the world. At page 338 he says:

"The Boer War was fought during the Salisbury ministry. The war was opposed by the Liberals, but was enthusiastically supported by the overwhelming majority of the English people, and in the general election of 1900 the Conservatives were returned to power on the war issue with a majority of 134."

It is fair to say that the Boer War, in the opinion of many Englishmen, involved the fate of the Empire, for if Great Britain had shown herself unable to crush the Boers it would have been a signal for every colony she had in the world to throw off her rule. But of the opposition to the war by the Liberals, of which Lloyd George was the leader, the author reports:

"They denounced it as an act of aggression against the inoffensive Boers in the interest of South African capitalists."

Think of that, a capitalistic war. I quote again:

"Large mass meetings of pro-Boers were held all over England, at which the conservative ministry was severely criticized for being the tool of interested financiers."

And nobody was prosecuted for sedition. But the author also tells us the result of this freedom of discussion, for he says, referring to a period of two or three years later:

"There was great disgust in England with the Conservative Party because of its conduct of the Boer War, and in the election of 1906 the Liberals were overwhelmingly successful."

If I should read you even a portion of what Lloyd George said about his Government during that war I suppose I might be arrested in this country to-day for slandering Great Britain.

Here is the point I wish to make very clear: The espionage law can just as well be applied in peace as in war, and just as good reasons can be given for its application in peace as in war. Practically we are not at war now, but who of the administration suggests the repeal of the espionage law? Who, when exercising arbitrary power, ever proposes to repeal the law which silences criticism of the manner in which such power is exercised? I am not concerned about the right of the soapbox orator to make a speech because he feels good while he is doing it and feels better after he has done it, although I think that is rather wholesome; but if a people are capable of self-government they must be capable of contributing some ideas of value to the Government if they are allowed free expression. If a people have self-government they must have freedom of expression respecting it, or theirs will become the worst government in the world. Far better take away the vote than take away free speech and a free press; and far better take away free speech and a free press than allow freedom to discuss only one side of a subject.

President Wilson is going abroad to-day discredited—that is, without the support of the Congress—in my opinion, because of the espionage law. Whatever could have been said for his 14 points, in behalf of their making for peace and progress, remained unsaid because of the ruthless suppression by means of the espionage law of all discussion of the causes of the war and of our objects and aims in the war. The Republicans, taking advantage of the suppression of all discussion which could be classed as antiwar, cleverly whipped to frenzy the war sentiment, and by announcing more drastic war aims than the President himself they attracted the support of the war extremists throughout the country, while the hundreds of thousands of citizens whose votes had elected President Wilson because "he kept us out of war" no longer trusted him for any purpose, and voted the Socialist or some other ticket, or did not vote at all. If it is a misfortune that the President stands to-day repudiated by the voters of the country at the recent election, it is a misfortune that has been brought about by the suppression of all discussion of the war, except that which was intended to excite and inflame the people to go to any length in its prosecution.

But, some one says, civil liberties were invaded during the time of our great Civil War and were later recovered. The comparison is entirely fallacious. Civil liberty, so far as it was denied during the Civil War, was not denied because of any espionage law. The Post Office Department never claimed or exercised the power to suppress publications during the Civil War. Indeed, the men in control of the country during that war had taken the position that the exercise of any such power by the Post Office Department would be unconstitutional. The slave-holding States had sought to invoke such power to protect themselves against a flood of antislave literature, and it had been ably argued and held by the leaders of the North that any such law would be unconstitutional. Every arrest made without warrant during the Civil War was an arrest by the military authorities. Every paper that was suppressed was suppressed by the military authorities, and in most cases President Lincoln immediately ordered the restoration of mailing privileges to such a paper. Every suppression of civil liberty during that war came from the military arm of the Government, and it had to disappear as soon as the army was disbanded. The great Milligan case, following upon the heels of the war, in which the Supreme Court decided that the military arrests had been unlawful, promptly restored the people once more to the full enjoyment of the liberties which the Constitution had been held to guarantee. But now all this is changed. The espionage law is not going to be repealed unless the people resolutely take the matter in hand; instead, it will be skillfully extended to suppress discussion which may be said to be an incitement of war, or to disturbance, or to violence. The Post Office Department will, unless the people are aroused, continue to exercise a censorship more arbitrary and irresponsible than ever existed, either in war or in peace, in any country which made a pretense of being free.

There is just one thing, in my opinion, for the citizens to do who believe in liberty and desire to preserve at least some measure of freedom; that is to organize for the repeal of this obnoxious law, and never to disband their organization or cease their agitation until the law has been discredited and repealed, and until every person convicted under it, and not shown to be guilty of some act in aid of the enemy, has been pardoned, and every fine collected under it repaid by the Government.

GILBERT E. ROE.

THE ESPIONAGE LAW.

If, on the 15th day of June, 1917, some foreign government had passed a law which provided that from and after that date the people of this country should not, for the period of the war, discuss those matters of political policy, the most vital to their welfare and to the welfare of their Government, I suppose such a law would have been opposed by the almost unanimous action of the people of this country. Yet, how do the facts differ from those I have just supposed? On the 15th day of June, 1917, the espionage law was passed. As that law has been used by the Postmaster General and interpreted and applied by the courts in this country it has prevented discussion of political policies, the most vital to the welfare of the Government and the people of this country. The effect of that law has been even worse than I have stated. It has prevented political discussion of one side of political questions, the most vital to the welfare of the people and the Government. As a result of its application falsehoods have run rampant in the press and been preached from platforms and pulpits with no one to contradict them. Half truths, which are far more dangerous than outright falsehoods, have made up the bulk of most of the information the people have been allowed to receive on subjects connected with the war. And the espionage law was passed and has been enforced by a government, as I shall attempt to show, without a shadow of right or authority so to do. It has been an act of despotism.

As a result of the successful rebellion against Great Britain which occurred in this country something more than a century and a quarter ago thirteen independent nations came into existence. Their location and certain interests that they had in common led them to establish a federation by which, for certain purposes, they were to act in concert. As a result of a protracted conference by the representatives of these different nations they finally came together in an agreement and took the name of the United States of America, and the document in which were specified the powers which these different nations delegated to the General Government was called the Constitution of the United States of America. These thirteen independent nations, however, were very jealous of their respective rights and of the rights of their people, and the powers which they gave to the General Government thus created were not very numerous and were only such as they believed necessary to be exercised by the Federal or Federated Government rather than by the several nations independently. Among the rights given to the Federal Government were those of borrowing money, regulating commerce with foreign nations, coining money, establishing post offices and post roads, declaring war, raising and supporting armies, but no appropriation for this last purpose could be made for a longer term than two years. It is readily seen that these powers and a few others which were delegated to the Federal Government were necessary to any federation of these original thirteen States which was to be permanent and effective.

In order to make it perfectly clear, however, that the Federal Government was one of strictly limited powers, powers so limited that they could never be used as an excuse or pretense for interfering with the rights of the States, or with the liberties of the people of the States, the Constitution provided (Article X of the amendments):

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people."

So that, whenever the Congress of the United States passes any law in order that that law shall be binding upon anyone and shall have any authority as law, it must be possible to turn to the Constitution of the United States and find in it the specific provision which authorizes the particular law. Now, there was a way by which the men who framed the Constitution feared that the powers of the Federal Government might be extended at some time or other so as to interfere with the liberties of the people. The people had just fought a long and hard war to establish their liberties and they did not propose to give up to one government those rights which they had fought so hard to win from another government.

Thomas Jefferson and many other patriots of his day foresaw the danger of an extension of the powers of the Federal Government on the theory that it would be implied that the Federal Government was to have the powers necessary to carry out the express powers delegated to it by the Constitution. That principle of construction was shortly after the adoption of the Constitution put in force by Chief Justice Marshall in McCullough v. Maryland (4 Wheaton, 415, 430), where he said:

"Let the end be legitimate; let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are adapted to that end, and which are not prohibited, but which consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional."

Now, there were some rights so fundamental, so dear to the hearts of the people, who had just won their independence from the tyrannical Government of Great Britain, that it was determined they should never be drawn within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government at all on the theory of implied powers or any other theory.

The most important of those rights, in the estimation of the people at that time, were freedom of speech and of the press, and freedom of religion. So it came about that before the people would accept the Constitution, which their representatives in the Constitutional Convention had framed, it was found necessary to adopt the first amendment to the Constitution. That amendment reads as follows:

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

Now, nothing could be plainer than that, or, at least, so it appeared to the people at the time it was adopted. They had given to this Government that they were forming, this federation, the power to borrow money. Well and good. But the method by which the money was to be borrowed, the person from whom it was to be borrowed, the terms upon which it was to be borrowed, and everything about it, in fact, was open to discussion by the people, from their platforms, in their homes, and in the public press, and the same thing is true of every one of the express powers which were given to the Federal Government.

Now, Congress might find it very convenient, perhaps almost necessary in a particular case, in order to borrow money, that public discussion on the subject should be suppressed, but right there is where the people showed their wisdom in demanding and getting the first amendment to the Constitution. The effect of that amendment was to say to the Federal Government: "You have the power to borrow money. You have the power to do that which is reasonably necessary and appropriate for that purpose, but you have not the power, by any device whatsoever, to limit the public in its discussion and condemnation of your plan to borrow money." Now, that is the limitation which attaches absolutely, irrevocably, and for all time under the Constitution to every express power that the Federal Government has or may attempt to exercise.

The Federal Government can raise and support armies, but it can not, by any device or means whatsoever, suppress public discussion of everything connected with the raising and supporting of armies. That means the right to condemn as well as to praise. It means the right to oppose as well as support. It means the right to ridicule as well as to eulogize. It means, in short, what free speech and free press meant at the time the first amendment was adopted. Free speech and free press at the time the first amendment was adopted included this: "The right of every individual to speak or publish his sentiments on all measures of Government without restraint, control, or fear of punishment for so doing."

That is the definition of free speech and of a free press as stated by Madison and by Jefferson, as found in the address of the Continental Congress in 1774, in the Virginia resolution of toleration of 1784, in the resolution of the Virginia convention of 1788, and as found in practically all the well considered discussion of that time. I refer here practically to Prof. Tucker's discussion of the subject as found in the notes to the first edition of Blackstone's Commentaries published in this country in 1804. But that is not all.

The old sedition law of 1798 was less obnoxious to free discussion than the present espionage law. We all know that the passage of that law was the death of the Federalist Party which fathered it, and drove out of power the administration held responsible for it, and when Mr. Jefferson became President, largely upon the issue of the sedition law, he pardoned every man convicted under it. The Congress of the United States from time to time passed measures returning the fines which had been collected under that law to the victims of it, and returned them for the declared reason that the law "was unconstitutional, null, and void." This was the attitude of Congress continuously down to 1850, at least, when the last fine previously collected under the law from Dr. Cooper was paid to his heirs, as a result of the adoption of a report presented by the Judiciary Committee of the House on January 29, 1850, by James Thompson of that committee, which provided that, in the opinion of the committee, the sedition law, "was unconstitutional, null, and void, and passed under the exercise of undelegated power by Congress; that the fine so levied ought to be refunded to the heirs and legal representatives of said Dr. Cooper, with interest thereon until paid."

The resolution passed the House March 15, 1850, the Senate July 18, 1850, and was approved. (See House Journal, 1st sess., 31st Cong., 1849–50, p. 1141; also House Journal, 1st sess., 31st Cong., p. 675.)

So it is established that any interference by the Federal Government of the United States with the people's right to publish their sentiments on measures of government without control or fear of punishment, is as unwarranted and arbitrary and as contrary to the Constitution as though it were an act done by some king or emperor from his throne in a foreign country.

I insist upon freedom of speech and of free press not merely because it is a constitutional right, but because it is a necessity under our form of government. To-day the President of the United States and our other representatives in the peace conference are assuming to act for the people of this country without knowing what the sentiment of the country is upon the most vital matters to be decided at the conference. The result of suppressing, not alone hostile criticism of the administration policies, but even of critical comment concerning them, has not only left political leaders uninformed as to public sentiment, but has prevented the formation of any well defined public opinion concerning the after-the-war problems. The country is just realizing that we have no policy about anything related to the war.

Our soldiers are daily engaged in bloody battles in the far north of Russia with the armies of that country, although we are not at war with Russia. No one seems to be able to explain why our troops are daily killing Russians and being killed by them. Ordinarily, the unlawful and outrageous policy of the administration in maintaining a hostile army in the midst of a country with which we are at peace could not stand for a day against the storm of protest which our people would raise against it. But for a year and a half, now, the people of this country have learned in the hard school of experience that it is a crime to express opinions which run counter to the administration's purpose, and so they look on silently while this shameful thing in Russia goes on.

The President and Secretary of State are over at the peace conference advocating a league of nations which shall prevent all future wars, while our Secretary of War and Secretary of the Navy are at home demanding of Congress increases in the Army and Navy which are utterly inexcusable unless it is believed we are speedily to engage in another war, as appalling as the one from which we are just emerging.

For months we have been told that "freedom of the seas" was one result which would follow from this war, whereby we and all justice-loving nations would benefit. To-day we are informed that the peace conference is not going to question Great Britain's right to dominate the seas precisely as she did before the present war.

"Secret treaties," which it was a crime to discuss, as the espionage law was construed, are now being blandly carried out by the peace conference.

And over all the proceedings of the conference hangs a shroud of mystery which makes the phrase, "open covenants," "openly arrived at," a mockery and a farce.

Our conditions at home are as unhappy as those abroad. Any one who wishes to discuss the proper financing of the present war runs a risk of being prosecuted for violation of the espionage law, since his argument may possibly discourage the purchase of liberty bonds.

The present high prices of the necessaries of life, as well as present conditions of unemployment, are largely due to the system of forcing billions and still more billions of bonds upon the public and thus withdrawing money from other enterprises and inflating the currency until normal business and normal employment have become impossible. Yet any man who dares point out the result of this system of bond sales and the manner in which wealth and war profits have been relieved from taxation, is liable to prosecution under the espionage law, as that law has been construed.

The one overshadowing fact emerging from the political and industrial disorganization at the present moment is that, while an empire or a kingdom may operate successfully under a censorship on sedition law, a representative or democratic government can not do so. After all, public opinion is looked to in this country to shape political policies, and without a well-defined public opinion political policies represent only the views of those who happen to be in office at the time. None of the men who have been shaping the political policy of this country were elected upon any issue which involved the war, except that President Wilson was undoubtedly reelected in 1916 on the issue that he had kept us out of the war. There was every reason therefore to allow the freest and fullest discussion of every matter connected with the war in order that the real will and purpose of the people might be made manifest. This course would undoubtedly have led to some confusion and disorder, but the result would have been that the hundred million people of this country would not to-day be acting the part of mere dummies, or detached spectators, while their destinies for all time are being determined by representatives who have had no opportunity to learn the popular will and who were not elected to office on the issues which they are now deciding.

As a result of the espionage law, representative government has broken down in this country. We are now reaping the first bitter fruits of the policy which has suppressed free speech and free discussion of war issues.

THE RIGHT OF THE CITIZEN TO OPPOSE WAR AND THE RIGHT OF CONGRESS TO SHAPE THE WAR POLICY.

I.

In these days whenever an American citizen presumes to question the justification, either in law or morals, of our participation in the European war, he is at once denounced by the war party and the war press as disloyal to the country.

The war party in the United States seeks to justify our entrance into the bloody conflict on the ground that it is in the interest of democracy. But every man and every woman knows that there is a struggle going on to-day in every civilized nation between democracy and autocracy.

Every nation has its war party. It is not the party of democracy. It is the party of autocracy. It seeks to dominate absolutely. It is commercial, imperialistic, ruthless. It tolerates no opposition. It is just as arrogant, just as despotic in London or in Washington as in Berlin. The American Jingo is twin to the German Junker.

In times of peace the war party insists on making preparation for war. As soon as prepared for war it insists on making war. If there is no sufficient reason for war, the war party will make war on one pretext, then invent another, possibly more effective pretext after war is on.

Before war is declared the war party assumes the divine right to denounce and silence all opposition to war as unpatriotic and cowardly.

After Congress has been bullied into a declaration of war, the politicians, the press, and the mercenaries of the war party assume authority to deny the right of American citizens to discuss the necessity for the war, or the ultimate object and purpose of the declaration of war.

To-day Secret Service men, United States district attorneys, United States marshals, United States court commissioners, and other Federal officials are rankly abusing their authority on every hand. People are being unlawfully arrested, thrown into jail, denied the right to employ counsel, or to communicate with their friends, or even to inform their families of their whereabouts; subjected to unlawful search, threatened, intimidated, examined, and cross-examined, the most sacred constitutional rights guaranteed to every American citizen are violated in the name of democracy.

It appears to be the purpose of those conducting this procedure to throw the country into a state of terror, to coerce public opinion, stifle criticism, suppress discussion of the issues of the war, and put a quietus on all opposition.

As a climax to all this, President Wilson, in his address at Washington, June 14, gave utterance to this threat:

"Woe be to the man or group of men that seek to stand in our way * * *."

It is time for the American people to assert and maintain their rights.

An American citizen has the right to discuss the issues of this war; one citizen may believe it inevitable, another may think it regrettable; each has the same right to express his opinion. An American citizen may state his opinion that we are not justified in prosecuting this war for the purpose of dictating the form of government which shall be maintained by our enemy—or our ally—and not be subject to punishment at law. He may denounce the policy of sending our boys to die on European battle fields for annexation of territory or the payment of war indemnities or the carrying out of trade agreements and be within his legal rights. He may express the hope that an early peace may be secured on the terms set forth by the new Russia and by President Wilson in his speech of January 22, and he can not be lawfully sent to jail for the expression of his convictions.

II.

It is the citizen's duty to obey the law until it is repealed or declared unconstitutional. But he has the inalienable right to fight what he deems an obnoxious law or a wrongful public policy in the courts and at the ballot box.

The citizen who believes the draft law unconstitutional may have the question tried out in the courts, or if he thinks it undemocratic and un-American he may start a campaign to-morrow for its repeal. He may work with his fellow citizens in petitioning Congress to abolish the draft system and in asking that hereafter the war shall be conducted on the volunteer plan. The citizen should begin to work now for the election of Congressmen who represent his views on the war issue. If he would preserve his liberties, his freedom of thought and speech and action, he should not be intimidated by the jeers of the jingoes and the gibes of the newspapers.

It is the suppressed emotion of the masses that causes revolution.

If, as I have sound reasons for believing, the great masses of the American people are opposed to fighting an enormously burdensome war, for an indefinite time and indefinite ends, then they must assert themselves and, keeping within their constitutional rights, voice their protests in a way that will show the character and power of their inner convictions and give momentum and overwhelming strength to the movement for real democracy.

III.

If the American people are to carry on a foreign war, on foreign soil, for foreign ends, they should work for an expression of public opinion that shall influence and compel Congress to exercise its right and discharge its duty in stating the object and defining the policy of the United States in this war.

Congress, as well as the people of the United States, entered the war in great confusion of mind and under feverish excitement. The President's leadership was followed blindly in the belief that he had some big, unrevealed plan by which peace, with glory that would exalt him before all the world, would be soon achieved.

Gradually, reluctantly, Congress and the country are beginning to perceive that a long and weary and bloody road has been laid out for us.

The sober-minded American citizen was dumbfounded when the President, in his Red Cross speech, in which he admitted that we had no special grievance of our own, announced his belief that the American people hardly yet realized the sacrifices and sufferings before them; that in comparison with the struggle into which we have now entered the Civil War seemed almost insignificant in its proportions and in its expenditure of treasure and blood.

Then Mr. Hoover was reported as saying in an address on an important occasion that this country faced a war that would probably last from two to five years, and only by the most careful measures could the United States give the allies enough foodstuffs to keep them in war with the force demanded to bring victory.

Secretary of War Baker said at this same meeting that every resource of the allies was near exhaustion when the United States entered the war. There is no way to establish permanent peace, he declared, except through exercise of the superior power of the United States.

IV.

Little by little it has been brought home to the American people that we are in this terrific world conflict not to right our wrongs, not as an aid to the allies, not to share its awful death toll and its fearful tax burden, but to bear the brunt of the war, for which we have no special grievance of our own! And this we are to do—as it now develops and is being disclosed—not for a "peace without victory" but for a "peace with victory"; that is, we are to fight for peace terms satisfactory to the allies.

Lord Derby said the war will not end until America gets into it as though she were fighting alone and that it was likely to last three years yet. And this was the opinion emphatically expressed by the French mission.

Mr. Arthur Balfour, the British foreign secretary, was in this country, it is said, longer than any previous person holding that position has been away from London since the Napoleonic wars. He is an accomplished diplomat. He concluded his important and difficult mission with the utmost smoothness and tact. The only impression he left upon the American public, other than that of an agreeable man of culture, was that he was relying on the United States to prosecute a long, hard war. "Five million men! Fight, fight, fight," were the slogans he left for us.

V.

On his departure Mr. Balfour was said to have realized the dream of his life—that of "a closer sympathy between the two great branches of the English-speaking public."

I have no inside information, but in a work entitled "War and Democracy," published in 1917 by Doubleday, Page & Co., Mr. Balfour says:

"If there is to be any effective sanction behind the desire of the English-speaking peoples to preserve the world's peace and free development of the nations, that sanction must consist largely in the potential use of sea power.

"To me it seems the lesson to be drawn from history by those who love peace, freedom, and security is not that Britain and America should be deprived, or should deprive themselves, of the maritime powers they now possess, but that if possible those powers should be organized in the interests of an ideal common to the two States, an ideal upon whose progressive realization the happiness and peace of the world must largely depend."

From which diplomatic language it may be fairly inferred that it is Mr. Balfour's best judgment that while heretofore Great Britain has ruled the seas and controlled trade as her own special privilege and prerogative, that now when that supremacy is threatened it would be well to enter into an agreement according to which, from now on, Great Britain and the United States should rule the seas together.

The question is, Are we to sacrifice millions of our young men—the very promise of the land—and spend billions and more billions, and pile up the cost of living to the point of starvation, and "fight, fight, fight"—without any special grievance of our own—for objects such as the English foreign secretary seems to have in mind and such as the Paris trade conference appears carefully to have considered?

Shall the already fearfully overburdened people of the United States conduct a war for any objects not openly stated and defined?

VI.

The world would not be at war to-day except for the survival of the despotism and tyranny which permits governments to conduct foreign affairs in secret and leaves the determination of war and of foreign policies generally to diplomacy.

The usurpation on the part of the Executive of the conduct of foreign relations, which results in Congress blindly and ignorantly following the course dictated by the President, instead of itself declaring the war policy, which the best expounders of the Constitution have held that Congress had the right to do, is fundamentally the cause of our being in this war to prolong it, instead of exercising our great power to bring about a just settlement which the people of the United States and of the world are longing for, and have the right to expect.

And so I say if we are not to be dragged through years of war to maintain imperialism and exploitation, the people must unite in a campaign along constitutional lines for the conclusion of the war on a just basis.

VII.

And it is time to end the vague and shifting declaration of our plans and purposes, which under President Wilson ranges from resentment to interference with our trade on the high seas, one day to prescribing the form of government for our enemy the next, and finally vaguely extended to making every part of "the world safe for democracy"—excepting our own country.

In the grave matter of determining whether we shall have a drafted or a volunteer Army, the contradictory plans of the administration have created the greatest confusion in the minds of the millions of young men directly involved, leaving them uncertain as to their future and muddled as to their obligations and duty. The entire Nation has been plunged into a needless state of unrest from which it can be extricated only by a clear and definite declaration of war policy.

Our national situation to-day is like it was in 1848, when Lincoln, then a Member of the House of Representatives, speaking in opposition to the Mexican War then in progress, described President Polk's state of mind as follows:

"All this shows that the President is in no wise satisfied with his own positions. First he takes up one, and in an attempt to argue us into it he argues himself out of it, then seizes another and goes through the same process, and then, confused at being able to think of nothing new, he snatches up the old again, which he has some time before cast off. His mind, taxed beyond its power, is running hither and thither, like some tortured creature on a burning surface, finding no position on which it can settle down and be at ease."

In this same speech Lincoln criticizes President Polk because he does not state in his message when he expects the war to terminate. He said:

"At its beginning Gen. Scott was by this same President driven into disfavor, if not disgrace, for intimating that peace could not be conquered in less than three or four months. But now, at the end of 20 months * * * this same President gives a long message, without showing us that as to the end he himself has even an imaginary conception. As I have said, he knows not where he is. He is a bewildered, confounded, and miserably perplexed man. God grant he may be able to show there is not something about his conscience more painful than his mental perplexity."

Writing to a friend who had objected to his opposition to Polk in relation to this power of the President in war, Lincoln said:

"The provision of the Constitution giving the war-making power to Congress was dictated, as I understand it, by the following reasons: Kings had always been involving and impoverishing their people in wars, pretending generally, if not always, that the good of the people was the object. This our convention understood to be the most oppressive of all kingly oppressions, and they resolved to so frame the Constitution that no man should hold the power of bringing this oppression upon us. But your view destroys the whole matter, and places our President where kings have always stood."

VIII.

Lincoln is not the only high example of American statesmen who opposed their Government in war and who consistently continued their opposition after war was declared, denouncing it until it was ended.

On the 6th of November, 1846, at Faneuil Hall, Boston, Daniel Webster denounced the Mexican War. It had been in progress since April 9, 1846, when the first blood was shed, followed by a declaration by Congress that a state of war existed, which passed on the 11th day of May, 1846.

Many battles had been fought and won and our victorious armies were then in the field on foreign soil.

We had not then fallen upon times when the new freedom, as interpreted by Woodrow Wilson, made it an act of treason for an American citizen to declare his convictions upon the acts and policies of a Federal administration in bringing on and prosecuting a war, after that war had been declared and while it was in progress.

Free speech had not then been suppressed. The right of the people to assemble and state their grievances was still an attribute of American freedom.

The war was on, but Daniel Webster did not hesitate to denounce it. He said:

"The Mexican War is universally odious throughout the United States, and we have yet to find any Sempronius who raises his voice for it."

Webster did not regard it as treasonable, after war had been declared, and while our troops were fighting their way toward the Mexican capital, to raise the question as to whether the war was either just or necessary.

He said:

"It is not the habit of the American people, nor natural to their character, to consider the expense of a war which they deem just or necessary; but it is their habit, and belongs to their character, to inquire into the justice and the necessity of a war in which it is proposed to involve them."

Mr. Webster discussed the Mexican War at Springfield, Mass., September 29, 1847, and again while the war was in progress he did not hesitate to express his disapproval in plain language.

"We are," he said, "in my opinion, in a most unnecessary, and therefore a most unjustifiable war. I hope we are nearing the close of it. I attend carefully and anxiously to every rumor and every breeze that brings to us any report that the effusion of blood, caused, in my judgment, by a rash and unjustifiable proceeding on the part of the Government, may cease."

In the course of this address Webster stated that the law of nations required "that the war should not be waged except from necessity and for just and important rights of the country.

"But war does now exist and what is our duty?" asked Webster. Replying to his own question at length he said he hoped the majority in the next House of Representatives would be opposed to war and that while a high and delicate regard must, of course, be had for the honor and credit of the Nation, that "if the war should become odious to the people, if they shall disapprove the objects for which it appears to be prosecuted, then it will be the bounden duty of their Representatives in Congress to demand of the President a full statement of his objects and purposes, and if those purposes shall appear to them not to be founded in the public good, or not consistent with the honor and character of the country, then it shall be their duty to put an end to it, by the exercise of their constitutional authority."

"If Congress," said Webster in the course of this illuminating address, "in whom the war-making power is expressly made to reside, is to have no voice in the declaration or continuance of war, if it is not to judge of the beginning or carrying it on—then we depart at once from the Constitution."

IX.

Henry Clay came from his voluntary retirement in the seventy-first year of his age to proclaim to the American public his disapproval of the Mexican War. Before a great concourse of people assembled at Lexington, Ky., on the 13th of November, 1847, he characterized it as "an unnatural war."

Every utterance of his noble address is applicable to our national situation in 1917. "Must we blindly continue the conflict," he asked, "without any visible object, or any prospect of a definite termination?" In the course of his argument that Congress must necessarily possess the authority, at any time, to declare for what purposes war shall be further prosecuted, he said:

"If it be contended that war having been once commenced, the President of the United States may direct it to the accomplishment of any object he pleases, without consulting and without any regard to the will of Congress, the convention will have utterly failed in guarding the Nation against the abuses and ambition of a single individual. Either Congress or the President must have the right of determining upon the objects for which a war shall be prosecuted. There is no other alternative. If the President possess it and may prosecute it and may prosecute it for the objects against the will of Congress, where is the difference between our free Government and that of any other nation which may be governed by an absolute czar, emperor, or king?"

Note one other statement by Clay in this address so applicable to our own time:

"Here, fellow citizens, I might pause, having indicated a mode by which the Nation, through its accredited and legitimate Representatives in Congress, can account for what purposes and objects this war shall be longer prosecuted, and can thus let the whole people of the United States know for what end their blood is to be further shed, and their treasure further expended, instead of the knowledge of it being locked up and concealed in the bosom of one man. We should no longer perceive the objects of the war varying from time to time, according to the changing opinion of the Chief Magistrate charged with its prosecution. But I do not think it right to stop here. It is the privilege of the people in their primary assemblies, and of every private man, however humble, to express an opinion in regard to the purposes for which the war should be continued, and such an expression will receive just so much consideration and consequence as it is entitled to, and no more."

Charles Sumner also opposed the Mexican War with his power and eloquence, and appealed to his fellow countrymen to work for its early conclusion.

X.

Lincoln, Webster, Clay, Sumner—what a galaxy of names in American history! They all believed and asserted and advocated in the midst of war that it was the right, the constitutional right, and the patriotic duty of American citizens after the declaration of war, as well as before the declaration of war, and while the war was in progress, to discuss the issues of the war and to criticize the policies employed in its prosecution and to work for the election of Representatives opposed to prolonging war.

The right of Lincoln, Webster, Clay, Sumner to oppose the Mexican War, criticize its conduct, advocate its conclusion, is exactly the same right and privilege as that possessed by each and every American citizen in our land to-day in respect to the war in which we are now engaged. Their arguments as to the power of Congress to shape the war policy and their opposition to the usurpation of power on the part of the Executive are potent so long as the Constitution remains the law of the land.

English history offers no less illustrious examples of opposition to war in which the country is engaged. John Bright consistently fought the Crimean War with all the power of his great personality and noble mind. Lloyd George won fame for his aggressive stand against the Boer War. Every American schoolboy knows how Pitt and Fox and Burke opposed the war against the American Colonies.

XI.

The Duke of Grafton, in the House of Lords, October 26, 1775, speaking against voting thanks to British officers and soldiers, after the battles of Lexington and Bunker Hill, declared:

"I pledge myself to your lordships and my country that if necessity should require it, and my health otherwise permit it, I mean to come down to this House in a litter, in order to express my full and hearty disapproval of the measures now pursued and as I understand from the noble lords in office, meant to be pursued."

On this same occasion Mr. Fox said:

"I could not consent to the bloody consequences of so silly a contest, about so silly an object, conducted in the silliest manner that history or observation had ever furnished an instance of, and from which we are likely to derive poverty, misery, disgrace, defeat, and ruin."

Lord Chatham, November 18, 1777, spoke as follows regarding the war between England and the American Colonies:

"I would sell my shirt off my back to assist in proper measures, properly and wisely conducted; but I would not part with a single shilling to the present ministers. Their plans are founded in destruction and disgrace. It is, my lords, a ruinous and destructive war; it is full of danger; it teems with disgrace, and must end in ruin. * * * If I were an American as I am an Englishman, while a foreign troop was landed in my country I never would lay down my arms! Never! Never! Never!"

XII.

These are but a few of the many statesmen and eminent publicists whose strong declarations I shall later cite as examples and precedents of the right of free American citizens freely to express their opposition to war and of the right and duty of the lawmaking body to shape the war policy.

In conclusion, let me repeat what I have already suggested that American citizens have the right to begin a campaign to-morrow to elect United States Senators and Members of the House of Representatives who will represent them in securing the repeal of obnoxious laws, in declaring the definite objects for which this war is prosecuted and the conditions upon which it can be terminated at an early hour with honor and credit to the Nation.

God reigns and constitutional rights will be maintained. This is still the Government of the people.

ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE.

IS THE DRAFT LAW CONSTITUTIONAL?—USE OF NATIONAL GUARD ON FOREIGN SOIL RAISES THE ISSUE.

(By Hannis Taylor in an Address to the Congress of the United States.)

[Mr. Hannis Taylor, the author of the address that follows, was formerly United States minister to Spain and served as counsel of United States Government before Spanish Treaty Claims Commission and before Alaskan Boundary Commission. He is the author of works on the "Origin and Growth of the English and American Constitutions" and of a number of works on jurisprudence. He is a recognized authority on international questions. The editor of this magazine differs with the writer's views as to the necessity of the war, but he regards his able discussion of the constitutionality of the draft for the conduct of a foreign war, of very great importance.]

GENTLEMEN: At this critical juncture it is the patriotic duty of every American citizen to do all in his power to promote the success of the registration to take place on June 5, 1917, under the provisions of the wise and constitutional act approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the military establishment of the United States."

Despite the fact that that act—whose avowed purpose is "to draft into the military service of the United States, organize, and officer the unorganized militia" of the United States—was passed under that provision of section 8, article 1 of the Constitution, which declares that "the Congress shall have power * * * to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions," certain ill-informed and ill-disposed persons are circulating the report that the National Militia when so organized for national defense is to be sent out of the country for service abroad, in defiance to the express mandate of the Constitution to the contrary. That report, to which the terms of the act in question give neither color nor countenance, is creating an alarm that will surely reduce the registration unless the erroneous impression is corrected in advance of it. On the other hand, such false impression is doing a great injustice to our allies, who are looking for military aid to a source from which it can not possibly come under our Constitution as it now stands.

Certainly, every citizen of this country should know, first, that under our Constitution no American soldiers can be sent abroad even by the authority of Congress, except those composing the "Regular Army"; second, that the ranks of the "Regular Army" can only be swelled "by voluntary enlistment." As I have devoted the best years of my life to the study of such questions, I deem it my duty to restate, in a narrow compass and in an humble spirit, the basic constitutional principles underlying our system of military organization, as those principles have been settled for at least 90 years.

ENGLISH MILITARY SYSTEM REPRODUCED BY THE FEDERAL CONVENTION OF 1787.

That convention did all in its power to incorporate into our Federal Constitution the English military system which, in 1787, consisted, first, of a regular or "nonconstitutional force" made up of a standing Army and Navy; second, of an emergency or "constitutional force" called the militia, a force for national defense that had existed for a thousand years. In the words of the Encyclopedia Britannica (ninth edition): "The Militia of the United Kingdom consists of a number of officers and men maintained for the purpose of augmenting the military strength of the country in case of imminent national danger or great emergency. In such a contingency the whole or any part of the militia is liable, by proclamation of the sovereign, to be embodied, that is to say, placed in active service within the confines of the United Kingdom." The county military system, known as the militia, survived the Norman conquest unimpaired. (Stubbs, Select Charters, pp. 153–4.) By the great statute of I Edw., Edw. III, chapter 5, it was provided that the militia should only be used at home for national defense, "as has been used in times past for the defense of the realm." In 1786, the year before the Federal convention met, was passed the statute of 26 Geo. III, chapter 107, section 95, concerning the militia, in which it was specially provided that "neither the whole or any part, shall be ordered out of Great Britain." Mr. Dicey, one of the most eminent of modern English commentators, says: "The militia is the constitutional force existing under the law of the land for the defense of the country. * * * Embodiment, indeed, converts the militia for the time being into a regular army, though an army, which can not be required to serve abroad." (The Law of the Constitution, pp. 287–8.)

REGULAR OR STANDING ARMIES IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

England never had a military force that could be sent abroad until William the Conqueror brought such a force with him in the feudal host of professional soldiers who accompanied him. It was the duty of that host, which simply supplemented the ancient constitutional force known as the militia, "to attend the King in war, within and without the realm, mounted and armed during the regular term of service." But as that regular term of service only lasted for 40 days, it led to the device of shield money, which produced a fund with which the Crown could employ mercenary and professional soldiers who could be kept abroad so long as needed. Out of that purely voluntary system of paid military service was evolved the standing army of England as it existed at the date of the American Revolution; and upon the same general basis vested the standing and professional naval force of England at that time. In order to enable this Republic to maintain a standing army and navy like that of England the convention of 1787, after giving to Congress the power "to declare war," provided that "the Congress shall have power * * * to raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years; to provide and maintain a navy; to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." Those three provisions, grouped together as a connected whole, relate solely and exclusively to one subject matter—the creation, maintenance, and government of the Regular Army and Navy of the United States, which has always been maintained "by voluntary enlistment."

THE NATIONAL MILITIA AS DEFINED BY CONGRESS AND THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

It is simply impossible to confuse "the Regular Army" of the United States with that force called by the Supreme Court "the reserved military force or reserve militia of the United States." (Presser v. Illinois, 116 U. S., 252.) In order to enable Congress to create such a force for national purposes it was provided that "The Congress shall have power * * * to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions; to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the State, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress." Article II of the amendments provides: "A well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed." These three closely interlinked clauses, all relating to a single subject matter, have been luminously expounded by the Supreme Court in U. S. v. Bevans, 3 Wheat., 336; Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat., 1; Martin v. Mott, 12 Wheat., 19; Luther v. Borden, 7, How., 1; Dynes v. Hoover, 20 How., 65; Crandall v. Nevada, 6 Wall., 35; Texas v. White, 7 Wall., 700; Presser v. Illinois, 116 U. S., 252. The term "militia," a technical term, a term of art with a history, is used four times in the Constitution and always in the same sense. When in the trial of Burr it became necessary for Chief Justice Marshall to define the meaning of the term "levying war" as used in Article III, section 3, he said: "But the term is not for the first time applied to treason by the Constitution of the United States. It is a technical term. It is used in a very old statute of that country whose language is our language, and whose laws form the substratum of our laws. It is scarcely conceivable that the term was not employed by the framers of our Constitution in the sense which had been affixed to it by those from whom we borrowed it." See to the same effect Rhode Island v. Mass., 12 Pet., 657; Income Tax cases, 157 U. S., 429; U. S. v. Wong Kim Ark, 169 U. S., 279. Therefore when the framers took from the English constitution the technical term, the term of art, "militia," they took it with its thousand years of history behind it, attesting the fact that it is a force for national defense that can never be "taken out of the realm" for service in a foreign country. In that sense the term "militia," four times repeated, was embodied in our Federal Constitution. And in order to put it forever beyond the power of Congress to impair the ancient constitutional exemption from service abroad the convention, employing the masterful pen of Gouverneur Morris, provided that the new Government, with strictly limited powers, could only organize the national militia for three purposes: "To execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." By those limitations all other uses were expressly excluded with all the force that language can impart. The moment the exemption of the militia from service abroad was thus embodied in the Constitution, Congress was forever deprived of all power over the subject. It is hardly necessary to add here that the fact that the omnipotent Parliament of Great Britain, which changes her constitution every time it passes an act, can take away such an exemption from the militia in that country, has no relevancy whatever to conditions in our own.

In Presser v. Illinois (116 U. S., 252) the court went to the heart of the whole matter when, in defining "the reserved military force or reserve militia of the United States," it said: "It is undoubtedly true that all citizens capable of bearing arms constitute the reserved military force or reserve militia of the United States as well as of the States; and, in view of this prerogative of the General Government, as well as of its general powers, the States can not, even laying the constitutional provision in question out of view, prohibit the people from keeping and bearing arms, so as to deprive the United States of their rightful resources for maintaining the public security, and disable the people from performing their duty to the General Government." Thus it has been settled by the Supreme Court that under the clause in question, the "General Government" of the United States, possesses, entirely apart from the States, "the reserved military force or reserve militia of the United States," consisting of "all citizens capable of bearing arms," whose right to bear arms can not be impaired by any law of any State.

The definition of the National Militia given in Presser v. Illinois, is closely followed in the national defense act of June 3, 1916, whose section 57 reads as follows:

"Composition of the militia: The militia of the United States shall consist of all able-bodied male citizens of the United States and all other able-bodied males who have or shall have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, who shall be more than 18 years of age and, except as hereinafter provided, not more than 45 years of age, and said militia shall be divided into three classes—the National Guard, the Naval Militia, and the Unorganized Militia."

The act of May 18, 1917, which is simply a supplement or extension of the act of June 3, 1916, amplifies in its section 2 the foregoing definition of the National Militia in this form: "Such draft as herein provided shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens or male persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 21 and 30 years, both inclusive, and shall take place and be maintained under such regulations as the President may prescribe not inconsistent with the terms of this act. Quotas from the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, or subdivisions thereof, shall be determined in proportion to the population thereof, and credit shall be given to any State, Territory, District, or subdivision thereof, for the number of men who were in the military service of the United States as members of the National Guard on April 1, 1917, or who have since said date entered the military service of the United States from any such State, Territory, District, or subdivision, either as members of the Regular Army or the National Guard." The act of May 18, 1917, takes all possible pains to proclaim, first, that all soldiers drafted and organized under it are absolutely separate and distinct from "the Regular Army" of the United States; that they are in the strictest sense of the term National Militia raised in an emergency for national defense.

THE POWER OF CONGRESS TO DRAFT OR CONSCRIPT THE NATIONAL MILITIA FOR NATIONAL DEFENSE.

When in the great case of Martin v. Mott (12 Wheat., 19) a unanimous court, speaking through Mr. Justice Story, was called upon to construe the act of 1795, which first organized the National Militia for national defense, it was said, "For the more clear and exact consideration of the subject it may be necessary to refer to the Constitution of the United States and some of the provisions of the act of 1795. The Constitution declares that Congress shall have power 'to provide for calling forth the militia, to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions'; and also 'to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States.' In pursuance of this authority the act of 1795 has provided 'that whenever the United States shall be invaded or be in imminent danger of invasion from any foreign nation or Indian tribe it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the State or States most convenient to the place of danger or scene of action as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion, and to issue his order for that purpose to such officer or officers of the militia as he shall think proper.' And like provisions are made for the other cases stated in the Constitution." After giving in that way all possible emphasis to the fact that the National Militia can never be used except for the specific purposes stated in the Constitution, the court said that "the power to provide for repelling invasions includes the power to provide against the attempt and danger of invasion, as the necessary and proper means to effectuate that object. One of the best means to repel invasion is to provide the requisite force for action before the invader himself has reached the soil." When near the close of the War of 1812 the Secretary of War proposed to compel the service of the National Militia by conscription, there was a strong protest from certain quarters upon the ground that such a procedure would be unconstitutional. See Dwight's History of the Hartford Convention, page 359. But when during the Civil War such a measure was again proposed it was acted on and the result accepted without protest as constitutional, as it undoubtedly was.

EXEMPTION OF NATIONAL MILITIA FROM SERVICE ABROAD ABSOLUTE AND INCONTESTABLE.

From what has now been said, it clearly appears that the reserved force of the United States, four times described in the Constitution as the "militia," can be called forth and organized by Congress either upon the volunteer plan or by forcible conscription. But it is equally clear that when so called forth and organized the militia can only be used for one of the three purposes rigidly defined by the Constitution, to wit: "To execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." Its application to any other purpose—notably service abroad—would be too obviously unconstitutional to justify discussion. The exemption of the National Militia to be drafted under the act in question from service abroad is self-evident and undebatable. If either the President or Congress, one or both, should attempt to ignore such constitutional exemption, any member of the militia threatened with transportation abroad could be immediately discharged from such service by any judge on habeas corpus. And more, any executive magistrate who might dare to ignore the constitutional exemption in question would be quickly admonished by the House of Representatives that it is ready with that "two-handed engine at the door that smites once and smites no more."

SHALL OUR HANDFUL IN FRANCE FROM THE REGULAR ARMY BE ABANDONED OR STRENGTHENED?

This is not the time for self-deception. We have no right to mislead either our allies or ourselves. The incontestable facts staring us in the face are these: First, that only the Regular Army can be sent abroad; second, that the Regular Army can be augmented only "by voluntary enlistment." The only possible chance of obtaining additional soldiers for service abroad under the draft act of May 18, 1917, is through that part of it which provides that "the President is further authorized to raise and maintain by voluntary enlistment, to organize, and equip not to exceed four Infantry divisions, the officers of which shall be selected in the manner provided by paragraph 3 of section 1 of this act: Provided, That the organization of said force shall be the same as that of the corresponding organization of the Regular Army: And provided further, That there shall be no enlistments in said force of men under 25 years of age at the time of enlisting: And provided further, That no such volunteer force shall be accepted in any unit smaller than a division."

With all possible respect, I earnestly contend that the Congress should not commit that grave subject to the Executive. It is the constitutional function of Congress not only "to declare war," but to direct and control all of its graver operations. No part even of the Regular Army should ever be sent abroad except by its mandate. The Congress should assume the entire responsibility and determine whether the handful of Regular troops now on the way to France should be augmented or practically abandoned. That is the question of questions that should not be delayed for a moment longer. It involves no less than moral dignity the good faith of this Nation.

DARROW MAKES PLEA FOR GENERAL AMNESTY.

(By Clarence S. Darrow.)

The prosecution of the war called forth a large amount of legislation. In the main, these laws were such as are usually passed in times of war. The rules for war are not the same as the rules of peace, and neither with or without the war is the conduct of people the same.

It is perfectly obvious that laws that are meant for the prosecution of war may be the most mischievous in times of peace. This country was formed on the idea of broad religious and political tolerance and a wide freedom of speech and the press. A large part of our progress and welfare in the past is due to this freedom and toleration. If laws passed during the war are to be applied to times of peace, the governing power will be able to make freedom of speech a mockery.

Nothing is perfect, and no thinking person would claim that our Constitution, our laws, or our institutions should not be changed and modified as time goes on. It is of the first importance to progress that there shall be free discussion of all political and social schemes that might result in change. To say that we should take institutions as they are, put on the lid, and refuse to open discussion, would, of course, mean that the present is good enough and the future should be no better. If it were wise to do it now, it would have been equally wise in the Middle Ages or any period of the world's history. Persecution and witchcraft and despotism would then be as common as in the Dark Ages.

When peace is finally declared, the first and most important act of Congress should be to take off the lid, remove the restriction of free speech and a free press.

The policy of organized labor has always been to allow the widest freedom of debate. Organized labor is always looking toward the future. Its effort is to improve the conditions of those who need it most, change laws and institutions wherever needful that the common lot may be easier. This can not be done except by free debate. Of all the people in the world the trade-unions are the last ones that can permit any permanent abridgment of the freedom of speech and the press. Organized labor has always made itself clearly understood upon this issue, which is of the first importance to the development of individuals.

Our present laws, if enforced against labor organizations and those who desire social change, would result either in sending most of the leaders to jail or in revolution. Of course, they were never meant for any such purpose. They were meant for the war and the war only, and the danger is that people may forget their purpose and let them linger to obstruct the world after the need is gone.

If under free open discussion the majority of the people in this country want something, they ought to have it. If the world can not stand up against bolshevism and meet it by free speech and a free press, then bolshevism has the right to rule. It would then be time to try it out and see if it can succeed.

To smother any opinion is at once a confession that it may be true and that it can not be met by open discussion and fair argument. Our institutions have cost too much to permit them to be destroyed on account of the war. It will not do to make a war fought for democracy result in autocracy. There can be no danger from this if the question is understood and the people act promptly to repeal war legislation when the war is done.

If it is right to repeal war legislation, it is also equally just and pressing that a general amnesty should be given to all of those who are now suffering under this sort of legislation. Everyone knows that large numbers of these men are conscientious, and it is intolerable to think that men are in jail on account of their conscience when there is no longer need that they should stay.

The labor unions did their part in this war. Without them it would not have been possible to bring the United States Government that solid support that made victory possible. As they were patriotic in times of war, it is equally certain they will be patriotic in times of peace, and from the nature of things they are the ones who first of all should demand the repeal of this legislation and that amnesty be given to all these prisoners. This does not mean that the laws were wrong or that it was not necessary to send conscientious men to prison during the war, but it does mean that the purpose of the war has been served, and there was no thought or feeling of vengeance in any of these prosecutions, but only the purpose to protect the country when danger threatened it from a foreign foe.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 11, 1918.

Hon. ERNEST LUNDEEN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. LUNDEEN: The Civil Service Commission has certified to this bureau the list of eligibles attached hereto for income-tax deputy collectors, inspectors, and agents.

In order that the department may have all information it may properly consider under civil-service rules and regulations in connection with appointments made from this register, I would thank you to give me the benefit of any information in your possession as to the character, fitness, and loyalty of the persons named on this list.

Your early advice will be appreciated.

Sincerely, yours,

DANIEL C. ROPER,
Commissioner.

APRIL 12, 1918.

DANIEL C. ROPER,
Commissioner Treasury Department, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ROPER: Your letter of April 11, concerning the list of eligibles for income tax deputy collectors, inspectors, and agents has received my careful attention.

I notice you inquire as to the character, fitness, and loyalty of the persons named. You have underscored the word loyalty with red ink. The people of Minneapolis are all loyal, and I deeply resent any person or department questioning the loyalty of any person or voter in my district. If it has come to pass that a native-born American citizen must pass in review and be scrutinized by department heads to establish his loyalty, then we have certainly come to a sad pass in this country.

As far as I know each one of these men stand well in the community, and are fitted for the position, and I want it strictly understood that the loyalty of every Minneapolis man is unquestioned, at least no one dares to question their loyalty in person.

Yours, very truly,

——— ———.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, April 15, 1918.

Hon. ERNEST LUNDEEN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. LUNDEEN: I have your letter of the 12th in reply to mine of the 11th concerning the civil-service list of eligibles for income-tax agents, inspectors, and deputy collectors.

I had hoped that my inquiry of you and other Members would not be received as a reflection on the loyalty of citizens in any community, but would enlist assistance in safeguarding the governmental service against any persons whose views might not make for solidarity in this crucial period of our country's history.

I am sure I can depend upon you to cooperate with me in this regard, and hope that you will promptly transmit to me any information which may come to you reflecting upon officers or employees already in the service or who may be properly considered by me in connection with prospective appointments.

Sincerely, yours,

DANIEL C. ROPER, Commissioner.

APRIL 17, 1918.

Mr. DANIEL C. ROPER,
Treasury Department, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ROPER: Your letter of April 15 in reply to mine of April 12 received.

We all are willing to safeguard the Government. We are all granting unheard-of powers to Government departments. We are all voting unheard-of sums of money to prosecute this war. But many of us are getting exceedingly tired of 50 per cent of the people calling the other 50 per cent traitors, or looking upon everybody with suspicion until proved innocent, and unless they shouted loudly for war before our entry into the great conflict.

The people in our various districts are loyal to the core, and let no man question their loyalty. Every citizen, as well as every official, will feel it his duty to report any real disloyalty anywhere, but, my dear sir, constructive criticism of the Government is not disloyalty; if so, then easily one-half of the congressional seats will be vacant.

The American people have been very patient with our many shortcomings here at Washington, and the least we can do is to honor them all as true American patriots. I think we understand each other fully now.

Sincerely, yours, ——— ———

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to call your attention to what this resolution does. In the first place, the bonus of $240 carried by the legislative bill, if you change that clerk hire from $3,200 clerk hire to each Member and adopt this resolution, then every clerk and every stenographer provided for in that bill will get $240 additional pay, making $480 to each Congressman over and above the $1,200 which has just been carried. That is not all. It is proposed in the next Congress to pay to every employee of the House and Senate whose names appear upon the roll an extra month's pay. I have always opposed this, because it is unjust and unfair. There is no more reason why this should be done for the House employees than for other employees of the Federal Government. There is no reason why our employees who serve the Congress should be made special pets of, but if the names of these secretaries and stenographers of Congressmen go upon the roll, and the next Congress should go back to the old rule of paying an extra month's pay, under this resolution putting these two employees of each Congressman on the roll would add to each one of these employees one-twelfth of their annual salary. The stenographer would get an extra $100 and the clerk or secretary would get an extra $166.66⅔.

If we could get a roll call on this proposition, I do not believe that Congress will pass this resolution. If we do not get a roll call, so that the Congressmen do not have to go on the record, it will unquestionably pass.

This matter was fully discussed in the legislative, executive, and judiciary bill just a few weeks ago, and then the Congress, after that discussion, gave to each Congressman this extra stenographer at $1,200. Now, before the ink is dry and within a few days after the bill had been passed and signed by the President, here comes another proposition that will add enormously to the expense of the House and the cost to the people of their Congressmen. In other words, to state the proposition concretely, under the proposed resolution the secretary gets $2,000, and if placed upon the roll, as proposed in the resolution, the secretary will be paid a bonus of $240, making the secretary's salary $2,240. The stenographer's salary is fixed at $1,200 in this resolution, and if the stenographer goes on the roll you then add $240 additional, making $1,440; that is to say, every Congressman in the House will get for his own office clerk services costing the Government $3,680. Just think, Mr. Speaker, that immediately prior to this present Congress each Congressman received $1,500 for clerk hire. At the first session of this Congress there was added $500 to this. Before this session closed we added $1,200 more for a stenographer. Now comes the final chapter within a few hours before the close of this session, when but little debate, thought, and discussion can be had upon any bill, however important. This resolution proposes to add in addition to the $500 and the $1,200 to each and every Congressman $480 more for his office. This can not be justified in good conscience, and especially when you take into consideration the fact that our Republican friends, who control the next House, say that they are going to give to each of their employees an extra month's pay, which means in addition to the $3,680 for each Congressman an additional sum of $266.66⅔, which makes every Congressman get for clerk hire $3,940.66⅔. In other words, it makes one Congress add over 150 per cent to each and every Congressman for his own office and for his own convenience.

Now, $480 for 440 Members of Congress, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners will require $211,200, and an extra month's pay will require $117,330, or a total of $228,530 carried in this simple, innocent resolution in the dying moments of Congress, which nowhere appears on the face of the innocent-looking thing that is going to cost as much more as the present law now appropriates.

Now, I do not believe that Congressmen realized that when this resolution came up, and it shows you the danger of so legislating in the closing hours of the Congress. Now, gentlemen of the House, I do not believe that you can justify your own conscience in voting to give $440 more to each one of us, and in addition to that $166⅔, plus $100, making $266⅔ and add that to the $480, making $750 clerk hire by the passage of this resolution.

Now, we debated this at some length on the legislative bill, and that bill has barely been signed by the President of the United States; and yet in the same session of Congress, within less than a week from the time the President signed the bill giving to each of you an additional clerk with a $1,200 salary, here you are coming now and asking for about $750 before that becomes a law. Did you gentlemen know that when this legislation first came up, and yet that is exactly what will happen. Now, that is not all. There are many Members of Congress who would like to get a clerk and pay that clerk $3,200, but under this resolution it can not be done. If you should want to divide your clerk hire so at a certain season of the year you can use more of it than in others, you can not do it because you have to get one at $2,000 and another at $1,200, whereas if you had $3,200 you could distribute it to suit yourself. Now, I have no patience on earth with any intimation that Members of Congress will vote this money and not use it as the law directs, and yet that is the reason urged by these men to place these employees upon the roll.

Mr. Speaker, of course this is not the real reason why they want these names to go on the roll. If a Congressman is worthy to have a seat in this body, he is certainly to be trusted with the clerk hire. When a Congressman got $1,500 for clerk hire, he could divide it as he saw fit and proper. When he got $2,000 he could divide it as he saw fit and proper. The present law grants $3,200 as clerk hire. The Congressman can divide this sum as he sees proper. Under the guise of putting the secretary and stenographer upon the roll, without one word being said about it until I called the attention of the Members on the floor to it, without the bill on its face showing it, there is silently taken out of the Treasury $480 additional for each Congressman under this resolution by their going on the rolls. If they had not intended that this should be done, why was it called up under suspension of rules when the resolution can not be amended? The only way in which you could amend that resolution would be by unanimous consent. Do not you know there is no chance on earth to get that resolution amended by unanimous consent to prevent the Congressmen getting $3,200 plus the $480? Of course not. The real thing accomplished by the resolution is to give the $480 by putting their names upon the roll. If the Republicans give to each employee an extra month's pay, it will give each Congressman $266⅔ more for their clerk. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this is my reason for opposing this resolution at this time, because I am not willing that this $1,077,530 should be added to the already heavy burden of the taxpayers.

It might be well for me to state to the Members of Congress, so that the people who sent them here may know what you are doing for yourselves and for your own benefit, by stating in money what you have done for yourselves already and what you propose to do now. Up until the last year each Congressman got only $1,500 for clerk hire, and there are 440 Congressmen, delegates, and resident commissioners, so this item cost the American people only $660,000. Last session you raised the clerk hire from $1,500 to $2,000, which caused this to cost an increase of $220,000 or $880,000. Not satisfied with this, this Congress in the legislative bill which has just passed a few days ago added $528,000 to this $880,000, making a total increase prior to this resolution in one Congress of $748,000. Now, if this resolution passes, the 440 Congressmen, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners will get $211,200 more, making $960,000 added by this Congress to their clerk hire; and then if they get the extra month's pay under the next Republican House, as the leaders say they are going to get, this adds $117,330 additional, or a total gross increase to the people of the United States for clerk hire to Congressmen of $1,077,530 in one session of Congress. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, do you not think this is going too far? Just think, two years ago the total expense was only $660,000. In two short Congresses we will have added $1,077,530, so that the American people in the next Congress will be paying to Congressmen for clerk hire $1,737,530 if an extra month's pay is added by the Republicans.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, when the subject of the increase for clerk hire came up on the legislative bill it will be recalled that I opposed the increase, but this House by a good majority voted the increase for clerk hire, and the fact remains that during the fiscal year 1920 there will be $3,200 provided for clerk hire for each Member, Resident Commissioner, and Delegate. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON]——

Mr. BLACK rose.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Just a minute—makes the point that if the resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] is adopted it will provide for a $240 bonus. It seems certain, gentlemen, that if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] be correct, that the $240 will be paid anyway.

And the reason I say that is this: The legislative bill provides for $3,200 to be appropriated for each Member, Resident Commissioner, and Delegate for clerk hire, for necessary clerical purposes, and so forth, and it further provides that no part of said sum shall be paid to any Member, Resident Commissioner, or Delegate. Now, that, to all intents and purposes, puts your secretary or your clerks upon the roll; and, if so, then they will get the bonus under the law. The money is not paid to the Member; it is paid to the clerk by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, if the gentleman from Illinois be correct in his statement or in his construction that the clerk will have the power to do it under this ambiguous provision in the legislative bill. Now, what I want to see done is to see that law made plain, so that the country and so that the Clerk of the House of Representatives, the Comptroller of the Treasury, and the auditors may know just what Congress intended to do.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Does not the gentleman think if the language is ambiguous, and that he, an old Member of this House and a member of the Committee on Appropriations, can not clearly understand its meaning, it is a matter of too much importance to consider here at the closing hours of this session?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say that the gentleman voted for propositions last night and yesterday much more important than this and meaning much more to the country without objection and with less consideration than this will have in the 40 minutes allowed to consider this short resolution.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] complains because the clerks of the Members will get $240 bonus. I have just said that, in my judgment, they will get it, anyway. But the gentleman and no other Member of this House objected to the Senators increasing the salaries of their secretaries from $2,200 to $2,500, with a bonus, making $2,740 that their secretaries will get the next fiscal year. In addition to that, the Senators increased another one of their clerks from $1,440 to $1,600, with a bonus of $240, making $1,840. Their other clerks were advanced from $1,200 to $1,500, making $1,740 for those clerks. Then they provide, in addition, for an entirely new clerk at $1,200, who will get the bonus also, making the salary $1,440 for their new clerk. Nobody on the floor of this House raised an objection to that when that proposition came before the House. I have not favored large appropriations in this House, as you all know. I have done all that I could to keep down appropriations. But I say, in all fairness, gentlemen, if it is right for the four clerks to Senators to receive $240 each as a bonus, then by the same rule of procedure the clerks of the Members of the House ought to receive a similar amount and similar treatment. [Applause.]

In addition to that, gentlemen, I have fought for eight years upon this floor to put the clerks to Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners upon the roll. I have not done that because, as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] intimates, of any want of confidence in a single Member, Resident Commissioner, or Delegate in this House. But I have believed it was right. I believe our clerks ought to be on the rolls just as the clerks to Senators are upon the roll. For that reason I have consistently done all that I possibly could to put these clerks on the roll, and that is just what the resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] will clearly do if adopted, and that is the reason I favor it. I do not want this question left in doubt. [Applause.]

This resolution does not increase the appropriation for clerk hire one cent. It carries no appropriation whatever, but simply determines just how the amount of money heretofore appropriated shall be expended during the next fiscal year. As I have stated, when the question was up in the House I opposed the proposition to increase the amount for clerk hire, but those who favored it contended that it should be increased in order to allow each Member an additional clerk, and the House adopted it with that idea in view. This resolution simply proposes to carry out the wishes of the House which were expressed at the time. It was not contended by anyone that the secretary to a Member should receive more than $2,000, nor was the increase allowed for the purpose of increasing the salary of the secretary to any Member, but simply to provide him with an additional clerk. In view of the understanding of the House, I do not think it right that the clerk to any Member should receive more than $2,000, and I want to see this resolution pass in order to make that certain. Members who favored the increase insisted that an additional clerk was needed for the benefit of their constituents, and a majority of the House voted it with that understanding. What possible objection can there be, therefore, to passing this resolution so as to provide by law for two clerks, especially since it does not cost the Government one single dollar more than the amount which has already been appropriated. If a Member does not need two clerks, then he will not have to appoint them, and the money provided for one of his clerks may remain in the Treasury. In such a case the passage of this resolution will prevent his single clerk demanding the full amount appropriated and thus will save money to the Treasury.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON].

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], who has just addressed the House, bases his support of this legislation largely upon the contention that another body has increased the allowance for the clerical help of that body, and that consequently, as a matter of justice, we should go and do likewise.

Now, my friends, it has always been understood here that the other body—the Senate—has never interfered with what arrangements we saw fit to make relating to the amount we paid ourselves or allowed for clerk hire or help in our own offices. And that is the reason I have always heard was why we did not interfere with the amount they allow. Now, if that be true, they have their own matters to attend to so far as the help in their offices and for their work is concerned, and we have the same privilege.

Now, gentlemen of the House, it is only a short time, perhaps a little over a year, when we allowed but $1,500 per year for clerk hire. Now, in 12 months' time we have increased that by something like 150 per cent, at a time when the Treasury is empty and when the taxpayers of the country are burdened down with necessary taxes. You all know that this increase was granted largely because of the increased duties relating to the war. The war is over. The armistice is signed. Peace will soon be here. Our work before the departments and the work in our offices will shortly diminish, and the excuse for this large increase will have passed away. And, my friends, if we have any regard whatever for the taxpayers of the country, if we have any regard for economy, if we have any regard for those who are already heavily burdened with heavy taxes to pay necessary expenses, and pay the interest on the national debt, and to defray the expenses of the Government, we will not for our own convenience make this appropriation here in the closing hours of this Congress, when, as we all know, it has not had the consideration it should have had.

Only a few days ago we voted to make this amount $3,200 a year, and now, without consideration, the proposition is to increase it to $3,500 or $3,600 a year. My colleagues, you can not justify it. It is a small item; of course, relatively, but, still, the eyes of the people of the country are upon us, and certainly we can not justify an appropriation of this kind under the prevailing conditions of the country. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, as I understand the legislative bill, it may be interpreted to mean that we are to receive $3,200 per year, which we can pay out as we like to one or more clerks whom we may employ, and as we need them. That is all we will get under that bill, in my judgment.

Under this bill, if it becomes a law, however, we will get $3,200, and, in addition, in my judgment, we will get at least $480 as a bonus or bonuses. I believe that is too much. I do not believe that that burden should be placed on the Treasury at this time.

Besides that, I have another objection to this bill as it is drawn which, I think, is equally important. This resolution provides that you can hire a secretary for $2,000 and a stenographer or clerk for $1,200. I want to call attention to the fact that it is very hard now to employ a competent secretary at $2,000. So far as I am concerned, I know that I have a secretary whose wage I had hoped to increase under the legislative bill, so that he could stay here and keep his family here and live under the existing high prices.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Was it not argued by everyone who favored the $3,200 proposition to have two clerks, one at $2,000 and the other at $1,200? Was not that the theory upon which this House voted?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not think so. So far as I was concerned, I did not vote for the raise of wage at all. As I understand it, that is not the meaning of it, and I do not think that is what the law is. I think a man has the right to have one or two or three clerks in the rush session if he wants them, and certify for their payment to the Clerk. He should be allowed to use this $3,200 as he desires. For instance, a man may want to go to his home town and hire a stenographer out of this fund. Under this resolution he can do nothing of the kind. I do not believe this resolution ought to pass.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have four minutes remaining.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, when this proposition was originally before the House it was my best judgment that we should retain the $2,000 secretary position and provide also for a session clerk. The judgment of the House, however, was that there should be two annual clerks, one receiving $2,000 and the other $1,200. The language adopted by the House is somewhat ambiguous, which in its present form, as pointed out by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], will enable a Member to appoint one clerk or any number of clerks and have them placed on the roll of the House of Representatives. If they are placed on the roll of the House of Representatives, then they will receive the bonus allowance which comes to all civilian employees of the Government who receive less than $2,500. That is, $240 to each.

The claim made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] that this is adding a burden of several hundred thousand dollars to the Treasury is not well taken, because only if there is one clerk to receive this $3,200 the bonus of $240 will not be paid; but if there is more than one and none receive more than $2,500, then each clerk will receive the $240 bonus.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Under the plan provided in the bill, how is this fund to be divided?

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the plan contained in the legislative bill it is left to the discretion of the Member to appoint as many clerks as he sees fit at the salaries he sees fit, provided they do not exceed an aggregate of $3,200.

It was my hope, and the hope of other conferees on the part of the House on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill that this matter would be thrown into conference so that the conferees might submit to the House a well-considered proposition. But the Senate did not in any wise modify it, so that the House could consider it, and now we have before us a definite proposition to carry out virtually the original intendment of the House when the House agreed to increase the clerk hire from $2,000 to $3,200, one to receive $2,000 and the other $1,200.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. Is it true that the $3,200 now provided for clerk hire has to be paid to one clerk, and then by him in turn paid out to another?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no.

Mr. FERRIS. It has been so asserted here.

Mr. STAFFORD. When the gentleman from Illinois made his argument I thought it was convincing that under this provision a Member may either appoint one clerk, to receive $3,200, or any number of clerks, to receive a total of $3,200, all the clerks to be placed on the roll of the House and to be paid by the Clerk of the House.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. And each one to receive $240 bonus?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; each one to receive $240 bonus, provided none of them received more than $2,500.

Mr. FERRIS. What is the object of this resolution?

Mr. STAFFORD. The object of this is to carry out virtually the intendment of the House, so as to have one secretary to receive $2,000 and a clerk to receive $1,200.

Mr. FERRIS. The second ought to receive $1,500.

Mr. STAFFORD. The second will receive $1,440 when you include the bonus.

Now, let me call your attention to what the Senate has done in this legislative bill, which has heretofore been called to the attention of the House by the chairman of the legislative committee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. They provide four clerks for each Senator, granting to some Senators one additional clerk. The salary for the principal clerk will be $2,500 and the next $1,600 and the next $1,500 and the lowest-paid clerk $1,200. They all will receive the $240 bonus. It is true that the conferees on the part of the House protested strongly against the increases the Senate made in their clerks from $1,440 to $1,600, and from $1,200 to $1,500, and so on, but the administration of the Senate rests exclusively in their judgment and discretion, and naturally we had to surrender.

The pending resolution seeks to allow each Member two clerks and to have them placed on the roll and made employees of the House. It makes certain the clerical assistance each Member will have.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. That, however, is subject to a point of order. That point of order is always made, so that every time we have the legislative bill up here we have this wrangle about our clerks. No other place in the Government is in this situation. Senators have their clerks, who are put on the roll. The departments have clerks, who are put on the roll; but some gentlemen here insist that they must have the $3,200, and scatter it out, paying it to 1 clerk or 6 or 7 clerks or 15 clerks, to suit their convenience. Now, there can be no sort of justification for that. When this appropriation was increased to $3,200 the whole argument to the House was that we had the $2,000 for one clerk and that we needed another clerk at $1,200.

Now, as to the bonus of $240, if every other Government clerk is going to get $240, why should not the clerks to Congressmen get the $240 bonus? Why make any distinction against them? I think we ought to pass it and make it permanent law and cease this wrangle every time we meet here. I hope that the joint resolution will pass.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Have not a great many of the clerks got the idea that they are going to get the whole $3,200 to be paid to one clerk?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes; and they are going to insist on it. I ask for a vote.

Mr. RANDALL. The suggestion has been made here that a clerk when put on the roll can not be removed. Is it not a fact that a Member can put a clerk on the roll at the beginning of his term and may remove him within three months if he wishes to do so, and then reappoint him again?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Oh, yes; there is no doubt about that. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Let us vote on this first.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. At the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] I will ask the gentleman from Mississippi to withhold that point, and ask him to move for a recess until 10 o'clock. He requested me to ask that no point of order be made before 10 o'clock. The gentleman from North Carolina has gone over to the Senate to see what arrangements could be made over there.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to this being deferred, but I want a quorum here before we begin the roll call on this joint resolution. So I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-seven Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

PAY OF MEMBERS WHO SERVED IN THE ARMY.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I hope I may have the attention of the House, and I want to be perfectly frank with the House about a matter that I shall suggest. When we declared war several Members of the House were members of the National Guard and thought they might go into the Army. At their request, or the request of some of them, I introduced a resolution in the House directing the Committee on the Judiciary to report whether a Member accepting a commission in the Army would lose his seat in the House, or what the effect would be. The Committee on the Judiciary reported to the House that the acceptance of an office in the Army would, in effect, be a vacation of the seat of the Member.

There were still some very patriotic young men and older men in the House who wanted to go into the Army. I conferred with some of the gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House and reached an understanding, so far as I was concerned and so far as they were concerned, individually at least, that if any of the Members of the House on my side of the House went into the Army they would say nothing about it, and if any Democratic Members went into the Army, I would keep any Republican from mentioning it adversely, as far as the membership was concerned.

The Members on both sides went into the Army. When the armistice was signed and afterwards they came back into the House. Of course, if they had forfeited their seats, they were not entitled to come back and resume them. The question was raised as to their pay. We passed a resolution in the House providing that they would be paid from the time they returned to the House. Of course, if they had lost their seats, they could not regain them by such a resolution, but we could pay them the money and say nothing about whether they had lost their seats or not.

The matter was discussed with the noble gentleman who presides over us, and he was willing to sign the certificate for the time the boys were absent from the House, in order that they might draw their pay. Some of us, in order to give him some protection, signed a request that he should do this. I suppose he is still willing to do it. The Sergeant at Arms, who pays the salaries of Members, is under bond, a bond which runs for a number of years. I think quite properly he hesitated to pay the money which somebody thereafter might charge him with having paid illegally without the direction of the House.

When the deficiency bill was before the House the other day there was an amendment offered which was subject to a point of order, but the point of order was not made, providing for the payment to these Members of the amounts of salary and clerk hire which would be due to them for the time they were in the Army, their clerks having been paid meanwhile by them. The deficiency bill has failed. There are several of these Members who really need the money, who have had no Army pay, who have borrowed the money, and I wondered whether the Speaker would recognize me, and if he did, whether anyone would object to the passage of the following resolution, which, while not a matter of legality, would, I understand, be a sort of protection to the Sergeant at Arms, which he and also the Clerk of the House would be willing to accept:

House resolution 624.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives is hereby authorized and directed to immediately pay all arrears of salaries and clerk allowances to Members of the House of Representatives in the Sixty-fifth Congress who have not received their monthly salary and allowances, owing to their absence from the House while in the military service of the United States during the war.

I do not think this would settle the legal question, but I do think it would be proper to pay these boys the money. What do you say? [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, will the Chair recognize me for the immediate consideration of that resolution?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Did not your amendment in the deficiency bill deduct from the salaries of the men the amounts they had received as officers in the Army?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does this so deduct it? There is a difference?

Mr. MANN. There is a difference, but I understand the deduction would be made. I think it only exists in one case.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman indulge me for a statement?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will not interpose any objection to paying the salary if I can have one moment to express myself. I do not wish by my silence, which I shall keep after this in respect to this measure, by putting myself in a position of approving the recognition by this House of the legality of the status of these gentlemen, highly as I respect them and regard their services, because I have sworn to support the Constitution of the United States and I do not believe they are constitutional Representatives of the House.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman from Virginia, on the whole, I agree with him. I do not desire to have the legal question settled in this way. If this House could settle it, which I do not think it can, it already has been settled, because the House has already passed a joint resolution, or a concurrent resolution, which was passed by the Senate and, I suppose, signed by the President, recognizing him from the time he came back. I do not think, however, that either one determines the legal question, but it is frequently the case that we do not raise legal questions as we frequently do not raise points of order.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I understand similar questions were raised during the Spanish-American War. I recall the proposition raised in the case of Gen. Wheeler, of Alabama. Is the gentleman familiar with what action the House took in that case?

Mr. MANN. My recollection is that Gen. Wheeler, who left the House to become a general, was paid a salary up to the time, but he never came back to the House at all.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I was on the committee at that time and who disagreed from other members of the committee. I thought while they were away on a temporary service they were not Members of the House, but when they came back they were; but I arose for the purpose, with the gentleman's permission, of asking unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing the reports, which are in the RECORD on the matter and perhaps some few remarks in addition as to what took place at the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a minute?

Mr. MANN. Before consent is granted? I will yield to the gentleman any time. I would like, however, before the House——

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. Mr. Speaker, I am one Member of this House who has seldom craved its attention. I, too, took that oath to support the Constitution of my Government. I have tried to adhere to it. Since I came here my Government has gotten into trouble, and serious trouble. Thousands of our boys are buried in a foreign land. There is a Member of this House, Hon. ROYAL C. JOHNSON, of Aberdeen, S. Dak., who is one of our best Members, a man having great love of country, and in fact a man of destiny, who went to France. He is over on the Republican side of this House, too. He enlisted as a private and worked his way up to the rank of first lieutenant. Though he has said nothing about it to his friends, he, with his men, got in the course of enemy shell fire. A shell burst over his head and tore off nearly 3 pounds of flesh on his shoulder. Men were killed all around him on the battle field. A shell struck one soldier near JOHNSON, and his comrades never found even a piece of his clothing; he was blown to atoms. JOHNSON offered his life upon the altar of his country, but God was with him and saved him for future usefulness to his country. He was as brave as a lion. He said to me before he left, "Adam, I can not stand it; our Government is in trouble, and I am going if I never see my country again." He is an honor to his district, State, and Nation. He was willing, if we so required, to give up his salary here of $7,500 and went to answer his country's call; and if it is the last vote, as it likely will be, I shall ever cast in the House of Representatives, by the eternal gods, I want to show my appreciation of the men who stood by the Government when it was in serious, awful trouble. [Applause.] And, gentlemen, I almost lost a boy in this trouble. The situation has gotten close to me. The young men who went into this war and who have come home are destined to rule this Republic, if they will but hold their heads up, if after the war is over the War Department will ever let them out so they can get home. I think it is ridiculous that they are held in the camps of this country. [Applause.] And I pray and petition the consciences of men to give these boys their money. They have earned it. They were in hell on earth while we were here doing the best we could. Let us pay the debt the Government owes. Those are my individual sentiments. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for consideration of the resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution to authorize the payment of salaries to Members of the House of Representatives withheld during their absence in the military service of the United States.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms and Clerk of the House of Representatives are hereby authorized and directed to immediately pay all arrears of salary and clerk allowance to Members of the House of Representatives of the Sixty-fifth Congress who have not received their monthly salary and allowance owing to their absence from the House while in the military service of the United States during the war.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I understand this item was included in the deficiency appropriation bill which is being killed by a filibuster being carried on by the Republicans of the Senate.

Mr. MANN. I do not know who carried it on; I am sorry indeed that it is.

Mr. McCLINTIC. It is a fact?

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether it is a fact or not. The gentleman may be able to give me some information.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I had some information leading up to this question.

Mr. MANN. It is in the deficiency bill which, I understand, will not be passed, and I am very sorry it will not be passed.

Mr. McCLINTIC. That is the information that I get. If the bill is not passed at this session of Congress, will it be possible to have it passed at the next session of Congress making it retroactive so as to take care of those to whom this money should be paid?

Mr. MANN. It would be a claim to be acted upon as such, I suppose.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am opposed to this resolution on constitutional grounds and also upon grounds of public policy, and I can not allow it to be passed when my silence is accepted as an approval.

There is a way by which it can be brought before the House regularly, by a motion to suspend the rules, and in view of that fact I am compelled to object to its consideration.

Mr. MANN. Will not the gentleman wait a second? I have not asked the Speaker for recognition to suspend the rules, and I do not know whether he would be warranted in granting it or not.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. He can not do it right now.

Mr. MANN. Yes; he could. Will not the gentleman be content to have it laid before the House, so that gentlemen can make their statement in opposition to it?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I am not content. I do not want to make any statement, and I want to be recorded against it. When this was before the House the other day, a great many Members voted against it, and those men would undoubtedly be recorded against it now. It is not solely for my own benefit I make this objection, but there are a great many Members in the same situation that I am. It is unpleasant for me to make it, but there are men more sensitive and who do not hold to this opinion, and so I am going to stand over them for good policy and for the Constitution of the United States, and therefore am going to do this unpleasant thing and make objections.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, as I understand there was something said concerning the record of Gen. Joe Wheeler while he was in the service. The records will show that his salary was not paid to him or to anyone else for him while in the military service.

Mr. MANN. I think that is true. He received the salary of a major general, which was larger.

Mr. ALMON. And he was appointed by a Republican President.

Mr. MANN. I have no criticism of that.

The SPEAKER. As soon as we get through with the Humphreys resolution the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to suspend the rules. [Applause.]

The question now is on suspending the rules on the Humphreys resolution.

CLERK HIRE FOR MEMBERS.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, may we have it again reported, inasmuch as there were many Members not present when it was before the House?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Humphreys resolution.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD expressing some patriotic sentiments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD to express some patriotic sentiments.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask to insert in the RECORD a short codification of the decisions rendered by Judge SAUNDERS as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, I will object for a moment, until we get through with this thing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects to this request. Without objection, the Clerk will report this resolution.

CLERK HIRE FOR MEMBERS.

The resolution (H. J. Res. 436) was again reported.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Question, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the Humphreys resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker stated that in the judgment of the Chair two-thirds had voted in the affirmative.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of taking this vote by the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Forty-one gentleman have arisen; not a sufficient number.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I ask for the other side, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the other side. Those who are opposed will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Two hundred and thirty-eight Members have risen in the negative. Forty-one is not a sufficient number.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi demands tellers. [After counting.] Twenty-seven gentlemen have risen; not a sufficient number.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

Mr. MANN. After we get through with this.

The SPEAKER. Two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the joint resolution is passed.

On motion of Mr. HUMPHREYS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request to extend my remarks by printing some patriotic sentiments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing some patriotic expressions. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. RAYBURN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moves to suspend the rules and pass the resolution which the Clerk will report.

PAY OF MEMBERS WHO SERVED IN ARMY.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 624.

House resolution to authorize the payment of salaries to Members of the House of Representatives withheld during their absence in the military service of the United States.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms and Clerk of the House of Representatives are hereby authorized and directed to immediately pay all arrears of salary and clerk allowance to Members of the House of Representatives of the Sixty-fifth Congress who have not received their monthly salary and allowance owing to their absence from the House while in the military service of the United States during the war: Provided, That there shall be deducted from such amounts for salary, respectively, any money received by any of the above-named as compensation for service in the Army during the present emergency, and the affidavits of the above-named persons shall be accepted as proof as to whether or not any such payment has been received by them.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the resolution.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the rules are suspended and the resolution is passed.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks for a division. Those in favor of suspending the rules and passing this resolution will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Two hundred and twenty-eight gentlemen have risen in the affirmative.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of taking this vote by the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Thirty-five gentlemen have risen for the yeas and nays—not a sufficient number. Those opposed to suspending the rules and passing this resolution will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Forty-nine gentlemen have risen in the negative. On this vote the yeas are 228 and the nays are 49.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida demands tellers. As many as favor taking this vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Thirty-five gentlemen have risen, and it takes 44. Two-thirds having voted in the affirmative the rules are suspended and the resolution is passed.

WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the Senate bill 5555.

Mr. MANN. That can not be finished in an hour.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second on that.

Mr. RAYBURN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to take up at this time Senate bill 5555.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Minnesota in a minute.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Well, you will have plenty of time to get it.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, may we have the bill reported?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

Mr. MANN. I will object to that, because within the hour I want to offer a resolution of thanks to the Speaker, the ordinary resolution. If you suspend the rules we shall not finish by 12 o'clock. I am not opposed to it on its merits.

Mr. RAYBURN. The whole conversion of the war-risk insurance from war-time insurance to peace-time insurance depends absolutely on the passage of this bill.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That is not essential.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it essential that that action be taken now?

Mr. RAYBURN. It is, because the Attorney General has held that this insurance is convertible at this time.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I know that.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman allow me to say that it does not stop the conversion of it. All it does is to change the form of conversion and order a whole lot of things to be done that are unnecessary.

Mr. MADDEN. They do not have to begin to convert for five years, do they?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; they have to convert this insurance within five years.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. But the necessity for this bill at this time is that these men will not keep up the payment of their premiums even for one year where they have to pay a premium every month.

Mr. MADDEN. I presume in many cases that will be true.

Mr. RAYBURN. And then we will be left with all the bad risks on our hands and none of the good risks.

Mr. MADDEN. I should have been very glad to assist the gentleman in the consideration of this bill earlier in the session, when there was time to consider it properly.

Mr. ESCH. If the gentleman will allow me to make the suggestion, the sooner the insurance is converted into old-line insurance the lower the premiums will be, and that will be an inducement for them to convert their term insurance into the old-line insurance.

Mr. RAYBURN. Five years from now the premiums on a converted policy will cost from 10 to 20 per cent more than if converted now.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If a soldier has a policy for $10,000, he may convert that into a policy for two or three or four or five thousand dollars of insurance, which will make the burden much less on him and will fix the premium.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 402 of the war-risk insurance act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 402. That the director, subject to the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall promptly determine upon and publish the full and exact terms and conditions of such contract of insurance. The insurance until converted shall be payable only to a spouse, child, grandchild, parent, brother, or sister, and also during total and permanent disability to the injured person, or to any or all of them: Provided, That in the case of converted insurance, the permitted class of beneficiaries shall include in addition to the foregoing an uncle, aunt, nephew, or niece. The insurance shall be payable in 240 equal monthly installments. Provisions for maturity at certain ages, for continuous installments during the life of the insured, or beneficiaries, or both, for cash, loan, paid-up, and extended values, dividends from gains and savings, and such other provisions for the protection and advantage of and for alternative benefits to the insured and the beneficiaries as may be found to be reasonable and practicable, may be provided for in the contract of insurance, or from time to time by regulations. All calculations shall be based upon the American Experience Table of Mortality and interest at 3½ per cent, except that no deduction shall be made for continuous installments during the life of the insured in case his total and permanent disability continues more than 240 months. Subject to regulations, the insured shall at all times have the right to change the beneficiary or beneficiaries of such insurance without the consent of such beneficiary or beneficiaries, but only within the classes herein provided. If no beneficiary within the permitted class be designated by the insured, either in his lifetime or by his last will and testament, or if the designated beneficiary does not survive the insured, the insurance shall be payable to such person or persons within the permitted class of beneficiaries as would under the laws of the State of the residence of the insured be entitled to his personal property in case of intestacy. In the case of converted insurance, if no person within the permitted class survive the insured, there shall be paid to the estate of the insured an amount equal to the commuted value of the installments remaining unpaid, calculated at the rate of 3½ per cent interest; but if one or more such persons shall survive the insured and shall have died before receiving all of the installments payable there shall be paid to the estate of the last surviving person within the permitted class an amount equal to the commuted value of the installments remaining unpaid, calculated at the rate of 3½ per cent interest."

SEC. 2. That a new section is hereby added to Article IV of such act, to be known as section 405, and to read as follows:

"SEC. 405. That the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is hereby directed to set aside out of the premiums collected on the insurance converted under this article such a reserve fund, calculated on the basis of 3½ per cent interest, as may be required, under accepted actuarial principles, to meet all liabilities under such insurance; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to invest the said reserve fund, or any part thereof, in farm-loan bonds issued by the Federal land banks or in interest-bearing securities of the United States."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I demand a second.

Mr. RAYBURN. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey demands a second. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER]. All those in favor of ordering a second will pass between the tellers and be counted.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 116, noes 83.

Accordingly a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas has 20 minutes and the gentleman from New Jersey has 20 minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. I intend to take up the time only long enough to ask that a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury be read in my time, which I think will explain the necessity for this.

The Clerk proceeded to read the letter, which is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 7, 1919.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am inclosing herewith a tentative draft of a bill amending the war-risk insurance act. It provides for the enlargement of the permitted class of beneficiaries of converted insurance and directs the setting aside of a reserve fund for such insurance.

In my opinion, the early passage by the Congress of a bill similar in effect to that inclosed is of such vital importance to the success of the bureau in administering the provisions of the war-risk insurance act authorizing the conversion of insurance heretofore granted that I earnestly request that you give it the earliest possible attention. The reasons for requesting the legislation proposed may be thus briefly stated:

1. The setting aside of an insurance reserve: Section 402 of the act authorizes the inclusion in the insurance contract of provisions for "dividends from gains and savings, and such other provisions for the protection and advantage of and for alternative benefits to the insured and the beneficiaries as may be found to be reasonable and practicable." This and other provisions of the act make it clear that Congress expected that the contracts of converted insurance to be issued should make provisions for dividends substantially similar to those usually found in life insurance policies issued by private companies. It is also reasonable to infer that Congress expected that the gains and savings out of which these dividends were to be paid should, as in the case of private insurance companies, be realized from interest on reserve and savings in mortality. Hence, the Secretary of the Treasury should invest the reserve fund obtained from premiums on converted insurance in such a manner as to realize interest in excess of the basic rate of 3½ per cent upon which the reserve is calculated. This action could probably be taken by the Secretary without receiving additional authority from the Congress, but the importance of the proposed action is so great, affecting as it must the work of the bureau through half a century, and the sums involved are so large that it would be unwise to proceed without receiving the express direction of the Congress. I am advised that the success of the plan to continue the insurance of our soldiers in converted form depends largely upon the step proposed to be taken.

The considerations which lead me to think that the Congress should direct the establishment and maintenance of such a reserve fund may be set forth more specifically as follows:

(a) In receiving level-rate premiums for converted insurance from the soldier in the earlier years of the insured's life the Government takes from him more money than necessary to cover the cost of the protection granted to him during those years. This excess or reserve morally and equitably belongs to the insured and is held by the Government for his benefit. It is in a sense a trust fund, which the Government should use not for its own expenses but for the benefit of the insured. Moral obligation, as well as sound insurance practice, requires the Government to invest this reserve fund in such a way as to secure the highest interest obtainable consistent with safety.

(b) By using such a reserve fund for the purchase of farm-loan bonds issued by the Federal land bank an interest return substantially equal to 4½ per cent could be secured with perfect safety. At the same time one of the Government's most admirable economic agencies would be aided.

(c) The history of fraternal insurance organizations which failed to provide in early years a reserve fund shows what would be the effect of a failure on the part of the Government to set aside a reserve to support the converted insurance granted under the war-risk insurance act. If premium receipts should be applied in payment of current claims under matured insurance, with no setting aside of a reserve, the amount of the appropriations that would be required of Congress would at first, relatively speaking, be misleadingly small and would later become inordinately large, in short, sound economic theory, as well as the considerations of simple justice mentioned in (a) above, require the maintenance of a reserve.

2. Enlargement of permitted class of beneficiaries: Section 402 provides that in case the permitted beneficiaries of the insured die before the insured, or before they have received all of the 240 installments payable after his death, the installments remaining unpaid shall be forfeited to the Government, only the reserve value, if any, being payable to the estate of the insured. This was a wise and fair provision in the case of war-time term insurance. As the Government was giving to the insured the extra cost of insurance due to war hazards, there was no unfairness in declaring that it would not pay if the soldier's immediate dependents should have failed, but the same considerations do not apply to the converted insurance carried by the soldier under peace-time conditions, and for which he pays in full. It is only reasonable that the soldier who pays in full for his insurance should be given a wider selection of beneficiaries among his relatives, and it is but simple justice that he should receive in full the insurance he pays for without fear of forfeiture in case no person within the permitted class survives him. The proposed bill attached hereto enlarges the class of permitted beneficiaries so as to include uncles, aunts, nephews, and nieces of the insured. It further provides that if no such person within the enlarged class of beneficiaries survives the insured, the commuted value of the installments remaining unpaid shall become a part of the estate of the insured, but if the surviving beneficiaries within that class die before receiving all of the installments payable, then the commuted value of the unpaid installments shall become payable to the estate of the last surviving member of the permitted class. It is to be noted that the amount payable in such cases to the estate of the insured or of the last surviving beneficiary is the commuted value of the unpaid installments, and not merely the reserve of the policy, which alone is payable under the existing provisions of the act.

I am satisfied that the legislation proposed is entirely consistent with the purpose of the act and essential to the successful administration of those provisions requiring the conversion of the annual term insurance into other forms of insurance suitable to the peace-time needs of insured soldiers and sailors. This opinion is supported by the advice of the best insurance experts in this country, who, after careful study during many weeks of all the problems involved, and having special regard for the best interests of the men in the military and naval service, have incorporated some of the provisions of the proposed legislation in the recently completed policy forms for converted insurance. If these policies are to be issued as drawn and the work of conversion thereunder to begin, it is necessary for the Congress to pass the legislation proposed, and it is respectfully requested that this be done at the earliest possible day.

Sincerely, yours, CARTER GLASS,
Secretary.

Hon. F. M. SIMMONS,
Chairman Committee on Finance,
United States Senate.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I think the Clerk has read far enough to cover the contested points in the bill, and I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of the letter may be printed in the RECORD.

Some Members have said that this bill has no chance of becoming a law. I am informed that the bill is already enrolled, and that as soon as it is passed it is ready to go to the press. This bill is vitally important to the carrying on the work of the war-risk insurance. It is up to the House whether it will pass it.

Mr. MANN. Is there to be no explanation of the bill at all?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I will explain it.

Mr. RAYBURN. The letter which has been read is a very full statement of the reasons for the passage of the bill. It is presented just as it was written at the War Risk Insurance Bureau for the signature of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman asks to have the letter printed in the RECORD with only a part of it having been read.

Mr. RAYBURN. I stated that the controverted parts of the bill, as I understood, had been read in the letter, and I ask that the remainder may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, which I do not intend to do, I want to call attention to the fact that in the debate on the Diplomatic and Consular bill yesterday I addressed the House and asked leave to revise and extend my remarks. These facts do not appear in the RECORD this morning. There is no reference to my remarks. The statement that I addressed the House and that my remarks would appear hereafter, which should have been included in the RECORD, was omitted. I ask that that correction be made.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction will be made.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas to print the remainder of the letter?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, the courtesies of the day and its purpose have demanded that before beginning on the bill, in which I have great interest, I should have the pleasure of yielding four minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the Congress now closing will be written in history as the most notable in the annals of the Republic thus far. Its opening witnessed the declaration which threw the deciding strength of the Republic into the greatest war of all times. That act saved civilization. The progress of the Congress witnessed the most far-reaching grants of Executive war authority ever given by a free people, the most stupendous appropriations, the greatest tax levies in all history. These were the major and dominating notes of the symphony of the Sixty-fifth Congress, through which ran the chords of harmonious and patriotic cooperation. Who shall say that the softening of the note of insistent contention, the substitution of patriotism for partisanship, was not in some measure due to the fact that this Congress was honored and favored above all the Congresses that preceded it by the gracious influence of womanhood in its membership. [Applause.] It was inevitable in the development of a broader and truer democracy that eventually the Congress should number women among its Members. It was remarkable that this demonstration of a truer democracy should occur in the fateful days of this Congress. How fortunate for the country and for womanhood that the first of her sex to occupy a seat in this great legislative body, to become conspicuous in the eyes of the country and the world as a woman legislator, was one so thoroughly womanly, so richly endowed with the charms of feminine grace and modesty, so reasonable, and yet so capable and courageous as the lady from Montana. [Applause.] The lady from Montana leaves the House on her own motion and of her own accord—a proper and ladylike manner of departure—and she leaves it better for her influence. [Applause.] She has performed conspicuous service to her country in proving the wisdom of that broadening of the democracy of representative government which her presence here represents. She has rendered a great and lasting service to her sex in proving that womanly grace is not incompatible with public service. [Applause.] She has made us all her debtor by her gracious influence here. The House parts with its woman Member with sincere regret and unites in best wishes for the future success, health, and happiness of our colleague, the lady from Montana. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, after this very pleasant episode I come to this bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield me five minutes? I want to yield to the gentleman from Colorado, and he will yield to the lady from Montana.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the lady from Montana be recognized for the five minutes yielded to me. [Applause.]

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Speaker and fellow colleagues, two years ago you greeted me very cordially, and my thought at that time was the hope that you might feel kindly when I left; that my conduct would be such that you would be glad I was here. No woman has ever received the kindly and gentle treatment that the men in this House have given to me. You have made every step as easy as it was possible for you to make it, so that every moment has been one of pleasure, an opportunity, and, I hope, development.

I am sorry to leave you before the women of this Nation are enfranchised, but I leave to you, the Members of the Sixty-fifth Congress who will be Members of the Sixty-sixth Congress, the great trust of enfranchising the women of this country. I want you to know that I love you, the Sixty-fifth Congress, and I shall never forget you. I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 16 minutes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, there are two sections in this bill. The first is absolutely unnecessary and wrong and the second one very grievously wrong.

Th war-risk insurance act had provided very carefully by section 404 that the soldiers' term insurance, that is only good for a year at a time, can be converted not before the termination of the war and not later than five years thereafter into ordinary insurance, for life, 20 years, and so forth. This first section of this bill provides a modification of section 402 but changes it in very few respects. It adds the words "uncle, aunt, nephew, or niece" to the list of beneficiaries that can be named in case of converted insurance. If the soldier dies leaving no beneficiaries, the old law provided that his estate should get the value of the policy of insurance, whereas this bill provides that all remaining payments shall be commuted and paid to that estate. This is an enlargement of the contracts of war-risk insurance, which run into thirty or forty billion dollars and is a real drain on the Government.

This is proposed upon the suggestion that the converted insurance will be paid for in full as it would be paid to an insurance company. I do not know how the Secretary of the Treasury came to sign some clerk's certificate that said that, because the Government does not get full payment for this insurance. It does the whole insurance business free of all charge for expenses, which generally amounts to 10 per cent of the annual outgo. It also, besides that, takes the insurance not only at rates below what an insurance company would take, but it insures the life of a man who may have come out of the war broken down in health, and it gives him his insurance without a medical examination. If he outlives the 240 payments it goes on paying him for life without making any calculations on these extra payments.

This contract of insurance is largely a gift, and there is no reason why this gift should be enlarged without necessity. There is no new plan, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] suggests, in this section needed to make it workable. The old section is exactly the same as the new, except adding the uncle, the aunt, or the niece, and also the substitution of the commutation of unpaid allotments for the value of the insurance, which value of the insurance, as they say, is what is always paid by any insurance company. This bill adds to the losses to be paid out, although the soldier had not paid for the original provision. There is no reason for section 1.

Section 2, on the other hand, will work a great and grievous wrong on the United States. By section 402, as above, the United States agrees to a calculation of interest on all premiums and to account for them with 3½ per cent, which is the usual interest allowed by any insurance company. There may be "dividends from gains and savings"; that is to say, if the death rate happens to be smaller than in the tables of mortality there will be a profit in the hands of the Government, which can be divided. The Secretary of the Treasury forgets this, and says that gains and savings could only be made if the Government invests a reserve fund and gets higher interest than 3½ per cent.

That is not true. There can be a profit without keeping a reserve fund. The calculation is entirely independent of the funds on hand, and if the mortality proves less there is a gain. He also says that a reserve fund is necessary, because friendly companies have failed for want of one. But the Government needs no reserve fund to back it up. The Government can pay death losses when they come. When we need taxes as much as we do for other purposes, it is idle to pile up a fund and invest it in farm-loan bonds or in Government securities. Such reserve is absolutely unnecessary and is absolutely oppressive to the taxpayer, and I protest against this system.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] wants to speak on this subject, but I want to say to the House that this bill does not at all aid the war-insurance act. It only changes the beneficiaries to whom the amount may be paid and the amount to be so paid. The changes put more charge on the United States and are absolutely unnecessary, and to order a reserve fund to be accumulated by the Government is absolutely unjust.

I append a memorandum of the changes made by this bill in the section—matter struck out in parentheses and new matter in italic:

SEC. 402. That the director, subject to the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall promptly determine upon and publish the full and exact terms and conditions of such contract of insurance. The insurance (shall not be assignable and shall not be subject to the claims of creditors of the insured or of the beneficiary. It) until converted shall be payable only to a spouse, child, grandchild, parent, brother, or sister, and also during total and permanent disability to the injured person, or to any or all of them: Provided, That in the case of converted insurance, the permitted class of beneficiaries shall include in addition to the foregoing an uncle, aunt, nephew, or niece. The insurance shall be payable in 240 equal monthly installments. Provisions for maturity at certain ages, for continuous installments during the life of the insured or beneficiaries, or both, for cash, loan, paid-up and extended values, dividends from gains and savings, and such other provisions for the protection and advantage of and for alternative benefits to the insured and the beneficiaries as may be found to be reasonable and practicable, may be provided for in the contract of insurance, or from time to time by regulations. All calculations shall be based upon the American Experience Table of Mortality and interest at 3½ per cent (per annum), except that no deduction shall be made for continuous installments during the life of the insured in case his total and permanent disability continues more than 240 months. Subject to regulations, the insured shall at all times have the right to change the beneficiary or beneficiaries of such insurance without the consent of such beneficiary or beneficiaries, but only within the classes herein provided. If no beneficiary within the permitted class be designated by the insured, either in his lifetime or by his last will and testament, or if the designated beneficiary does not survive the insured, the insurance shall be payable to such person or persons within the permitted class of beneficiaries as would under the laws of the State of the residence of the insured be entitled to his personal property in case of intestacy. (If) In the case of converted insurance, if no (such) person within the permitted class survive the insured, (then) there shall be paid to the estate of the insured an amount equal to the (reserve) commuted value (if any of the insurance at the time of his death, calculated on the basis of the American Experience Table of Mortality and 3½ per cent interest in full of all obligation under the contract of insurance.) of the installments remaining unpaid, calculated at the rate of 3½ per cent interest; but, if one or more such persons shall survive the insured and shall have died before receiving all of the installments payable, there shall be paid to the estate of the last surviving person within the permitted class an amount equal to the commuted value of the installments remaining unpaid, calculated at the rate of 3½ per cent interest.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY].

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, how much time is remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eight minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for this opportunity to call the attention of the House to the death of a former Member of this House, David Henry Mercer. When a Member of this body dies in the service appropriate resolutions are passed and an adjournment of the day's proceedings is taken out of respect for the distinguished dead. Later a day is set apart when his more intimate colleagues gather and in formal speech recite the history of his life, outstanding elements of his character, and give generous estimate of his reputation left behind.

To those who were called by their people to grace this Chamber with their presence and participate in the deliberations and contentions of this the greatest legislative body on earth, and who survive their service, formal proceedings are not had in their memories and would under the nature of things be impracticable. But when a Member who has served long and with distinction and is called from that private life to the one beyond, I deem it not inappropriate to call attention to the fact of the passing of that one who was once a factor here. These considerations prompt me at this hour in this Congress, soon to expire, to remind my colleagues that Hon. David Henry Mercer, Congressman in the Fifty-third, Fifty-fourth, Fifty-fifth, and Fifty-sixth Congresses—1893 to 1903—from the second district of Nebraska, departed this life in the city of Omaha on the 7th of January, 1919.

Former Congressman Mercer was born at Benton City, Iowa, July 9, 1857. He was a son of Capt. J. J. Mercer, a veteran of the Civil War, and one of Nebraska's prominent Masons. Capt. Mercer brought his family to Brownsville, Nebr., in 1866, where David attended and graduated at the public schools.

He was one of the early students of the Nebraska State University, graduating therefrom in 1880. That great institution has kept pace with the progress of its early graduates. It has now thousands of students where there were then less than hundreds.

He later took a law course at Ann Arbor. He did not long practice law, but, moving to Omaha, the State metropolis, he continued the political activity started by his election when at Brownsville to the secretaryship of the Republican State central committee, of which organization he was twice chairman. He held under President Harrison the assistant United States marshalship and special master in chancery.

His office-holding career really began in 1892, when as the Republican candidate he was elected from the then now second congressional district. Three times he was triumphantly reelected. In 1902 he was defeated by Hon. GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK, now senior Senator from Nebraska.

Nebraska, as has been the case with most young and developing States, has not favored long incumbency of office. At the time of his retirement his incumbency of this House represented the high tide for Nebraska. It has never been exceeded since except once, and that by the eminent jurist and illustrious and faithful statesman, Hon. M. P. KINKAID, who has represented the sixth district for 16 years and has a reelection to his credit.

Omaha was then, as now, the large factor of the second district, an ambitious, growing city. Governmental activities, always desirable to great cities, were of course in request. Mercer was practical in his representation of a district which demanded practical results. Omaha and other western communities fared well under his chairmanship of the Public Buildings Committee.

He was of those who believed that in every important community of the country there should be a suitable building for the housing of the Government's post office, land office, customhouse, and courts. He believed that the exhibition of the American flag over them was a daily lesson of patriotism, which the youth and others of the land needed. There is less criticism of this principle than we have heretofore heard and properly so.

The Omaha Bee, of January 11, 1919, said, among other things: "While in Congress he obtained recognition and an appropriation for the Trans-Mississippi Exposition at Omaha and was active in furthering the interests of his district. He introduced the first postal savings bill in Congress."

In and out of office, Mercer emphasized the personal factor in the equation of politics and legislation. His personality was always pleasing, conversation whole hearted, and always engaging. He bound friends and colleagues to him so that when friends were needed they were soon in evidence. In this way he did much for his district and State.

After his retirement from Congress, he made Washington his home until a short time before his death. In the summer of 1918 he became an unsuccessful candidate for the Republican nomination for United States Senator.

He leaves one child, a daughter, who with his many friends in Nebraska and throughout the Nation mourn the death of one who in his time was a factor in the large affairs of his State and Nation.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, this bill should be amended or it should fail. So far as the war-risk insurance feature of the bill is concerned, I have no objection to it whatever, but here is a provision in section 405 that these reserve funds must be invested in Federal farm-loan bonds.

I object to this part of section 405, "and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to invest the said reserve fund, or any part thereof, in farm-loan bonds issued by the Federal land banks." That Federal farm-loan act is a farce and has so proven to be. It is the greatest blue-sky scheme ever promoted by a national government.

Congress appropriated about $9,000,000 to start with to establish the banks, and we appropriated a quarter of a million dollars a short time ago to pay running expenses.

The loans made by the Federal farm-loan banks are such loans generally as prudent bankers and money lenders will not make. The Federal farm-loan banks are only getting such loans as no wise, prudent money lender will take.

Last year Congress appropriated $200,000,000 from the Treasury of the United States, largely the money obtained from the sale of Liberty bonds, to keep these banks running. The Secretary of the Treasury was authorized then to buy these farm-loan bonds because the public did not buy them.

They have gone into the Treasury of the United States and taken $200,000,000 of money contrary to law, in my opinion, to place in those banks—money that was raised under the pretense of carrying on this war. It was taken contrary to law, I say, from the purpose for which it was raised and diverted to these banks.

The Government does not guarantee the payment of 1 cent of the farm-loan bonds. An attempt was made to amend the $200,000,000 bill in January, 1918, to make the Government guarantee the payment of farm-loan bonds, but it was voted down. The promoters of the Federal farm-loan act are now trying to whip the devil around the stump in another way. They can not induce Congress to guarantee the bonds, so they want to require the Government to buy these unguaranteed bonds. When losses occur, the Government then being the owner of bonds, would be compelled to stand the loss just as much as if it had guaranteed them. I denounce such methods as unbusinesslike. Congress ought not to authorize investment of public money in bonds which it had refused to guarantee.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I have only a few minutes. I would like to yield, but I can not. I say, gentlemen, this provision of this law is for the sole purpose of aiding the Federal farm-loan banks to dispose of their bonds which the law says are not guaranteed by the Government, although the brokers of the country are to-day sending out notices offering those bonds for sale with circulars which say that the bonds are guaranteed by the Government. That is not true. That provision of section 405 should be stricken out or the resolution should fail or the Federal farm-loan act repealed. It is a fraud on the taxpayers of this country——

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. Does not the gentleman know that the directors of the Federal Farm Loan Board claim that they would have no trouble at all in selling bonds if the Secretary of the Treasury would permit them to offer them for sale in open market competition with Liberty bonds?

Mr. FORDNEY. The directors of the Federal farm-loan banks say more than their prayers when they make that statement.

Mr. NORTON. They state that the Secretary of the Treasury has directed them not to offer these bonds for sale in competition with Liberty loan bonds, and that is the real reason why the farm-loan bonds have not been sold.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not care what the Secretary of the Treasury or the directors of the Federal Farm Loan Board say about this system. I know that they are offering them for sale and that they have at numerous times offered them for sale within the last month. They do not advertise them in the newspapers, but they send large four-page circulars to investors by mail describing the bonds as "instrumentalities of the Government" and soliciting business. These circulars state that the bonds may be obtained at the Federal land banks. These bonds offered for sale are Federal land bank bonds. I have been particular and specific to show conclusively that the gentleman has been misinformed with regard to the activities of the Farm Loan Board and its attempts to sell bonds. I know that they have loaned money on farms in the country at much above the value of the property, and the Government will never get the money back. It is a fraud. I know a piece of land that sold for $3 an acre, and the Federal farm-loan bank loaned $15 an acre on it, and it would not sell to-day for $5 an acre, and that is the kind of loans they are getting sometimes. I tell you this bill should be defeated. It should not be permitted to be enacted into law with this included.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

Mr. FORDNEY. Has my time expired?

The SPEAKER. No; the Chair thought the gentleman had quit. The gentleman has four minutes.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield.

Mr. DENISON. Under the rule can we offer an amendment to this bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. No, sir; you can not. This prohibition has been prearranged.

Mr. DENISON. We can not offer any amendment?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; you can not. If it were subject to amendment, and an amendment were offered, the gentleman who presents this well knows that provision would go out of the bill. If the facts can be presented to the Members of this House this bill will fail.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. The objection the gentleman has to the bill is the direction to invest the funds in the farm-loan bonds?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir; and the only objection I have to the bill is that it directs the Government to invest in these Federal farm-loan bonds; that is, the insurance reserve funds. It should be free, absolutely, from any such direction.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Why the Government should keep a reserve for its own security I do not see.

Mr. FORDNEY. The purpose is to invest this reserve fund and receive some interest upon that money while it is lying there to be used, but there are many other good securities in the country in which that money could be invested and not in a fake proposition.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. And the Government does not need to keep a single dollar of it.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; it is for the sole purpose of continuing in existence this Federal farm-loan law.

Thoughtful and careful people everywhere counsel economy in living and caution about investment in this time of high taxes and inflated prices. The Treasury Department urges us all to save our money to buy thrift stamps and help pay the war debt. The Federal Farm Loan Board takes exactly the opposite course. They urge people to borrow money to place mortgages on their farms. With the aid of traveling lecturers, Chautauqua speakers, special newspaper writers, and others, farmers are told that Federal farm-loan bank mortgages never have to be paid or that they pay themselves off. Many are led into borrowing money for land speculation or to invest in automobiles and nonproductive improvements. One of the popular phrases of these mortgage promoters is "the farmer is learning that the dollar is something to be spent and not a thing to be hoarded."

Mr. Speaker, a period of depression followed the Civil War, when farmers found it a hardship to pay debts incurred during the war period of high prices. It may be that debts contracted when wheat is $2.26 a bushel will be hard to pay after the prices drop. I think the Federal Farm Loan Board could do a greater service to the country by urging people to refrain from going into debt rather than by inviting reckless borrowing.

There is an endless chain of schemes for reaching the Treasury to keep the farm-loan system going. In addition to the large appropriations made to pay its expenses, a bill was messaged over from the Senate Saturday appropriating $50,000,000 for a revolving fund to be used at any and all times to buy farm-loan bonds. This section 405 in the war-risk insurance bill is another sample of the activity of the promoters of the system.

The tax exemption of the bonds causes a loss to the National Treasury and it has injured the credit of the country, because farm-loan bonds bear higher rates of interest than Liberty bonds and enjoy greater exemption from taxation. This final attempt at the eve of adjournment to turn over the soldiers' insurance funds to bolster up this impractical plan ought to be defeated by a unanimous vote.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for order, and not to be taken out of the time of the gentleman from Michigan, and there will be no clock turning back, either.

Mr. FORDNEY. Gentlemen, the money that I have mentioned, appropriated by Congress and taken out of the Treasury without authorization——

Mr. MANN. If there is an attempt to turn back the clock there will be trouble.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. I do not propose to have the clock turned back to pass a bill. I stopped that once when we wanted to pass a bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, what I wished to say when I was interrupted——

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I presume the gentleman is talking for one purpose only, and that is to talk this bill to death. It is a rather long eight minutes, anyhow. Of course, if the gentleman wants to kill this bill——

Mr. FORDNEY. Does the gentleman wish to withdraw the bill? I am told the gentleman wishes to withdraw the bill, is that so?

Mr. RAYBURN. I desire to make a statement. I say it looks——

Mr. FORDNEY. No; not in my time; I do not yield.

Mr. MANN. There is no chance to pass the bill in 15 minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentlemen on that side have filibustered against it. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. If the gentleman wishes to withdraw the bill——

Mr. RAYBURN. I have.

Mr. MANN. It does not require unanimous consent.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman time enough for that.

Mr. WELTY. He has already done it.

Mr. RAYBURN. I have withdrawn it about three times.

Mr. WALSH. The Speaker had not announced it.

THANKS TO THE SPEAKER.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Speaker call to the chair the former Speaker of this House, Mr. JOSEPH G. CANNON.

The SPEAKER. Mr. CANNON will please come forward.

Mr. CANNON took the chair amidst loud applause, the Members rising.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to offer a highly privileged resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 625.

Resolved, That the cordial thanks of this House are presented to the Hon. CHAMP CLARK, its honored and distinguished Speaker, for the able, impartial, courteous, and dignified manner in which he has presided over its deliberations and performed the arduous and important duties of the Speakership during the present term of the Congress now about to end.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, at this late hour there is no time for me to make any remarks, and I ask for a vote on the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was unanimously agreed to by a rising vote.

Speaker CLARK resumed the chair amid great applause, the Members rising.

The SPEAKER. Members of the House of Representatives, this is four times in succession, at intervals of two years, that Mr. MANN has offered a resolution similar to this one. Four times I have thanked the House for these final resolutions, and three or four times for occasional resolutions of the same sort.

I take infinite pride in the fact that I have been Speaker of this House for eight years. Mr. Speaker CANNON and myself have served longer consecutively than any other two Speakers. [Applause.] Henry Clay was elected six times, resigned twice, and served 10 years and 245 days, but he did not serve as many consecutive years at any one time as Mr. Speaker CANNON and myself. It is a strange historic fact that every day that Henry Clay ever served in the House he was Speaker of it.

I take great pride especially in this Sixty-fifth Congress. No difference what critics say, it has done more important work than any other two Congresses put together that ever served the United States. I heard Mr. SHERLEY say not long ago that, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations for one year, he had been instrumental in appropriating more money than had been appropriated before since the foundation of the Government. That is a remarkable record.

And I want to say, and I want the news to go forth, that in this Congress, with such tremendous burdens to bear, the Republicans acted as patriotically and as faithfully as the Democrats. [Applause.]

The duties of the Speaker are very largely judicial. No man can afford to be unfair in the Speaker's chair. No Speaker can afford to make a ruling for a temporary emergency that he is not willing to stick to and stick by on all similar occasions.

I have not words to express my gratitude for the very handsome, friendly, and pleasant way in which this House has treated me. I hope my successor will have as pleasant a time in the Speaker's chair as I have had for the two years ensuing.

The pendulum swings first one way and then the other. The first House of which I was Speaker had 65 majority; the next one had such a majority that we hardly ever counted it; the third one had 35 majority; and this one had none. [Laughter.]

In separating, as we will in a minute or two, I wish every Member of this House prosperity, happiness, and length of days. And, in the language of Tiny Tim, God bless us everyone. [Applause.]

SENATE.

SUNDAY, February 2, 1919.

Omitted from the Record of Sunday, February 2 (legislative day of Friday, January 31), 1919.

Memorial Addresses on the Late Senators Stone and James.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR STONE.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I present the following resolutions and ask for their adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read.

The resolutions (S. Res. 433) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate assembles as a mark of respect to the memory of Hon. WILLIAM JOEL STONE, late a Senator from the State of Missouri, in pursuance of an order heretofore made, to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Senate again expresses its profound sorrow at the death of the late Senator from Missouri.

Resolved, That the Secretary transmit a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives and to the family of the deceased.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire at this point to yield the floor to my colleague [Mr. SPENCER].

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, in the infallible record of the Holy Scriptures it is written: "There are three things that are never satisfied, yea, four things—say not, It is enough." The first of these is the grave, always demanding, constantly receiving, ever insatiable.

Again its awful power has been felt in this Chamber and ruthlessly it has summoned from service and association and cooperation WILLIAM JOEL STONE.

In the sad hush of death and in the calm reflection that follows thereafter, many things are forgotten which perhaps ought never to have been remembered, and many things are remembered which certainly ought never to have been forgotten.

After death the big things commendable and worthy of emulation in the character and speech and action of him who is gone appear like gold from the refiner's fire, and the dross of human imperfections so common to us all become alike valueless and discarded.

Great in mind, great in speech, great in accomplishment, as was the distinguished Senator from Missouri in whose memory we are this day assembled, he was conspicuously great in his loyalty and fidelity to his friends.

Ingratitude in public life is doubly regrettable and despicable. The small man when he finds himself in the possession of the place or the power for which he craved is apt to forget the help and self-sacrifice and encouragement of those by whose efforts his ambitions were gratified, and he yields easily to the suggestion of indifference or neglect in anything that concerns their interests and does not directly advance his own.

No one ever accused Senator STONE of either disloyalty to his friends, personal or political, or of indifference to the things in which they were interested. He was a friend, tried and true, faithful and loyal and in every county of Missouri there are multitudes of those who have followed his political career in the county, in the House of Representatives, as governor of his State, and as a Member of this body, and who constantly believed in him, trusted him, loved him, and revere his memory.

One of the repeated events of the political campaign last fall which I shall always remember was the loving devotion of this great number of people, most of them well advanced in years, who could not speak of Senator STONE without a tear, and whose affection and admiration, which represented the accumulated growth of a generation, nothing could either shake or destroy. He was the dominating power in the councils of his party for 30 years. When danger threatened, when differences of opinion became acute, it was to his wise council and unquestioned party loyalty that all factions turned in confident willingness to abide by his decision, certain alike of its fairness and its wisdom.

He had the courage of his convictions. He won his political battles even when the odds seemed largely against him. He was one of the great men of his party in his State and in the Nation.

The eloquent words which he himself used in his great eulogy of James N. Burnes, of Missouri, in the House of Representatives 30 years ago this month, may with fitting propriety and with peculiar appropriateness be used of Senator STONE:

> He had iron in his blood. He was a dangerous man to wrong. He knew how to remember, how to resent, how to revenge. A fallen foe or a repentant one he was ready always to forgive. Accessible at all times to honorable reconciliation, an open foe did well to guard with caution and watch with apprehension. He was fruitful of resource, adroit in attack, masterful in defense, relentless in pursuit. His enemies, whether those who had done him a positive wrong or those who had stood as obstacles in the way of his great purposes, had never any reason to doubt that soonor or later an opportunity would come to test his mettle. He fought as occasion required, but honorably. Some who stood against him, in their most promising periods of apparent safety, have suddenly felt their foundations sinking and seen the fabric of their strength falling about them without comprehending the cause of disaster. Others he has confronted and sprung upon with the roar and crush of a lion, impatient of restraint, and swept them away at once. While his enemy stood upon his feet to strike and defy, he had in his blood the merciless instinct of battle and in his brain the inspiration of the warrior. But when the sun went down upon a battle finished, there came back to his heart the gentleness of a woman and a longing to forgive and be forgiven.

As an orator Senator STONE was magnetic, forceful, eloquent in diction and in manner, thrilled and thrilling in the earnestness with which he felt and proclaimed his sentiments. Personal gain had for him neither temptation nor attraction. The best years of his life he gave to the service of those whom he represented. Efficient and painstaking, alert and resourceful, sympathetic and intelligent, he was ever engaged in the duties of his public life and had neither the ability nor the time to acquire anything for himself. He died a poor man in the things of this world.

Sorrow and joy are mingled together in this memorial service. Sorrow because of the vacant place, the vanished touch, the silent tongue, the lost companionship; joy in the reflection of the great things and good things which abound in his long life of great public importance. We bow our heads in sorrow, but in the very midst of grief there springs up with ever-increasing frequency both gratitude and love for the good things that abide and forgetfulness of the mistakes and errors that are forgotten. The things that have been wrongly done and the failures incident to every life, let us write them in the dew of the morning that the rising sun may destroy forever the record. The things in which we rejoice and which we emulate let us carve upon marble that it may with the increasing years survive forever.

"If a man die, shall he live again?"

It is the agonizing question in the hearts of those who remain. It is the problem that demands solution by every open grave. It is the unspoken thought of every mind.

Of the life beyond the grave Senator STONE had no doubt. Years ago he said:

> This I do know that there is in me, as in you, a feeling which is independent of mere desire, a strange conciousness that is not connected with any sense of fear or hope, that there is something in us that is not "of the earth earthy"; that is not of this mortality, mortal. I take hold of this.

In the last hours of his life he sent a message to Sims, the veteran barber of the Senate, whose love for the word of God and its teaching is known to many Senators upon this floor, and from whom Senator STONE had more than once heard the simple story of the cross. He died on the very day when he had expected to again hear this aged negro preach, and the message which he sent is characteristic of what was running in his mind at the last, for he said, "Tell Sims to continue to preach the gospel."

Other things assume their proper place of insignificance in the shadow of eternity. Pomp and power and wealth and strength are empty baubles when death comes into view. It is so compellingly invincible. Its very silence speaks infallibly of its overwhelming power. Whether it comes without expectation or in the course of waiting, it is alike the manifestation of the absolute helplessness of man and of the power of God.

Once after traveling for hours over the plains and looking upon the distant hills and valleys and admiring now more and now less the changing scenes of ordinary things about me, I came—almost without warning—to the very brink of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado that stretched out as far as the eye could see in a continued picture of indescribable grandeur.

Mountains of varied colors were piled upon mountains of changing hues, and in spite of their mammoth size seemed almost lost because of the far greater immensity of the gulf in which they lay—a gulf which the ceaseless river, looking like a slender band of silver at the distant bottom of the canyon, had cut through the centuries out of rock and earth.

I gasped for breath at the wonder of it. Man was impotent either to create it or to imitate it or to prevent it. It was like the rising of the sun by day or the queenly luster of the moon by night—the mighty work of Omnipotent God.

So in this hour we stand in solemn awe before death, impotent to delay or prevent. Kings and paupers are alike subject to its imperial decree. It is God at such a time with whom we have to do. He "who hath measured the waters in the hollow of His hand, and meted out heaven with the span, and comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure, and weighed the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance."

Money and rank and earthly achievement like the froth of the boiling cauldron, which for the moment is most conspicuous, soon disappear and fade away. The enduring things, fidelity, loyalty, sympathy, integrity, bravery, gentleness, are the characteristics that abide, and above them all that simple faith which, like a little child, accepts the things which God has promised and the words which He has spoken.

I never stand above a bier and see
The seal of death on some well-loved face
But that I think one more to welcome me
When I shall cross the intervening space
Between this land and that one over there—
One more to make the strange beyond seem fair.
And so for me there nothing is in death,
And so the grave has lost its victory;
It is but crossing with abated breath
And white set face a little strip of sea,
To find the loved ones waiting on the shore,
More beautiful, more precious than before.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, we have gathered here to-day in memory of one who was in public life, with certain intermissions, for nearly 45 years, a record of public service and personal sacrifice rarely equaled even in the United States.

WILLIAM JOEL STONE had the force of character, ability, and education which equipped him for great success and a prosperous career in his chosen profession. Had he followed that profession he would have attained all the luxuries and indulgences which success in it brings. Yet he listened to the call of public service and at the age of 24 years took up the burdens of public life, which he carried with few intermissions until the age of 70, when he died in harness.

I have coupled with this public service a suggestion of personal sacrifice, and that was characteristic preeminently of this great Senator from Missouri, for practically all his life he lived, as he died, a poor man, content with the rather meager salaries which attach to public office. There was a quiet dignity, as well as a suggestion of pathos, in Senator STONE'S attitude toward the world in which he labored so long, so ably, and so patiently for such modest recompense, when he might, like others of his ability, have commanded so much. I feel justified, therefore, in speaking of him as one who made a personal sacrifice in serving the public.

Mr. President, before a man reaches the Senate of the United States he has as a rule gone through a number of severe struggles which have on more than one occasion tried his mettle. I doubt, however, whether any Member of this body ever passed through a more tempestuous career of political struggle in his own State than did Senator STONE. He not only went through those struggles for himself but he went through those struggles for his party, to which he was deeply attached, and he went through them for his friends, for whom he was ready to make all sacrifices. He was a seasoned veteran when he came here.

He delighted in combat. He combined a wonderful degree of courage with a very unusual sagacity, and at all times he exhibited that fidelity to his convictions and to his friends to which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] has already referred. In all these contests he showed himself to be a foe to be feared and a friend to be trusted.

When he entered the broader field of national politics he took naturally and of right a high position of leadership. I remember particularly in the great Bryan campaigns, which began with the mighty revolutionary contest of 1896, WILLIAM JOEL STONE was one of the few old honored leaders who did not desert the standard of his party but who came forward with all his resources to carry out the party decree that had been rendered at the Chicago convention. Later, when his party was triumphant and Wilson was elected President of the United States with a Democratic Congress, Senator STONE gave to the great constructive measures, which distinguished particularly the first term of President Wilson, all the ability and all the energy and all the enthusiasm which he possessed. He struggled to bring about that party solidarity and party discipline which were absolutely necessary to carry these great national measures into effect.

Senator STONE had been a tower of strength in the days of struggling Democracy, and he became one of the active forces which made effective the great measures that were undertaken.

Mr. President, let us not forget to consider the great, final sacrifice of Senator STONE'S life. I have said he lived a life of public service and sacrifice. I fully believe that in the decision he reached, under which he felt compelled to separate himself from the dominant will of the country, under which he felt compelled to vote against the war which the country had decided on, he made that final sacrifice which only a strong and courageous man is willing to make in adhering to his personal convictions. I do not know with whom Senator STONE consulted. I doubt whether he consulted with anyone. I knew something of his decision before he made it public. I endeavored to dissuade him from it, but I found he was adamant in his conviction that he was right. He felt that he could not change his position without sacrificing his self-respect and doing violence to his conscience. He could easily foresee the storm of criticism which he invited, but he was willing to make that final sacrifice. He was ready to bear the criticism of the world and the opprobrium which enemies visited upon him; he was willing to encounter all that for the sake of adhering to what he believed to be right.

Senator STONE, as I have said, was a fighter. He was a man who had won his way into public life by adherence to his convictions and by devotion to his party. He was the "stormy petrel" of politics. The greater the storm the higher he rose above it. He was not willing when the great crisis came to yield his convictions. He was against war and so recorded himself. But when the country had made its decision and war was declared we all remember how Senator STONE took up actively and energetically the fullest and most complete support of all the measures proposed to make that war a success.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, my acquaintance with Senator STONE covered a period of more than 20 years. Sometimes it had been of a close and intimate character, sometimes it had resembled that of a casual acquaintance, but from the beginning of the period until Senator STONE'S death I admired him for his courage, for his ability and fearlessness, for his disregard personally of the character of the opposition he aroused or encountered. I believe he as unhesitatingly expressed his views, his likes and dislikes, as any man I ever knew.

A good many of us recall how once a presidential candidate of our party characterized the section of the country from which I come as "the enemy's country." We all probably remember the scream of opposition and antagonism in the public press when that expression was used. A political campaign had to be conducted in my section of the country as well as elsewhere, and WILLIAM J. STONE was asked to take charge of and manage that Democratic campaign. He knew as well as any man what effort was involved, how unfriendly for the most part would be the attitude of the potential forces, and yet, as a duty he felt he owed to his party and his country, he accepted the work and conducted that campaign so far as it could be conducted in a masterly manner, taking advantage of every opportunity to further the interests of his party and its then candidate with great tact and consummate skill. Apologizing to none, currying favor nowhere, but maintaining the integrity of the principles of his party in the contest in every way, he overlooked no opportunity of which a brilliant intellect and tireless energy could avail itself.

It was a great pleasure to me to be associated with Senator STONE whenever our relations were of such a character that they could approach semi-intimacy. He was a very charming man in his personal relations with his friends, and I had the privilege of occupying that position from time to time, broken sometimes by periods of absence and now and then by occasions when we had somewhat violently disagreed on public matters or on questions of policy. Any man who lived with Senator STONE, in my opinion, had such periods. So far as I was concerned, at least, while courtesy might control him in small differences, when anything approached a fundamental difference it was well to be prepared for any condition of antagonism that might arise.

Senator STONE was a strong man and fought hard. When he felt strongly, personal consideration and personal friendship did not control his thoughts, speech, or action. He was undoubtedly a wise, able, and sometimes an intense advocate, and on such occasions personal considerations and personal relations, so far as my observation went, had little weight with him. He was a great believer in the efficacy of party regularity and party organization, and impatient of the actions of anyone unwilling or unable on ordinary occasions to subordinate his views to the opinions of his colleagues when those opinions were expressed clearly by the majority, and he never hesitated, so far as I know, to express to his colleagues, whether of his own party or the opposition, his opinion of their acts or position, and used no honeyed words to soften the asperities which might be engendered.

For his own part, there were very few occasions when he could not bring his own action into accord with what he knew to be the considered conclusion reached by his party associates. A man of this kind, Mr. President, is a useful legislator. My judgment is that either branch of Congress is better off the more men of this type are found among its Members. Life sometimes is not so pleasant, personal relations are often not so agreeable, but no man who respects strength and vigor and ability and the frank expression of views held by his colleagues can fail to appreciate the life and character of WILLIAM JOEL STONE. No one despised more than he a "carpet knight" in politics. He was a leader of men, and lead them as commander of the fighting forces.

There have been occasions when mistakenly, as I think, he assumed positions on public questions not held by a majority of us. His attitude was almost invariably misconstrued and commented upon in an unfriendly way by many enemies, most of whom he despised; but, in my opinion, no one could ever properly accuse Senator STONE of being un-American, or unpatriotic, for no man more consistently than he, after we entered into the great war, more loyally supported measures intended to strengthen our country, to uphold her power, and to bring her forces to efficiency and victory.

Senator STONE was a brilliant man; he was a clever man; he was an eloquent man; and he gave to his country the best that was in him. He has been a distinct loss to this body and those of us who knew him best, even when cordial relations were sometimes interrupted, but whose appreciation of him survived monentary differences, know well that Senator STONE was a strong, able, conscientious American patriot, a great man, and a good friend.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the Senate has assembled to-day to honor the memory of one of our late and distinguished colleagues, Senator WILLIAM JOEL STONE, of Missouri. While I did not have the pleasure of the close personal relationship with Senator STONE, either in committee association or long service enjoyed by some Senators, yet our association on the floor of the Senate and in other ways compelled my admiration of him and his tireless and efficient attention to the duties of his office.

Missouri is one of the very great States of the Union—important in natural resources, in its location, in its principal cities, and, more than in other ways, in the character of its people. When I came to the House of Representatives in 1904, as a result of the Republican landslide of that year, the political complexion of the delegation from Missouri had changed to some degree. I found there, however, firmly entrenched in the confidence of their constituents several strong Representatives, and notably among the leaders in that body two men who had even then made their impress on the House of Representatives and on the country—David A. De Armond, who at that time was a member of the powerful Committee on Rules and one of the deservedly leading debaters and Members of the House, who came to an untimely end in attempting to rescue his grandson from a burning building; and the other, the present Speaker of the House of Representatives, CHAMP CLARK, who, with great credit to himself and his State, is completing a term of service in that position as long as that great office has been held by any man in the history of our Government.

Being a new Member, with a maximum of time and a minimum of responsibilities, I had opportunity to study political conditions. Quite naturally my attention was called to a State which retained and promoted men of such ability and qualities, and my interest led me to look into the past and the then present senatorial representation of Missouri, only to find that the characteristics and qualities which had caused the selection of such Members of the House of Representatives had been equally evidenced in the selection of Members of the Senate from the earliest days of the State. Mr. Benton was an important figure in a Senate led by some of the greatest men in our political history, and his prominence and usefulness served as a standard which has been maintained throughout the life of the State down to our own time in the selection of men of great capacity to represent Missouri in the Senate.

As a recent example of this custom, Missouri was represented in the Senate during the last years of the nineteenth century by two of the most conspicuous men who have served in this body—the silver-tongued Vest and that sterling militant figure, Francis Marion Cockrell, who only recently ended his service in connection with the National Government.

Notwithstanding the great qualities of these men and others to whom I have not time to make special reference, they were succeeded by one who, in my opinion, excelled them all in political wisdom and leadership. Senator STONE was for many years a leading figure in this body. While I had never heard him speak when engaged in the practice of law, he was undoubtedly a most effective advocate in civil life. He at least brought that quality to the Senate and became the skillful advocate of the interests of the people he represented and of his political party. That he performed that service with great effectiveness is known to every man with whom he served. Those who have heard him will never forget his ingenious pleas for any cause in the interests of his constituents or the Democratic Party, although the soundness of some of the policies he advocated was sometimes questioned by his political opponents and even by his political friends. I have never heard any stronger arguments in such matters than he has made in this Chamber, and his loss to his State and to his party in this body is as nearly irreparable as can be the loss of any one man.

I had kindly and friendly relations with him. While an extreme partisan, he was on most cordial terms with many of those not aligned with him politically, and I shall never forget one incident in my political life which will always make me recall his friendly tendencies toward his associates. Soon after I entered the Senate I made a trip to the West, which was largely political in its character. This was well known to Senator STONE, and my errand was not one which in any way obligated him to give any attention to my visit to his State. Yet when I arrived in Missouri he was one of the first men to call on me at my hotel and welcome me to his State. He not only did that, but he took particular pains to express his friendly views about me and my mission to those of my political party, with whom he was on close intimate personal terms. While I did not learn this from him personally, I had ample evidence of its truth in many instances, and it showed a most unusual kindliness and friendly disposition toward a political opponent.

Few men have had a longer or more varied political service. Senator STONE served six years in the House of Representatives more than 30 years ago, was governor of his State for a term of 4 years, and served in the Senate for 15 years, undoubtedly having a life lease on the latter office. While he had reached an age when men might naturally be expected to retire or, at least, modify their activities, he continued strong and vigorous to the end, and if he had been spared I am confident he would have continued for many years to have been an important figure in senatorial life and in the leadership of his party.

Senator STONE was a consistent party man. He had a sincere belief and faith in the wisdom of the principles and policies of the Democratic Party, and to the day of his death he never tired or relaxed in his efforts to advance his party's cause. While I could very seldom agree with him on matters of political policy, I never questioned the sincerity of his faith in the doctrines he championed and the vigor and sincerity with which he advocated them compelled my respect and admiration. I feel that I am expressing the sentiments of my colleagues when I say that his passing is deeply regretted among his old associates in this body, and in his death the citizens of Missouri have lost a representative whose first thought was of them, their welfare, and who was a most jealous guardian of their interests.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the eloquent eulogies to which we have just listened leave but little for me to say, but the occasion and my loyalty to the memory of one whom I was proud to call friend bid me speak. We pay tribute to-day to one who was a great American, a tried and proven statesman, a sincere and uncompromising Democrat, a superb and intrepid leader, a strong, independent, genuine man, who in a long and illustrious career established himself in his State and in the Nation.

During the memorable political campaign of 1896 I first met Senator STONE, though his name and achievements were known to me prior to that time. During the campaign just alluded to his qualities of leadership were conspicuously demonstrated. Thereafter and until his death he was one of the greatest political leaders in his party. Later, and when I had opportunity to become intimately acquainted with this great man, my admiration for his ability, sagacity, chivalry, and all those elements of leadership developed in so preeminent degree in him was increased. When he was called from our midst I felt—paraphrasing the words of Burke—like saying, "The age of political chivalry is done, and the glory of political leadership has departed." But, like all men who strive mightily, with undaunted courage, and who contend for the triumph of the principles in which they sincerely believe, he provoked animosities and encountered fierce opposition. The path of the strong men, of the bold and uncompromising men, always has and always will be beset with difficulties. This is true in every field of human endeavor. It is conspicuously true in the political arena and in all those fields relating to governments and questions affecting the State. Leadership results from contests, from the conflicts which ever will exist among a progressive and virile people.

Senator STONE was deeply versed in the psychology of the people; he knew well the lessons taught in humanity's volume and had no illusions concerning the fierce and continuous struggles awaiting this and all other peoples. He was no visionary, and deduced his line of conduct from the experiences of the past and his rational and comprehensive studies of his day. Some men become leaders because they are opportunists. They seize upon some passing whim or seize the banner carried by a hysterical crowd. Such leadership is false and deadly. It brings humiliation to the erstwhile leader and defeat and disaster to his followers. Senator STONE was profoundly impressed with the view that there is an underlying immutable law which manifests itself in what we call evolution in the inanimate world, and which finds expression in the social progress we behold in the human race.

While he regarded society as dynamic and not static, he believed it to be subject to unseen but nevertheless irrepealable laws. Cause and effect had application in human affairs and in the world's development and activities. Believing thus, he sought to understand the evolutionary processes finding manifestation in the world, and to conform his conduct, and so far as possible the conduct of others, to these unseen yet controlling influences to which all are subject. He sought to ascertain the motives and purposes of individuals, communities, and nations, the conflicting currents which bore humanity, the causes and effects of individual, community, and State action and conduct. These questions he studied, and studied thoroughly. In his active and analytical mind these great forces and questions were weighed and balanced. Such study and effort gave him wisdom and qualified him for safe and brilliant leadership.

His keen and discriminating mind enabled him to divine the dangers to State or party as well as to anticipate the plans and purposes of his adversaries. One of the distinguishing characteristics of Senator STONE was his devotion to his political principles and the political party with which he was identfied during his entire life. This devotion did not result from a desire for place or power, but rather from his supreme love of country, the form of government under which we live and the principles for which the Democratic Party stands. He recognized that political parties were essential under our form of government, but he believed that political parties should exist not for the gratification of the ambitions or desires of any person but for the preservation of the Republic and the liberties of the people. Believing that the mission of the Democratic Party was to preserve the Constitution of the United States and maintain the sovereignty of the States and the rights reserved by them as well as by the people, he earnestly devoted himself to that party. Merely to be successful was not what he sought; he sincerely and earnestly desired his country's welfare. Autocracy or imperialism in any form was obnoxious to him. His political philosophy found expression in the undying teachings of Jefferson.

Senator STONE always trusted the people. He was vigilant to oppose power and any movement which sought to deprive the people of the States of the rights, liberties, and prerogatives which, under our dual form of Government, they have reserved to themselves. In his view, this great party was charged with the sacred and holy task of defending the Constitution of the United States and the individual liberty of the American people. He was profoundly impressed with the view that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, and that there is no promise of immortality even to a Republic which recognizes that all just powers are derived from the consent of the governed. Accordingly he viewed with apprehension any movement looking toward a deprivation of the States of reserved rights, and the assumption of power and authority by the Federal Government not delegated to it.

By many he was regarded as a strong partizan. Strong men become strong partizans. Principles which they believe in become a part of the fiber of their being; they are ready to fight for them; they gladly die for them. But, I repeat, his devotion to party was superinduced by his love of country. If I were asked to name the chief characteristic of WILLIAM J. STONE, I think I should unhesitatingly say it was love of his country. He believed in this Republic, in its destiny; he regarded it as a rich benefaction from an overruling Providence, a patrimony not to be squandered but to be sacredly protected; a light which in the darkness of the world was to shine to illuminate the pathway of the oppressed and downtrodden throughout all the world. I think he exemplified in his loyalty to country the words of a great writer, who said:

> Holy is my hearth;
> Holy will be to Thee my house.

His country was his hearthstone; it was his sacred house which was not to be defiled or destroyed. To him it was always holy; he desired that to all others it should be holy. When I think of Senator STONE, I remember the words of another, who said:

> I do love my country's good with a respect more tender,
> More holy and profound than my own life.

As stated, he believed in party organization, not for party victory or party achievement or success but to defeat what he regarded as un-American principles and to preserve the Nation. He knew that in a pure democracy or in a representative government—and, indeed, in all political structures—there are contending forces, those seeking liberty, freedom, progress; others fighting for stagnant or retrogressive conditions. He realized that any party too long in power, free from opposition or criticism, will become stagnant, and finally reactionary and oppressive. Therefore he welcomed a strong and vigorous opposition party, and believed that under our form of government the principles of liberty could be best preserved through the instrumentality of virile, puissant, political parties contending in the public arena for supremacy. However, believing political parties as the instrumentality to bring about good government he regarded it as their sacred duty that they should stand for moral principles and for freedom and righteousness, accepting the view that the Constitution of these United States is a visible manifestation of God's providence to the world. He felt that political parties were corrupt and immoral if they sought mere party advantage or their course tended to the undermining of our Government.

Mr. President, I am profoundly convinced of the fact that this great man did not regard the Republic as a phantom or a passing dream, but he believed that it would endure for the ages. He therefore consecrated his life to the preservation of the Republic and the principles of liberty for which it stands. He had a profound reverence for the fathers and the founders of the Republic and regarded political truths as sacred and immortal. He belonged to the school of political thought which believes that there are certain fundamental principles of truth and righteousness which may constitute the fabric and foundations of governments, the same as there are immortal truths that are the basis of religion and of the spiritual life. He believed with Hamilton that "the sacred rights of man are not to be searched for in old documents and musty records. They are written as with the sunbeam in the whole volume of human nature by the hand of divinity itself and can never be erased by mortal power."

Possessing these views, he sought the faith and teachings of the founders of the Republic and of his party for wisdom to guide him in his tempestuous, heroic, and intrepid career.

Mr. President, another striking characteristic of this great man was his sincerity. Carlyle, who philosophizes and teaches, declares that sincerity is the chief fact about a man. Sincere men, of course, are often wrong; but a sincere one, when right, is the safest of leaders. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has just alluded to the strong convictions which Senator STONE possessed and to the fact that when, after serious meditation and study, he had reached a conclusion, he was adamant. He followed his convictions to the end, regardless of consequences, and knowing at times full well that such a course would result in denunciation and the most violent opposition. The truth of this statement is exemplified in his attitude toward the war with Germany. Senator STONE believed that our Nation could avoid war with the central empires without detracting from its honor. Doubtless there were many reasons which combined to lead him to not support the resolution which was the equivalent of a declaration of war against Germany. Perhaps his sympathy for the people—the wives and mothers who would lose husbands and sons—strongly influenced his determination to oppose entering the war. The daily reports of the sanguinary conflicts upon the fields of France and Belgium brought to him inexpressible sorrow. He grieved at the sufferings and sorrows that were overwhelming Europe and other parts of the world. He hoped that this Nation could avoid entering the bloody conflict, and that its position as the leading neutral nation of the world would give it a moral power which could be exercised to pacify and heal the contending nations. He knew the horrors of war, the sorrows and the trials and the broken hearts and destroyed homes which it brings. "Unseen by the corporal eyes, but too clearly visible to the mind's eye, he could see the great army of the dead, the abandoned, the forgotten; the army of cruel tortures and prolonged infirmities, which pursues its fatal march behind what men so often call glory."

But, Mr. President, Senator STONE, as much as any living man, comprehended the aftermath of the war. He realized the stupendous problems which would arise when peace was declared. He could foresee the unrest and disorder, the unloosing of our social, religious, and other bonds, and the madness and chaos of the people. He looked with dread upon what the tide of war would bring to our own land and what its consequences would be with respect to our own institutions and our social structure. With prophetic eye he saw the picture which in part we now behold, and he dreaded the evils which now threaten the world. He felt that if we entered the war it might lead to an abandonment of the policies announced by Washington and Jefferson and Monroe, and the fathers who gave us the Republic. Perhaps some may say he was provincial, but he believed that this was the greatest Government of the world and that it should not be drawn into entangling alliances or into the great maelstrom of European nations. He wanted an American character; a great, powerful American Nation, independent of other nations, not chained or bound or limited by the political structures of other lands and climes. I remember speaking with him shortly before the declaration of war upon the part of this Government. He stated, in effect, that he was afraid of the future and the effects of the great tragedy being enacted in Europe; and then he added, "I want to keep this Republic as it was handed to us by the fathers." I remember that he referred to Washington and his position with respect to entangling alliances, and expressed the belief that if we entered war it would result in a departure from what he regarded to be the sound and safe policy for our country to pursue. He referred to several statements made by Washington, and one of them was a letter written by Washington to Patrick Henry. This morning I found the letter, and from it copied the following extract:

> My ardent desire and my aim has been * * * to comply strictly with all our engagements, foreign and domestic, and to keep the United States free from political connection with every other country, to see them independent of all, and under the influence of none. In a word, I want an American character that the powers of Europe may be convinced that we act for ourselves and not for others. This, in my judgment, is the only way to be respected abroad and happy at home, and not by becoming partisans of Great Britain or France, create dissension, disturb the public tranquillity, and destroy, perhaps forever, the cement which binds the Union.

There can be no question, Mr. President, upon the part of those who knew Senator STONE but that his opposition to war was in part based upon his sincere conviction that war would bring sorrow and suffering to the American people and likewise jeopardize the Republic and endanger the welfare and prosperity of the American people. He was preeminently American. He loved his country and he idealized his State. His affection for the State of Missouri was really pathetic. He spoke the name "Missouri" with a love and an affection found in the voice of a mother for her child.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has just referred to Senator STONE'S position on the war. Many of us differed from Senator STONE in his position taken upon this important question. We believed that the honor of our Nation, the defense of our Government and our people demanded that the United States should accept the condition of war which Germany had created, and that we should cast our fortunes with Great Britain and France and their gallant allies in hurling back the advancing hosts of the central powers, who sought the conquest of Europe, if not the world. But to Senator STONE war seemed a great and unnecessary tragedy. He visualized its horrors and with prophetic eye comprehended the evils which would follow when peace came. But when we had decided for war no one more vigorously supported the Nation, the President, and the cause than did he. Senators will remember the tense and dramatic situation when the resolution recognizing a state of war was under consideration in this body. Standing in the aisle of this Chamber, Senator STONE, with deep feeling and unexampled earnestness, gave expression to his sentiments and voiced his view that if we entered into the war it would be "a colossal blunder." Then, in simple and eloquent terms, he stated his position as follows:

> But if the constituted powers of my Government, the powers constitutionally authorized to speak for the people on this momentous issue, shall decide for war, and we go into war, then I shall cast all doubts and forebodings to the winds, and my eyes thenceforth will be blind to everything but the flag of my country, borne by American boys through the storm of war, and my ears deaf to every call save that of my country in its hour of peril. If Congress unfurls the battle flag, however profound my sorrow, I will at once stand in salute to that flag, dutifully willing and ready to perform any service, to make any sacrifice necessary to bring the cause we espouse to a successful issue.

When the Nation spoke he saluted the flag and followed it and the brave and gallant American soldiers with a solicitude and devotion unsurpassed by anyone.

He cared but little for nonessentials, but was firm and unyielding when principles which he regarded as fundamental were involved. Criticism from enemies did not affect him, but the criticism of friends grieved him to the heart; but neither criticism nor opposition from friend or from foe swerved him from the path which he conceived to be the path of duty. In thinking of him I am reminded of the words of Channing, when he said:

> I call that mind free which protects itself against the usurpations of society, which does not cower to human opinion, which feels itself accountable to a higher tribunal than man's, which respects a higher law than fashion, which respects itself too much to be the slave or tool of the many or the few.

While not in agreement with him upon all views which he expressed or positions by him taken, I nevertheless respected his intellectual honesty, his mental integrity, and the motives and purposes by which he was guided.

Senator STONE was solicitous for the welfare of the people. He desired this Republic to lead the world, and the American people, by reason of their ideals, their achievements, their devotion to the cause of freedom, to be the evangels of a strong and enduring political faith. I recall his interest in all efforts to unify the polyglot population within the United States. Frequently he talked with me concerning the separatist movements which had prevented the amalgamation and absorption of the aliens who had come to this land. He was anxious for the adoption of some plan that would Americanize the alien in our midst and enable him to comprehend our form of government and the institutions under which we live. Deeply sympathetic with the masses who had sought industrial and political freedom under this flag, he regarded it as the duty of the States and the Nation to afford them full opportunity to enjoy the bounties of this land of opportunity, not only material bounties, but those finer spiritual and ethical ones which have blossomed, even if they have not come to fruition, under our institutions.

I repeat, Mr. President, his thoughts were always for the people, for their welfare, for their prosperity, for his State and its progress and development, and for this Republic and its perpetuity. But his political views recognized that the prosperity of a nation depends upon the development of individual character and an adherence to those virtues which are the product of rational conception of the relations of the individual to the State. I think it can be stated of Senator STONE that his conceptions of what was essential to a vigorous and prosperous Commonwealth were in harmony with the words of Lecky when he declares that a nation is prosperous when and as long as—> its foundation is laid in pure domestic life, in commercial integrity, in a high standard of moral worth and of public spirit, in simple habits, in courage, uprightness, and a certain soundness and moderation of judgment which springs quite as much from character as from intellect. If you would form a wise judgment of the future of a nation, observe carefully whether these qualities are increasing or decaying. Observe especially what qualities count for most in public life. Is character becoming of greater or less importance? Are the men who obtain the highest posts in the Nation men of whom in private life and irrespective of party competent judges speak with genuine respect? Are they of sincere convictions, consistent lives, indisputable integrity? * * * It is by observing this moral current that you can best cast the horoscope of a nation.

Mr. President, with other Senators I went to the State which our departed friend represented in this Chamber. I attended the simple but inspiring funeral services, where loving friends from far and near gathered to pay their final tribute of love and affection to one whom they had followed for so many years. A deep and profound religious fervor rested upon all, and the services portrayed the faith, that simple yet mystic and undying faith, which Senator STONE had in the life beyond and in the merciful eternal Father who guides men and nations.

Perhaps he would have experienced some difficulty in his lifetime in defining his creed. He was not dogmatic, nor, indeed, could it be said of him that he was orthodox, and yet if we accept Kant's definition of religion it may truthfully be said that he was a religious man and exemplified his faith in his life. The philosopher says—

That religion consists in recognizing all our duties as divine commands.

Perhaps his religious creed might be summed up in these words:

Religion is a belief in an everlasting God; that is, a divine mind and will, ruling the universe and holding moral relations with mankind.

Religion was not with him a metaphysical abstraction nor, indeed, a scientific formula. He did not concern himself as to whether it was susceptible of scientific administration, but it was to him nevertheless something which was real and indispensable to man's welfare and social progress. It may sound paradoxical, yet I think it is true that even men of the greatest intellect and who demand the application of the strictest rules of logic and who accept many of the teachings of science, deny the application of such principles when they come to deal with the spiritual forces and the religious faith which form so important a part in the life of men and which so powerfully determine the character and nature of human conduct. And thus it is that men have felt that "no form of belief is capable of functioning as a religion in the evolution of society which does not provide an ultrarational sanction for social conduct in the individual."

By some it is regarded as a phenomenon that with the remarkable utilitarian developments of the age and the marvelous results derived from applied science there should be profound faith in an Omnipotent and Omniscient Being to whom man is accountable and from whom it is contended springs spiritual and moral forces for man's advancement. And the astonishment becomes greater upon the part of the extreme materialist when he witnesses the great number who accept the evolutionary principles preached with such fervor and enthusiasm by Darwin, Haackle, and Wallace, who gave the contributions of their mighty genius to the world. But no hypothesis or alleged demonstrable scientific truth, no rationalistic creed or comprehended or incomprehended system of philosophy has driven from the human heart the longings for immortality, the faith in the power and the mercy and the goodness and the justice of an Everlasting and Eternal Father. This faith or belief, whatever it may be denominated, is not so much concerned as to whether it is logical or rational or conformable to scientific formulæ. Even if conceded to be ultrarational and incapable of being defended by acknowledged canons governing the intellectual and scientific mind, it insists, however, that the great motive power which has propelled humanity forward has been the ineradicable faith in an Eternal and Merciful Father, which, in all ages, has glorified the human soul.

He believed in God, the Eternal Father; he believed in Christ, the Saviour of mankind. His faith was perhaps not the result of intellectual effort or the analytical processes of his mind. I do not think he attempted to defend it upon the ground that it had a rational sanction, but, nevertheless, it was a living, vital thing, commanding obedience to the laws of righteousness, devotion to the everlasting Father, and sacrifice and service—the true expression of the Christian life. I think he would have said of himself, as was written by another:

What am I? Naught!
Nothing! yet the effluence of Thy light divine,
Pervading worlds, hath reached my bosom, too;
Yes, in my spirit doth Thy spirit shine,
As shines the sunbeam in a drop of dew;
Naught! but I live, and on hope's pinions fly
Eager toward Thy presence, for in Thee
I live, and breathe, and dwell, aspiring high,
Even to the throne of Thy divinity.

Mr. President, we regret the loss of our departed friend; the Nation needed him, his State needed him, his party needed and still needs him. In this hour with the stupendous problems confronting not only this Nation but the world; problems made and forced upon us by the devastating war through which the world has just passed, his services would have been of inestimable value, and his loss becomes more apparent. God bless his memory. May we profit by the illustrious example which he has left for our guidance.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, within the borders of Kentucky there have been born into the world many individuals who have lived exemplary and useful lives; many who have served their fellow men in marked degree and their country heroically, as a whole; many who have met the responsibilities of citizenship and have discharged faithfully the duties of public office; many who have traveled the road to fame and at its end passed to the other life respected, loved, and honored. Among these distinguished sons, whose labors and services were performed in large part beyond the boundaries of their native State, Kentucky can proudly claim WILLIAM JOEL STONE, who was born in Madison County, May 7, 1848. He was educated at Missouri University, which later conferred upon him the degree of LL. D.

When he was 21 years of age he was admitted to the bar and four years thereafter he was elected prosecuting attorney for Vernon County, Mo.

His mental capacity and physical energy pushed him into wider fields. He had a taste for politics and became a student of public affairs. His rare tact, genial dispositon, clear vision, sound judgment, and patriotic impulses made him a genius in the sphere of political activities.

He was elected to the Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, and Fifty-first Congresses. In 1893 he became governor of Missouri and gave the State four years of signal service as its executive.

As a member of the Democratic National Committee, 1896–1904, and as its vice chairman in 1900–1904, his wise counsel, untiring zeal, and devotion to the cause were felt and appreciated. He displayed throughout his career extraordinary ability as an organizer and his skill and tact were equally effective in management. He was elected to the United States Senate to succeed Hon. George Graham Vest for the term beginning March 4, 1903, reelected in 1909, and by popular vote in 1914 for the term beginning March 4, 1915. On April 14, 1918, he departed this life.

He had a trained mind of unusual capacity and strength. He possessed a gentle disposition, which drew men to him in bonds of attachment, lasting and strong.

He was patient, and at the same time aggressive and courageous in dealing with great questions and in debate.

He possessed in eminent degree the elements of leadership. His public service extended along two lines—executive and legislative. He was equally well equipped and efficient in both. The qualities of mind and heart manifested in these functions, reinforced by broad reading and study and thought, found expression in the field of statesmanship.

On the great committees of the Senate he was vigilant and untiring. In debate, on this floor, he was equal to any undertaking, and with a grace and an eloquence and power unsurpassed, he handled his subjects in the fashion of a master.

Particularly on Finance and Foreign Relations, the chairmanship of which latter committee he graced, his services were most effective. His manner and characteristics were original and peculiar to himself. An attractive personality, a wholesome sense of humor, and dignity of bearing, combined with expressive eyes and features that beamed with intelligence, assured him a warm greeting in any assembly, whether it meant social intercourse or a relentless encounter with opposing forces in some momentous struggle. He exemplified Edwin Markham's "Preparedness:"

For all of your days prepare
And meet them all alike;
When you are the anvil, bear—
When you are the hammer, strike.

Felicity of expression, wealth of information, charm of delivery, and fine presence made us recognize in him the magnetic, skillful orator.

He seemed to treasure no animosities. He was generous in his consideration of others, patient and forbearing toward those who opposed him, gentle and kind toward his associates, and unstinted in his love of those who had claims upon his affections.

Times came when he had to decide upon a definite course and the road ahead was not plain and clear. So far as I know, he seldom advised with others or consulted his closest friends, but he stepped aside with his own conscience and judgment and adopted the course they dictated.

I may illustrate this best by quoting his own words. In the course of debate, February 3, 1915, on the shipping bill, which he strongly supported, he said:

I have found out that whenever a man is opposed to a measure he becomes very sure that the people are against it; or, if he is for it, he is bold to assert that the people are for it; but I do not think that men who assume so much know anything more about the wishes of the people than I do.

The only way I have of knowing what the people want is to make up my mind as to what is best for the country, feeling confident the people will approve if I am not mistaken.

He ardently hoped his country would not become involved in the catastrophe which shook the world in 1914. He saw clearly what war meant—the loss of young men, a kind of loss which any nation can ill afford to suffer at any time; the destruction of property; the burdens of taxation upon the people loomed with all their terrors before him. He hoped there might be some honorable way of avoiding the calamities and suffering which war involved, even when it was plain that the war lord and military clique of Germany had deliberately proceeded to "Pour the sweet milk of concord into hell; uproar the universal peace, and confound all unity on earth."

But when the decision was reached that there was no escape for his country, and its duty was to rally its defenders of liberty and champions of civilization, and there was no choice but to meet force with force to the limit, he patriotically joined in the effort and supported with his great ability and unflagging energy and wise counsel every measure and step intended to make victory certain.

He stated his position with his usual frankness and sincerity on July 14, 1917, during the debate on the flood-control bill, H. R. 4961, as follows:

> You know, Mr. President, as every Senator and the country knows, I was absolutely opposed to plunging this country into this foreign, far-away European war. * * * I warned you and the country then that if we insisted upon this course we would open a Pandora's box, the multiplying evils of which no man was wise enough to forecast. * * * But from the beginning I have stated over and over again that while I looked with horror upon the proposal to involve this country in this foreign war, I would nevertheless loyally accept the joint judgment of the Congress and the President if they should, acting together, declare for war; and from that day forth I have stood steadfastly in support of the dominating forces of the Government which declared that war was necessary. That is the position I took at the start, and I shall abide by it. * * * I shall support the President and the Government in organizing our national resources and in using them to the utmost of our strength.

It was a sad day last April when we realized that he would be with us here no more. A personal affliction had fallen upon each of us; a real deprivation of the help we needed; a misfortune to the country he loved.

Until our friends go, never to return, we fail to realize how dear they are to us. We are left, however, with the consolation that memory keeps them ever with us, and in the quiet hours we can almost feel "the touch of the vanished hand" and hear "the sound of the voice that is still."

I believe I would not misjudge him if I made the estimate I venture to condense. He conceived true liberty to mean the privilege of doing "unmolested what the law allows."

And that real democracy means "organized self-control."

And that his conviction was that "out of the heart are the issues of life."

A deep and abiding love of country and a steadfast Americanism were the very lifeblood of his strong character.

Hear him from his conspicuous place on this floor, February 8, 1915:

> I am for America—our America—above all the world. The kind of men we need now and always need are men who stand uncompromisingly for America and American rights. * * * I care little for the opinions of American citizens who are not first and always really, truly, bravely American.

In the public service for nearly 50 years to his country and his country's cause he gave himself—justifying the application of Paul's tribute to the Macedonian church: "They first gave themselves."

The words of Addison's Cato can well be applied to our friend:

> 'Tis not in mortals to command success;
> But we'll do more, Sempronious—we'll deserve it.

And by his character and life he established such a relation between the soul and the Soul Maker he was prepared when the summons came to pass into the undiscovered future without dread.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, it was my good fortune the greater part of my life to know Hon. WILLIAM JOEL STONE, and during all of my life, from childhood, I heard and knew very much of him and about him. It was my good fortune to be born and to grow to manhood in the State to which Senator STONE rendered unusual service and brought signal distinction, the State of Missouri. We had very close mutual ties. There were those who were related to me who were among his lifelong supporters, ardent admirers, and close associates, and who were ever very loyal to him and who actively and earnestly supported him in every political contest in which he ever engaged which involved more territory than the county of his residence; effectively supported him in every political contest after he had ably filled the office of prosecuting attorney of his county and had branched out into a larger field of political activity. For years the name of Senator STONE was a household word in my father's family. As boy and young man in Missouri, I often heard him on the stump and delighted to hear him expound democracy. His fearlessness and earnestness charmed me.

I remember when, as a young man, he was first nominated for and elected to Congress, I being then a boy. When he was first nominated for Representative in Congress I heard it said that he had a brilliant future, and that he would make his mark as one of the ablest public men Missouri had ever possessed. He was then in the prime of vigorous young manhood and had already attracted to himself and drawn in his train an ardent and enthusiastic band of loyal, devoted personal and political followers who never abandoned him but who stayed with him, faithful and true through every political contest of his life. When first nominated for Representative in Congress he had acquired a reputation as an orator, student, and statesman which bespoke for him a brilliant career. He was then the pride of those who followed his plume in the arena of political combat.

When Senator STONE was a candidate for the Democratic nomination for Governor of Missouri, I was a voter and resident of that State, and I supported him for the nomination and at the election. I voted for him in the primary and at the general election. He was my choice. By that time I knew him personally and was an ardent admirer of him, as man and statesman; admired his ability, fearlessness, democracy, devotion to principle and leadership; and admired him for all those qualities which made him a renowned leader of men and valued champion of democracy.

In those days and for many years Senator STONE was the idol of Missouri Democrats. He had their admiration, love, and adoration. They trusted in him and looked up to him. They looked to him for leadership. The mantle of the renowned and departed Hon. George G. Vest, as leader of the Democrats of Missouri, fell upon Senator STONE. He was almost worshiped by his followers.

Senator STONE had the remarkable faculty of drawing to him great numbers of enthusiastic, devoted followers and of grappling to him with hooks of steel a great many very devoted and unswerving personal and political friends. He was a man of magnetic personality. As a rule, his friends stayed with him. In that respect he was signally marked as a leader of men.

When I entered the United States Senate, Senator STONE had been a distinguished Member of this body for quite a number of years and had a national reputation. I was received by him with the greatest kindness. He welcomed my entrance into the Senate with marked warmth and cordiality, and when I was new here he showed me many acts of kindness and consideration. He did very much to make it pleasant and agreeable for me here. Our personal relations were always of the most cordial and agreeable character. During my service here, until the demise of Senator STONE, I was fortunate in seeing a good deal of him and enjoyed personal association with him to a considerable degree. I often consulted him. Our relations were fairly intimate, and I enjoyed my association with him. At times I very sharply differed from him about matters of public policy and national welfare, but that never disturbed our uniformly pleasant relations nor my friendly regard for him.

I always admired Senator STONE'S intense devotion to his political party and its principles. Politically he was an intense partisan, and I always admired him for it. He was a Democrat because he believed with great intensity and fervor in the principles of the Democratic Party, and he adhered to them, championed them, and supported them on all occasions with an earnestness, enthusiasm, and devotion which drew my strongest admiration. He believed implicitly in the virtue of his party and never hesitated to array himself on its side as a devoted partisan. His intense fidelity to party principle was, to my mind, most admirable. He was more partisan, I admit, than I, but I esteemed him for it.

Senator STONE was a hard fighter. He never slackened or wavered in fighting for what he believed to be right. He was an incessant fighter for the principles of his party, believing them to be the true principles of government for a self-governing people. Believing the success of his party meant the good and welfare of all the people, he fought for the success of his party in season and out of season. There was never any doubt about where to place him in party matters. This I considered a most commendable trait, for he stood for that which he firmly believed to be right and best.

Senator STONE was one of the bravest men whom I ever knew; brave mentally, morally, and physically. Absolutely, he did not seem to know what fear was in any sense of the word. He would defy anything or anybody if he thought he was in the right. His fearlessness was one of his distinguishing traits all of his life, and it had much to do with drawing to him that devoted band of followers and supporters, always back of him and standing with him, ever faithful and loyal.

Senator STONE rendered distinguished service to his State and Nation. He was one of Missouri's foremost characters, one of the Nation's great men. He accomplished much and leaves much good work behind him. To his family he leaves a splendid heritage, to his host of devoted friends a fond memory, to his State a career of usefulness, to his country nation-wide fame. He had some great qualities. As statesman, student, scholar, publicist he had real ability and great accomplishments.

Senator STONE was an outspoken man. He never hesitated to speak out what was in him. It was a matter of comfort to many of his friends, of whom I counted myself one, that in his last illness he professed faith in and reliance upon the saving grace of his Redeemer and looked forward to eternal life with his Maker. Farewell to him, but not to his memory. I take this occasion to discharge a sad duty, to exercise an estimable privilege in paying an humble tribute to his worth and testifying to the pleasant relations that always existed between us. May it be well with his soul.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, all who knew Senator STONE will appreciate the splendid tributes that have been paid here to-day to his worth, because they will realize that the tributes were deserved.

The entire Nation recognized his great ability. The Senate realized his power upon the floor of this Chamber, his brilliancy and his logic.

Those who served with him in committees found him there tireless, painstaking, and wise. For nearly six years I served with him on the Finance Committee, the detailed labors of which are great. No item of revenue bills escaped his scrutiny, and at all times it was his earnest desire to let the tax burdens fall where they could be borne with the least trial; at all times it was his thought to see how the less fortunate in life might have their burdens lightened rather than increased.

I had the privilege for several years of rooming just across the hall from him in the Senate Office Building, and I frequently saw him. If I were asked from my personal association with him to name his two most controlling characteristics I would say, in addition to his mental power, that they were his courage and his love. I do not believe Senator STONE knew what fear was; he was unconscious of physical fear, and he had no fear of consequences to himself as a result of his conduct. He was moved always with the earnest purpose of determining what he ought to do, controlled by his judgment, led by his love. If ever swayed from his mental judgment it was by his love.

He loved Missouri and he loved all the people of Missouri. He loved his country and he loved the people of his country. He loved his immediate family with a tenderness and gentleness that would have adorned the character of a woman. He was checked at times in his mental action by his love and by his unwillingness to cause sorrow or distress to those whom he loved.

Senator STONE was honest to an extreme degree. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has referred to the fact that he made sacrifices for his public service. He could have been a man with great income at the bar, but he gave his time to the public service rather than to the accumulation of worldly goods for himself; and in all of his long career in the public service never a time did he think of a place where he might make something financially for himself. The subject of financial gain for himself never touched his life.

Mr. President, I feel excused for mentioning a little incident that touched me very much, which occurred when I was riding out home with him within about 12 months of his death. We lived in the same section of this city, and frequently he rode out with me in my machine or I rode out with him in his. One evening, as we were riding home, with a glow of delight all over his face, he pulled a little piece of paper out of his pocket and said, "This is a receipt for the premium on my life insurance policy." He put it back in his pocket and called the name of his wife, whom he loved so tenderly, and said, "The reason I am so pleased that I have paid it is that it makes me know she will have this sum if I am called away. While I am here I can provide for her, but this gives her something if I am called." The amount was not very large, but it was pathetic to hear this man of powerful intellect, who could have done so much for himself in a financial way and for his family, if he had turned his thoughts and talents in such a direction, filled with joy that this conservative-sized policy was to guarantee to the partner of his trials and his joys some little comfort when he was gone.

I saw Senator STONE a number of times when he was taking the course which was perhaps the greatest trial of his life. I had known for 12 months before that period how earnestly he desired that his country might escape from embroilment in the European slaughterhouse. When the time came that most of us felt we could remain out of the war no longer, when the overwhelming sentiment of the country justified the action that brought us into the war with the German Empire, I talked freely with Senator STONE and urged him to vote with us. I pressed it on him; I tried to show him that it was his duty to himself and to his associates. I know perfectly what controlled him. He talked with freedom about it. Up to the last I plead with him. He simply said, "I see what it means—billions of debts burdened upon the people whom I love; and, worse than that, perhaps millions of our boys lost in France. We can not go into this war without really going into it." He continued, "If I could give my life and have the sacrifice end there, I would not hesitate a moment; but it is all these sons of mothers throughout the land. I can not but feel that something can be done to save these mothers' sons."

It was his love for his people. If he could have laid down his own life he would have done so without a moment's hesitation, but it was the lives of others and the sorrow that was to be produced that caused him to take the position which he did. But the moment the decision was made and the war was begun, on every possible occasion he stood in his place in the Senate and supported his country in every possible way. Others cast the die; it had to be; then all that he could do to help to whip the enemy and win the war he gave with entire freedom and thoroughness. That he should have been criticized was natural; that he would be criticized he knew; none understood it better than he; but it never moved him a particle. That vote was controlled by his intense love for his people, whom he would have spared, if he could, the trials of war.

He was a great man; a great intellect; but, again I say, the two controling powers of his life were his courage and his love.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, when I came to Washington as a Member of the Fiftieth Congress, one of my first acquaintances was WILLIAM JOEL STONE, who had served in the Forty-ninth Congress. This acquaintanceship ripened quickly into a friendship of such enduring qualities as to weather and overcome the vicissitudes of a long life.

When Mr. STONE resigned his seat in the House of Representatives to accept the governorship of the great State of Missouri I was enabled, through a continuous correspondence, to keep in the most intimate touch with him. When, as the successor of the great George Vest, Gov. STONE returned to Washington and took his place in the Senate our daily personal relationship, after an interregnum of only a few years, was resumed. Later, as successor to John Tyler Morgan, whom all Alabamians are wont to call "our greatest," and who with dignity and rare wisdom for so many years graced this Chamber, I entered upon a service in the Senate. From that moment until death placed its icy fingers on his heart I was in closest, most intimate association with the man of whom to-day we speak.

As a result of this long and unvarying friendship I can qualify as a witness who knew him well; and as such it is not so much my function to recite the biographical and chronological events and incidents of what was truly a great career as to bespeak very briefly and very generally the real merits of a mind and soul which so incontrovertibly affected the destiny of our country.

It is my conclusion, expressed not with the temperamental consideration with which one regards the dead, but in solemn, stern sincerity, that STONE was one of those mortals in whom the elements so mixed as to produce a great man. His gift for adroit leadership came of a keen and discriminating intellect, radiating in his speech and action the resiliency of a remarkable mind, and of a deep-seated, ever-abiding vision which gave him uncanny prescience of how the operations of to-day would affect the destiny of to-morrow. And thus it has happened that less ably equipped men have declared in one instant that STONE by a speech or a subtle move on the political checkerboard had wrecked the entire fabric of things; in the next, with the full light of successful issue glowing, they have acclaimed him a strategist of the most excellent talent.

As a rival manager of a presidential aspirant in the Baltimore convention of 1912 I was constantly aware of the subtle genius of Senator STONE—a genius which but for unexpected and unparalleled defection in his own ranks would have carved out a notable victory. But when one weighs the relative merits of mind and heart, that genius can not be compared to that fidelity to trust, that allegiance to duty, which prompted him to submerge and subdue his own great disappointment and assume the post of confidential leadership in the victor's administration. For four years, with unvarying faith, he piloted the President's legislation through this body, and at the end of that time he was found preparing a platform of such appealing parts that the people of the Nation, won by the spirit of humanity it breathed, were happily induced to give the President a second term.

Senator STONE, being a man of purpose, was necessarily a man of opinion. As such at certain intervals he found it necessary to think and act for himself. Nothing so aptly indicates the sincerity of a man as when, driven by honest purpose, he leaves the primrose path of least resistance and, bereft of former friends, trudges the rocky road of conviction. And yet such is perverse nature that it is against this very type of man that the world, forgetful of past service and the certainty of honest differences, turns and inveighs with scorn and contumely.

Senator STONE in the very twilight of his long service shared this common fate. When he declined to lead the fight for the so-called "armed neutrality" bill he was made the target for the darts of learned critics bursting with the force of their own erudition—innumerable darts tipped with the venom of ridicule, abuse, and slander. And yet, while the storm raged, we who knew STONE and who differed with him knew also that according to his conviction he was right, and that, irrespective of the fate prepared, he could have pursued no other course with honor to himself.

For my part, I know that he had reached his conclusion after long contemplation; that he took the unpopular side when on the other great prestige might easily have been gained only because of honest and sincere conviction that the unpopular side was in that emergency the side of right and justice. And, Mr. President, permit me in this day, when the passion of that day has subsided, solemnly to express the opinion that much of that bitter criticism directed at Senator STONE was unjust, unkind, and even cruel. And from knowledge of the man I bring testimony that that serenity of countenance—misinterpreted as indifference—which distinguished him in that trying moment was nothing more or less than a manifestation of a resignation which perfectly concealed an inward and permanent hurt.

He was as some grim stone of the sea on whose surface a raging tempest made impress, but whose base it could not cause to tremble or its parts to disintegrate.

Mr. President, I am very grateful to a Providence which has made it possible for me thus to speak of my friend, who has gone into that peace which surpasses understanding.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, for five and twenty years my relations with WILLIAM JOEL STONE were close and cordial. We were intimate and affectionate friends. He was governor of the great State of Missouri when I first met him. Grover Cleveland had just entered upon his second presidential term. Economic and financial conditions were sinister, and the atmosphere was heavy with portents of an approaching financial earthquake. And the President's well-known disapproval of his party's sentiments, emphasized by his aloofness from the influence and cooperation of its leaders and statesmen, justified their apprehension of an impending political cataclysm.

The crisis came in June with the closure of the Indian mints to the coinage of the silver rupee. Within a very few days thereafter Gov. STONE delivered a masterly address upon the situation. It clearly analyzed the causes and foretold the consequences of the panic should these causes be ignored or misunderstood, and the remedies they plainly outlined be rejected. His message to the people was that of a clear-visioned, farseeing statesman. They hailed it as the voice of a skilled navigator to the pilot, counseling a course that would rob the storm of its perils and lay the Nation to its ancient ways. But the hopes of the people were turned to ashes of disappointment, and the voice of STONE became as that of one crying in the wilderness. The storm descended; the commander pursued his stubborn, unyielding course, and overwhelmed his country in measureless disaster.

I met Gov. STONE very shortly after this incident, and hastened to express my gratitude for what I conceived to be an incalculable service to the public. He was then seriously concerned for the immediate future, a concern that was for the country. I early discovered what many of his countrymen questioned in after years, that Gov. STONE was a patriot in the highest and best sense of that much-abused and frequently misunderstood term. He was a radical and uncompromising partisan, but his country, her welfare, her interests, as he understood them, was the influence which above all others commanded his affection and inspired his conduct. His view of service, of her policy, her interest, and her duty might subject him to reproach and obloquy, but they were the fruit of his anxious and deliberate reflective judgment. They might be wrong, but they were his, and he maintained them with all the vigor of courageous conviction. Abuse and misunderstanding might subject him to the denunciation of popular clamor and the rebuke of statesmen, cajolery and persuasion might join with threat and vituperation to force his reluctant hand, but he would bear them all with serene fortitude and with the confidence of certain, though tardy, approval. Failing that, he could go his way unto the end, though he might travel barefooted and alone.

I shall not review the long record of Senator STONE's public service. Others have done that and done it well. It was a full and an honorable one—not perfect, for that is never humanly possible. He made mistakes, and they were broad ones, in keeping with his nature and breadth of vision. They were not the result of impulse, but of earnest and continued reflection.

His view of America's attitude toward the great war was in the first half of its bloody course unquestionably that of the overwhelming majority of his countrymen, who shrank from the ordeal of a world conflict with all the intensity of an enlightened peace-loving people. Nothing save Germany's insensate disregard for neutrals and neutral rights, exemplified many times in acts of appalling horror and unmindful of repeated warnings, could have involved us.

The crisis finally came with her resumption of indiscriminate submarine warfare, followed by the President's request for authority to arm our merchant ships for defense against this deadly form of national piracy. Senator STONE was opposed to granting the desired authority. He felt that the allies had transgressed our rights as a neutral power quite as frequently and as flagrantly as had Germany, and that the proposed measure would precipitate a war which might yet be avoided without dishonor. No request for additional authority to deal with the allied invasions of our sovereignty had been made, and none should be granted in the pending instance. He therefore protested and spoke against the joint resolution clothing the Executive with the desired power. The two situations were, to my mind, fundamentally different. He did not think so, and he gave his reasons at length to the Senate at a time when the Congress was rapidly nearing its close. For this he was unsparingly denounced by a vigorous and vindictive chorus of disapproval, whose echoes had not ceased when he passed away. He was accused of filibustering against the resolution. The fact that he spoke against it for nearly three hours, and that the Congress expired before a vote could be reached, gave strong color to the charge. Yet, knowing Senator STONE so well, I feel justified in saying, as I said many times while he was living, that he had no such purpose. He felt bound to give his reasons for his position, and as he always did on occasions of unusual importance, he prepared himself thoroughly and in writing. He was very deliberate in speech, at times painfully so. Except on rare occasions of great excitement, he never hurried. Such a man always requires time for delivery. And Senator STONE, without a thought of the fleeting moments and the rapid approach of the fateful 4th of March, pursued his usual way. It was unfortunate, since the public condemnation was somewhat justified, and, protests to the contrary, unavailing.

But he made no protest. He bore the consequences and met the storm without flinching. Consistently with his view, he cast his vote in the following April against the declaration of a state of war with Germany. The friends who knew him well deplored the fact, while expecting nothing else from a man who seldom changed his convictions once they were fully formed. While I regretted the Senator's dissenting vote, I could, from my own experiences of the Civil War, understand his point of view.

During that conflict we were both boys living in the South, and face to face with all its seamy sides. We knew what war meant. We had been made rudely and daily familiar with its carnage, its waste, its terror, and its destruction. We could recall the long lists of casualties; the endless processions of the dead; the hordes of armless, legless, blind, and mutilated survivors of the battle fields; the black badge of universal mourning; the agony of widowed hearts and the tears of orphaned children. We could visualize the returning skeletons of want and hunger, the destruction of cities, the laying waste of the country and the pillage of the harvests, the hordes of refugees fleeing from the pathway of advancing armies, the thunder of the guns, and the shouting. I knew that he shrank with horror from the reinfliction of war's curse upon his country, and I would have given my life willingly on that fateful 6th of April, did the sacrifice avail, to spare the Nation the agony of another war. But it had to come. We could neither stay nor avoid it. The progress of the world had garnered its seeds within her bosom. They were to germinate, to ripen, and be harvested, even as others now dimly perceived shall grow and be garnered in the fullness of time.

War having been declared, Senator STONE accepted the cast of the die and gave the Government his constant and unfailing support. He voted supplies and men, contributed of his modest substance to war loans, and devoted all his energies while he lived to its vigorous and successful prosecution. He died when the great German offensive of last spring had reached its farthest advance, when Paris laid almost at the Kaiser's feet, and Haig's indomitable Britons, with their backs to the wall, were slowly yielding to his terrific onset for the Channel ports. The allied reverses of the month preceding his death wrung his heart and filled his mind with anxious forebodings. Doubtless the strain they imposed upon his weakened energies was a contributing cause to his sudden death.

Senator STONE was one of the most powerful intellects of his generation, one of the strongest men who ever occupied a seat in this body. His slow and deliberate speech was in direct contrast to the rapidity of his mental processes. He saw all sides of every problem, and, with rare powers of analysis, would quickly resolve it into its most prominent elements. He was a competent judge of men. He was a born political strategist, a debater of the highest order, and one of the most eloquent of men. His voice was clear and penetrating, his words well chosen, his diction perfect. But he was at his best only when absorbed by the ardor of conflict. His talent for controversial discussion needed the stimulus of active, if not extreme, opposition. When thoroughly aroused all his faculties were enlisted, and well he knew how and where to direct them. It was no surprise to those who knew him well that as a candidate soliciting the support of his people he never had been beaten.

The convention of 1896 blazed a new pathway for the Democratic Party. Rightly or wrongly, it wrote a declaration of principles whose advocacy meant aggression. It was no longer defensive or apologetic. That it would rend the party asunder was inevitable. That it would be immediately successful was only possible. That it committed the party to a new and radical propaganda, which it must thereafter acknowledge whether it would or not, was beyond question.

Gov. STONE was the chairman of the Missouri delegation to that convention, charged with the duty of securing the nomination of the Hon. Richard P. Bland for the Presidency. He did not accomplish that, for the unexpected happened; but he did more to shape the course and mold the proceedings of that great convention than any other member of it. If Bryan was its apotheosis, STONE was its soul incarnate. His influence was in the very atmosphere of the committees through which its course was directed. Yet there was no assumption of leadership, no assertion of authority, no contentious wrangling for position. Quietly, constantly, persuasively, and effectively he moved past obstacles, overcame difficulties, compromised differences, and suppressed resentments. It was a turbulent assemblage where passion flamed high and opposition countered hard upon every subject involved in its deliberations, where crimination and recrimination thrust and parried from its commencement to its close. Through the maze of its bitter contentions and animosities the hand of Gov. STONE guided the majority safely and steadily to its goal of ultimate accomplishment. As one of his modest aids on that historic occasion, I here pay my tribute to his consummate powers of leadership and organization. A noted public man before, he now became a national figure, and so remained until his death.

Had he devoted himself to his profession Senator STONE would have been a great lawyer. A mind lured by the attractions of material success would have chosen the bar instead of the forum. But he was indifferent to the enticements of fortune. He died a poor man. That was once the signal distinction of a public official. It is still a most honorable one when the official began his career without fortune. He lived well and modestly, content with the companionship of wife and children, whom he loved and who loved him in turn. His domestic life was singularly felicitous. Within the charmed circle of his home, companioned by a wife the gentleness and refinement of whose character shone through her countenance with the soft radiance of a spiritual beauty which time's effacing fingers can never destroy, and blessed with the affection of their children, he found all the joys that a resentful world would have denied him. His heart, his affections, his hopes, and his fears were centered at his hearthstone. He has gone, but the record of what he did and what he was remains. By that he will be judged, and judged correctly, when the excitements of a world conflict shall have subsided and passion no longer warps or obscures the opinions, when men, clear-visioned and deliberate, can with impartial justice review events and careers in the far perspective of receding years.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it is not my intention to discuss the life or to detail the public services of our distinguished and lamented colleague. That labor of love has been done by those who knew him longer than it was either my privilege or my pleasure to know him.

I desire to pay a word of tribute to one or two of his most distinguishing virtues and to call attention to one or two of the most distinguishing traits of his character. In what I shall say I do not mean to institute any comparison between physical and moral courage. Each has its value, but they have such different standards of value that no true comparison can be drawn. Physical courage is the more common and may therefore be regarded as the more elemental. Moral courage is the less common, but it can not be regarded as the less admirable virtue.

Physical courage is all but universal in the kingdom of animal life. It is one of the commonest traits that flesh is heir to. We can almost discern traces of physical bravery in the protoplasm, in the stuff that life is made of. We can mark it alike in the cell as well as in the conquering hero. The microscope reveals deeds of desperate daring even among the denizens of the dewdrop. Physical courage is exhibited among the embattled ants. It is exhibited by the tigress of the jungle as she prowls for prey. It is displayed by the timorous bird as she defends her nestlings with her life. It was exhibited by the dragons of the prime as they tore each other in their slime. The lion of the desert may be as indifferent to danger and as insensible to fear as a Richard of the Lion Heart.

Physical bravery springs from instinct rather than reason. Indeed, it comes from elemental instinct. It is the essence out of which comes the first law of nature. To our finite vision it does not seem to be at all times scrupulous as to the character of its cause.

We love to believe that "he is thrice armed who hath his quarrel just," and yet by our standard no quarrel is so unjust that may not find champions and defenders willing to sacrifice their lives. This was ever so. We find the savage of the forest quite as willing to die in battle as the phalanx of Greece or the legions of Rome.

Upon the battle field of Chalons the Europeans and the Asiatics joined issue as to which race should control the destinies of western Europe. The Hun and the European died with equal desperation. Upon the bloody field of Tours, the Christian and the Mohammedan submitted their issue to the wager of battle. There they determined which religion should prevail over the future destinies of western Europe; the followers of the Cross and the followers of the Crescent fought and fell with equal devotion.

In the wilderness of this western world men of English blood laid down their lives to vindicate the self-evident truths of the Declaration of Independence. On the other hand, men of English blood laid down their lives to prevent the establishment of this free, this self-governing, Republic.

I say this to prove that every cause may find its champions. I repeat that the despot has been able to find followers who would sacrifice their lives to perpetuate their own chains.

In vindicating the principles of freedom our fathers laid down their lives in the noblest cause that can challenge the sacrifices of human nature. The principles typified by the Stars and Stripes have never called in vain for champions or defenders. Those principles will never call in vain for champions or defenders so long as valor is esteemed a virtue and so long as heroism is honored among the sons of men. In defense of these principles the undying dead have sought for death as the bridegroom seeks his bride, and yet with equal alacrity have the followers and the minions of tyranny gone to their graves to establish or to perpetuate the reign of the tyrant, the sway of the despot, and the dominion of the autocrat. This is not strange. This is no mystery.

I repeat that physical bravery springs out of elemental instinct. It is one of the conditions of existence. It is the condition of survival. All existing generations of every existing species are the survival of long uncounted centuries of strife and struggle. These are the survivors. They are those who have passed through the crucible of unmitigated strife. In the supreme test the weakling, the coward, the parasite, as a rule, has perished by the wayside. This is the law of the Yukon, that only the strong shall thrive, that surely the weak shall perish, and only the fit survive. This at least was the law of the earlier ages of strife and of combat.

This law may have been in some measure modified by the improving principles of humanity and of civilization, and yet its reminiscences are seen repeated in the history of the race.

Moral courage is one of the rarest, one of the finest, I may say one of the divinest, attributes of God's image upon earth. Physical courage characterizes both "man and bird and beast." In its earlier stages it obeys necessity or responds to desire. It does not always, even in its later stages, distinguish between "the worse and the better cause." Moral courage characterizes rational beings alone, but, unfortunately, even among these it is not universal. It distinguishes between right and wrong and never wittingly prefers the worse to the better cause. Moral courage obeys the still small voice of conscience for conscience' sake. Moral courage obeys the behest of duty for duty's sake. Moral courage is alike indifferent to the hiss of the rabble and the applause of the multitude.

Physical courage may find reinforcement in the psychology of the crowd, in the psychology of the mob, but moral courage would rather be right than popular. Moral courage will not consent to be wrong in order to purchase a cheap and transient popularity. Moral courage is indifferent alike to the hisses of the mob and to the threats and the frowns of the mighty. Moral courage is indifferent to the temptations and to the blandishments of power. Moral courage never seeks the line of no resistance; moral courage never seeks the line of least resistance. Moral courage goes where the voice of duty commands.

Whatever be your faith, let me cite a crucial and historic instance. Peter denied his Master once, twice, and thrice before the crowing of the cock. He denied his Master rather than submit himself to the jeers of the accusing crowd. He declared that he never knew the Man. On the other hand, his Master accepted without complaint the agonies alike of Gethsemane and of Calvary. History has pronounced judgment upon these exhibitions of moral courage. It must always be the temper and must often be the fate of moral courage to drink the hemlock and to wear the crown of thorns. Indeed, sir, I do not know but that the crown of thorns is the official diadem of moral heroism.

There were many ties which bound me to our late and lamented friend and which bind me to cherish his memory. I use the word "friend" in the highest sense of that most sacred term. He knew both the art and the philosophy of friendship, which was to prove himself a friend. His followers loved him for his undoubted and undeviating fidelity. His antagonists honored him for his undaunted and undeviating chivalry.

I admired his talents, and I honored his public services. He was a practical man; he was a practical statesman. He never lost sight of the elementary needs of men, yet he never forgot the elementary rights of freemen. To preserve and perpetuate those rights he was equal to the supremest sacrifice, even to the transient sacrifice of his fair name among those who for the moment misunderstood.

"Without turning," he always stood for freedom of thought. He always stood for freedom of speech. He always stood for the freedom of the press—a freedom which was used, which was abused, by some to misrepresent if not to slay him.

I honored him for his moral heroism when occasion called for the exhibition of moral courage. Most of all, I honored him because he was among the few men who dare to speak truth to the people in the presence of the king, and dare to speak truth to the king in the presence of the people.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I request permission, on my own behalf, because of the lateness of the hour, to print as a part of my remarks a brief sketch of the public life of Senator STONE. In particular I am omitting that part of my address because these ceremonies have been prolonged by the great number of Senators who have desired to pay tribute to Senator STONE, and because, especially, the Senate is assembled also to-day to pay its last mark of respect to another distinguished Senator.

Mr. President, not often in the flight of years will the Senate on the same day meet to pay reverence to the memories of two such great men as WILLIAM JOEL STONE, of Missouri, and OLLIE M. JAMES, of Kentucky.

I ask the privilege of printing as a part of the ceremonies in honor of Senator JAMES some remarks I made about him in the Senate during his life. The observations have for certain reasons been thus far withheld from the RECORD. They were, however, the expressions of my estimate of Senator JAMES while he was living; they will serve as my tribute of regard now that he is dead.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). In the absence of objection, the request of the Senator from Missouri will be granted. The Chair hears none.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I can add nothing to what has been said of Senator STONE, so eloquently, so tenderly, and so sincerely said, for I know well that all who have spoken voiced the sentiments of their hearts.

This man was my friend, the dearest friend I ever had. I have tested his mettle. I have looked into his heart. I have seen his soul. He was as tender a husband, as loving a father, as sincere a friend, as chivalric a gentleman, as you will ever meet. He was as wise a man as I ever knew; he was as brave a man as I ever knew; he was as patriotic a man as ever lived and walked this earth.

All his life he gave to his country. He was not an office seeker, selfishly striving to gain the power or emoluments of position. He was a soldier who on the battle field of the world enlisted for life in the service of mankind.

Broadly speaking, there are two kinds of public servants, perhaps I should say of officeholders. There is a class who climb to public position by any ladder that their feet can touch and who, once seated in a place of power, seek only to maintain it for their selfish profit. These men, having gained position, put ear to ground that they may catch each rumble of popular opinion. They study not the safety of the State. They think alone of how they may keep safe the place they hold.

What an easy, lazy, selfish task to sit serenely and to never ask, "What is the right?" "What does my country need?" but "What is best for me, that I, forsooth, may cling to power, gathering the loaves and fishes of the place I have?"

Such men as I am now discussing frequently secure the very acme of public praise. Forever drifting with the stream, their course is without opposition, and they enjoy the tranquillity of uselessness. We find them basking in the sun. They, therefore, never feel the chill of adverse winds. As they are but the echo of the crowd, its generous applause rings constant in their ears. Such a course requires neither courage nor talent. A fair ability to guess what may for the brief hour be popular is all that is required. They do not serve the State, humanity, or God; they serve themselves alone.

But there are others, sir, and happily many, who place the call of duty above all selfish ends. We find them everywhere. The faithful servitor in private life who thinks more of his master's welfare than of the dollars he is paid. Such service is beyond a money price. The faithful officer of the country who makes its interest paramount and to it gives the best energies of his life. Such men are guardians of the portals of the State. There also is the man who, filling a great post of public trust, thinks only of what his duty is, who does not pause to count the cost to his poor self, but, keeping mind and eye fixed on the stars of justice and of truth, steers the straight course of honor. Such a man is statesman, friend of country and humanity, and such alone do serve their country well.

It has been well said here to-day how absolutely Senator STONE devoted his life to public service. Notwithstanding the fact that his conspicuous abilities as a lawyer rendered his career at the bar one certain of the most brilliant achievements, he early abandoned that lucrative profession to serve his country in the Congress. I shall in the sketch of his life later to be presented call attention to his activities in the House of Representatives. I characterize them now by one statement: His every vote as a Member of the House of Representatives may be examined, his every speech may be read, and there is not one vote that was not cast, there is not one speech that was not made, in defense of the plain, common people of this land, in support of our country's rights, in vindication of those great fundamental principles of democracy and of republicanism that have made this country the land of freedom, progress, and happiness.

From his fight to recover for our Government the lands that thieves had stolen by the hundreds of thousands of acres, on through his career in the House, his every act, his every vote, his every thought was upon the side of the people of the United States. No menacing power of wealth, no sinister influence, no consideration of self ever caused him to swerve a hair's breadth from the plain, straight path of duty to his country.

He became governor of the State of Missouri. Here I want to give to my associates a chapter out of his life which will show how long he suffered under unjust charges, under villainous criticism, and the causes for it.

With shame I say that my great State, like many other States of the Union, had in its legislative branch come too much within the influence of a corrupt railroad lobby. It was at that period when railroad officials conceived it to be their duty, or at least their interest, to seek to prevent legislation, however wholesome, by employing devious practices upon legislative bodies. Passes were handed out in great bales to legislators and their families. The railroad lobbyist was looked for by certain classes almost as the pay car by the regular employees of the railroad. It was under such conditions Senator STONE dared to demand that the Missouri Legislature should pass a fellow-servant bill which would abrogate the ancient and brutal common-law rule that an employee could not recover for injuries if they had been inflicted through the carelessness of a fellow servant. The defense that had been made in hundreds of thousands of lawsuits had left many a brave man's widow without a dollar to live upon. It had turned into the street as paupers thousands of orphans whose fathers, in the effort to save the passengers drawn by their engines, heroically died at their posts of duty.

Seeing their ancient legal fortress impaired, the railroad lobby rallied. The struggle was intense, bitter, and relentless. In the end the lobby was powerful enough to defeat the bill. In a message sternly demanding that the lobby should not be permitted to influence legislative action Senator STONE again demanded the enactment of the bill. So bitter was his castigation of the methods employed that he incurred the personal enmity of the members of the lobby and all of its numerous and powerful allies.

It was because of this service for humanity and the State that he became the victim of their slander and their abuse, which ran to such supreme heights and was carried on with such illimitable vindictiveness that many men were led to believe the foul slanders that were coined in the hearts of the criminals against whom our revered friend had sought to protect the State he loved and served.

Most of the actors in that drama are dead and gone. I shall not further dwell upon the theme. In Missouri, where the real truth is known, the people understand that there is not a blot or stain upon the honorable and pure career of WILLIAM JOEL STONE. From his labors at last came the statute that gave relief against the hardships of the old common-law rule. By his sturdy blows the lobby and the corrupt elements that had infested our capitol were given their first great defeat, a defeat which ultimately resulted in their extermination. When Gov. STONE engaged in that conflict he knew the cost; but then, as at all other times, he stood square fronted to the storm and did not for a moment flinch.

When he left the office of governor this man with these superb talents, who could have sold his time at any price, was in debt thousands of dollars, without, I believe, a hundred dollars' worth of property of any kind.

He engaged for two or three years in the practice of law, and in that short period was able to pay off all the debts he owed and lay by what might almost have been a competence to some men. When he again entered the public service his little fortune melted away like snow before the sun. He served until the end of his life in this body and died so poor that substantially all he left to the family he loved was a little life insurance policy.

Briefly let me refer to his labors as a Senator.

Men of the Senate, you have seen him toil unremittingly by day. You know how he labored in committees far into the night. When, some three years ago, the great finance bill was pressing, he undoubtedly broke his health by the tremendous labor he underwent. At that time he survived a sick spell that threatened to bring the end. He never was strong again; and yet he came to this body when he was so feeble that he could scarcely walk. He sat with his committees. He toiled and wrought unceasingly. Not a detail of duty was allowed to escape his vigilance and industry. And so, worn out and troubled, this old soldier serving a life enlistment in the army of patriotism came to answer the question that has been so often referred to to-day, "Is it my duty to vote to plunge my country into the great European war or is it my duty to seek to hold her back"?

I know his heart on that. I talked with him. I said to him:

It is the decree of fate; war will be declared. A vote against it will mean your political ruin. You are old and you have no property.

I wish—great God of justice, how I wish!—all the people of his State could have looked into his eyes as I was looking then and could have seen his soul as I saw it revealed and could have heard his voice, tremulous with emotion, as he answered:

I know what it means to me. I know this war is coming. I know the people are aflame with the spirit of battle. I know that it is inevitable; but would you have me consider my personal welfare in a case that involves the lives of millions of men, the heartaches of countless mothers, the breaking up of homes? I can not vote to send our boys into this conflict, to involve our country in this struggle, the end of which we can not see, and the results of which to our country and our civilization we can not prophesy. I can not so vote until further efforts have been made to avert the fearful sacrifices.

And so he cast his vote against the declaration of war.

Was it not a brave thing to do? Had he voted for war, he would not have been voting to send himself to war or into any danger. He would have been acclaimed a great leader. When he voted against war, he voted his own crucifixion for months, perhaps forever. Had he voted for war, he would not have voted to send his own son, for he was a distinguished Federal judge, beyond the age to be sent to war.

He would not have voted to send a single close personal relative, so far as I know. He was not thinking of himself. He was thinking of the sons of other fathers, the grown-up "babies" of other mothers, the husbands of wives, the fathers of children who would die on distant battle fields. He was looking at the orphans that were to be, the army of cripples that would soon march across our land. He was thinking of our country and the dangers that lurked after the war as well as in the war.

So he endured the torture of attack, the obliquy of slander, the shafts of abuse, and stood up bravely and without shrinking. But as the war went on each day he gave his thought, his heart, his energy to the success of the American Army. I say here what has already been, in substance, said: It was the grim advance of Germany's hosts that did much to break him down and to hasten the inevitable end. Day after day I was in his office, calling generally in the morning and finding him there almost invariably pacing the floor, in his hand a newspaper describing how the French were being driven back and back and how the gallant English were being forced to retreat, telling of assaults with poison gas and deadly shells that broke the heroic ranks of our allies and carpeted the ground with thousands of their gallant dead.

I saw him then and know how his soul agonized. I know how his body quivered with excitement and sympathy for our friends and for our cause. It was not hard then to discover that the old patriot and lover of his country could not longer withstand the agony. At last the strain became too great, the vital cord snapped. In the fullness of his intellectual power, at the zenith of his greatness, he halted. His work for country and for humanity had ceased.

There is no speech or tongue that can quite do justice to a life like his. Faithful to friends and true to every trust, through life's long battle he fronted every foe. His arm was never lowered in the strife. He never struck an unkind or ungenerous blow. He folded the mantle of honor about him and laid down upon life's battle field and sank into that peaceful slumber death brings the brave. There is no stain or taint upon his life, and at its end his friends and all the world can write, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

I present a brief sketch of the public service of Senator WILLIAM JOEL STONE:

CONGRESS.

Senator STONE was a member of the Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, and Fifty-first Congresses, his term beginning March 4, 1885, and closing March 4, 1891.

COMMITTEES.

During his term in the House he was a member of the Public Lands Committee, of the Selective Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and a selective committee appointed to investigate the labor troubles in Pennsylvania in 1888.

PRINCIPAL MEASURES.

His work in Congress was principally identified with (1) public lands; (2) reformation of the civil service; (3) amendments to the Judicial Code, having in mind the restriction of jurisdiction of the then United States circuit court; (4) opposition to fraudulent pensions; (5) river and harbor improvement; (6) repeal of silver-purchase law; (7) tariff reduction; (8) opposition to the force bill.

(1) Public lands: His services in respect to public lands were in connection with two great measures. One of these measures, which was not introduced by him but in which he took a very prominent part, was the repeal of the then existing laws respecting the acquirement of public lands. At this particular time a vast amount of the land being preempted or taken under the different land laws was being fraudulently acquired. It was estimated by Land Office officials that all the way from 70 to 95 per cent of the entries were fraudulent. A large amount, literally hundreds of thousands of acres of valuable mineral, grazing, and timber lands were being thus accumulated by speculators in utter defiance of the wording and spirit of the land laws, and, of course, to the detriment of the bona fide settler and entryman. The law in question, if adopted, would have had the double effect of protecting past frauds and making future fraudulent acts easy and safe. Against this proposition he fought during the entire three terms. His speeches upon this subject may be found in the RECORD for the Forty-ninth Congress, first session, page 7161; Forty-ninth Congress, second session, page 2023; Fiftieth Congress, first session, pages 5561, 5568, 5573, 5596, and 5606. They were models of research, logic, and forensic ability of the highest type.

The second measure affecting the public lands with which he was identified, and, in fact, the author, was a bill providing for the forfeiture by various railroads of land granted by the Government in aid of railway construction under certain conditions, which conditions had not been complied with by the railway companies—in other words, the return to the Government of donated land which had not been earned in accordance with the terms of the donation. These forfeiture bills involved something like 60,000,000 acres of land. After a fight which he led, lasting five years, the most of these laws were passed in substance, and there were returned to the public domain approximately 60,000,000 acres for settlement, thus affording homes and farms for 375,000 settlers.

His speeches upon this matter may be found in the RECORD of the Fiftieth Congress, first session, pages 5436, 5439, 5440, and 7039–7044; Fiftieth Congress, second session, pages 2674–2676; Fifty-first Congress, first session, pages 7002–7012.

Changes in the land laws affecting Oklahoma public lands, which would have made speculation and fraud easy: Fifty-first Congress, first session, pages 2210–13, 2216, 2218.

These speeches show the ability of a great lawyer, a profound reasoner, and give conclusive evidence of Senator STONE'S hatred of everything tainted with unfairness or dishonesty. They brought him into national prominence.

(2) Restriction of United States courts: He had been very much impressed by the injustice of the imprisonment of county judges in Missouri who had refused to vote tax levies to pay the old fraudulent railway bonds. Two of the counties involved—Cass and St. Clair—were in his congressional district. He was impressed deeply with the conviction that the United States courts, in issuing writs controlling the acts of State officials in their duties under State laws, were exceeding their constitutional powers and were breaking down the sovereignty of the State as guaranteed under the Constitution. He regarded it as of paramount importance to the welfare of the country that neither the National Government nor the States should be deprived of any of the powers granted in the Constitution. He believed that the tendency in the courts was toward a centralization of power and a crippling in an unwarranted and unconstitutional manner of the powers of the State. This he found exemplified in the change of the attitude by the Supreme Court of the United States in the matter of following the State court interpretation and construction of State laws and constitutions and in the writs issued to State officers as above. The latter evil had been brought, as I have said, vividly to his mind through the imprisonment of these county judges, who under the existing law were not only powerless to issue the orders levying the taxes in accordance with the judgment of the United States court, but would have made themselves liable to heavy penalties had they done so. He therefore introduced a bill providing that "the jurisdiction of the district and circuit courts of the United States shall not be deemed to extend to any judicial or other officer elected or appointed under the laws of any State to compel by mandamus or other writ the performance by such officer of any official act arising under or authorized to be done by the laws of such State." Upon the 5th of January, 1886, he for the first time introduced bills. One of these was the above, affecting United States courts. In every session thereafter he introduced this same measure and fought for its adoption. The speeches made in support of it are powerful and seemingly unanswerable constitutional arguments. They may be found in the RECORD of the Forty-ninth Congress, second session, page 1459, and the Fiftieth Congress, first session.

It may be of interest in this connection to say that, although unsuccessful in having this law adopted, he continued the fight during his term as governor, sending to the legislature a special message requesting the memorialization of Congress touching the matter and the passage of a law which would permit the governor, in any case where the county judge was inacapacitated, by imprisonment or otherwise, to act, to appoint a commissioner to do any and only such specified acts as the governor might designate and who should remain in office only until those acts were performed. This recommendation passed the house of representatives, but was killed in the State senate by what was denominated in the newspapers at that time as the "bondholders' friends."

(3) Fraudulent pensions: At the time he was serving in the House of Representatives a vast number of bills pensioning named persons were passed. This was done to such an extent that Friday night of each week was set aside and devoted to that purpose. Early in the first session of the Fifty-first Congress he began to oppose such of these bills as he regarded as fraudulent and unworthy. This opposition was unusual, startling, and daring, since it in a way challenged the opposition of the old-soldier vote, of which vote he had a very large number in his district. The position he took in regard to these bills was that each claim should be carefully considered upon its merits, the worthy claims allowed and the unworthy disallowed. He undertook the enormous task of investigating the great number of these claims in detail, and so effective was his exposure of the fraudulent character of many of them that during that term, which was his last in the House, the evil was effectually abated. His position on these matters attracted wide attention all over the country, and except from selfish or partisan sources met with universal approval. Some of his remarks upon these matters may be found in the RECORD of the Fifty-first Congress, first session, pages 2502–2509, 2763, 2254–2259, 2773, 3012, 3516.

(4) River and harbor improvement: Beginning with his first session in Congress and extending through the time he was in the House of Representatives he vigorously opposed provisions in the river and harbor bill appropriating money for the improvement of inconsequential streams. His position upon such improvements was expressed in the following sentence:

I would improve nothing by national legislation except important harbors and the important rivers of the country. (49th Cong., 2d sess., p. 921.)

His speeches upon this subject may be found in the RECORD, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, page 4246; Forty-ninth Congress, second session, page 920; Fiftieth Congress, first session, pages 3208, 3255, 3259–3261. The final part of the first speech made upon this subject, found in the RECORD, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, page 4246, is rich with rare humor, and is well worthy to stand beside Proctor Knott's famous Duluth speech.

(5) Repeal of silver-purchase law: At this time the United States Government purchased so much silver annually. During the terms he served in the House there was a violent fight over the repeal of this law, which would have resulted in the total demonetization of silver. Upon this question he took a strong stand against the repeal of the purchase clause. The first speech he ever made in Congress was in opposition. The first sentence, so far as the RECORD shows, which he uttered in Congress was the beginning of this speech, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I take it that statesmanship is never directed to better purpose than when it aspires to make the great masses of people contented and happy. (49th Cong., 1st sess., p. 2603.)

His speeches upon this matter are found in the RECORD of the Forty-ninth Congress, first session, page 2603; Fifty-first Congress, first session, page 5807.

It was undoubtedly STONE'S great influence which tipped the balance of Democratic opinion in favor of the ticket of free and unlimited coinage of silver. STONE was an ardent advocate of the nomination of Mr. Bland for President at the 1896 convention. Whatever may be the opinion as to the wisdom of the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, it is now practically admitted that the interests of the country demanded an increased volume of money. It is not too much to say that whether or not free and unlimited coinage of silver was a correct principle, it was a sounder doctrine than that the currency should remain stationary and contracted. This battle waged on behalf of the people undoubtedly brought good fruit in later years, and did much toward the final currency and banking reform under which the Nation now prospers.

(6) Tariff reduction: He was at all times strongly in favor of a reduction of the tariff to a strictly revenue basis. His views upon that matter may be found in the RECORD, Fiftieth Congress, first session, pages 3856, 4869.

(7) Force bill: Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, was Speaker of the Fifty-first Congress, and it was during that Congress the Republicans introduced and attempted to pass the infamous force bill, which contemplated the complete control of elections by Federal officials—military, if necessary. This bill was aimed to perpetuate in power the Republican Party by giving over the control of the South. No congressional measure in my memory has engendered the bitterness in congressional debate which this bill aroused. In both sessions of this Congress he made speeches against the bill. In the last of these speeches he did much to compass the defeat of the bill. Lovers of forensic eloquence would do well to read that speech. It is found in the RECORD, Fifty-first Congress, second session, page 1211. The other speech is found in the RECORD, Fifty-first Congress, first session, page 6848.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Other matters of importance upon which he expressed himself were as follows:

(a) In connection with a bill providing for arbitration between interstate carriers and their employees he indorsed labor organization and advocated the ownership by the Government of railways and telegraphs. (RECORD, 49th Cong., 1st sess., Appendix, p. 54.)

(b) He favored the irrigation of arid areas. (RECORD, 49th Cong., 2d sess., p. 8480.)

(c) He bitterly attacked "Czar" Reed's abuse of powers as Speaker of the House. (51st Cong., 1st sess., Appendix, p. 45.)

(d) He voted for and advocated an act prohibiting the importation and sale of convict-labor-made articles.

(e) The report, partially prepared by him, made by the selective committee on existing labor troubles in Pennsylvania in 1888 was such a thorough exposure of the unparalleled conditions of labor in that State that it attracted national attention and comment.

The distinguished services rendered by Mr. STONE as a member of Congress made him the logical Democratic nominee for governor. He filled that important position from 1893 to 1897.

AS GOVERNOR.

His entire administration was stormy and eventful. This was due partly from conditions affecting Missouri along with the entire country and partly from conditions peculiar to Missouri at that time. Among the former may be noted the financial stringency and panic and widespread labor disturbances on a great scale, including the American Railway Union strike and miners' strike. Among the latter conditions may be noted the marked reduction in the State revenues, the powerful railroad lobby which had control of the legislature, and frauds in elections in the big cities of the State.

The effect of the general nation-wide financial situation needs no comment.

There was widespread industrial discontent at the time, which included not only the railway and mine strikes noted above but the famous Coxey movement. The result of these disturbances was that the military arm of the State was called out in many States of the Union, including the three Missouri boundary States—Kansas, Iowa, and Illinois. Although Missouri was a great railroad and a great mining State, and these disturbances were as powerful there as in other States, the situation was so controlled that disturbances were reduced to the minimum, and at no time was it necessary to declare martial law at any point or to call out the State troops. This was the result, of course, of his firm but rational handling of the situation.

The reduction of the State revenue began about the first of his administration. Under the State constitution the rate of taxation for State purposes automatically changed from 20 to 15 mills when the assessed valuation reached $900,000,000. Up to the beginning of his administration the assessed valuation had been a few millions under $900,000,000, thus affording the maximum revenue. About the beginning of his administration it passed to a few million beyond the $900,000,000 mark, resulting in a loss of one-fourth of the tax rate, with no compensating increase in the assessed valuation. Also, in 1892, just before the beginning of his term, the main building of the State University had burned, and during his administration the normal buildings at one of the normal schools had also been destroyed by fire. In the face of this financial condition the affairs of the State were so handled that not only were all State needs met, repairs and additions to the eleemosynary and educational institutions made, including the present main building at the State University, but the State bonded debt was very materially decreased. At the beginning of his term this bonded debt amounted to $6,680,000, consisting of $1,380,000 at 6 per cent and $5,300,000 at 3½ per cent.

During this administration all of the 6 per cent bonds were paid off and $300,000 of the 3½ per cent bonds, thus reducing the bonded debt by $1,680,000, disposing of all of the higher per cent bonds, and reducing the annual interest demand by almost $100,000. As important items in connection with this subject, it may be said that the reduction of the annual revenue through the change of rate of taxation was about $500,000, and that during this time nearly $800,000 was expended in connection with additions and repairs at educational and eleemosynary institutions.

For years the railroad lobby had exercised a potential influence over the State legislature. The fight with this lobby began shortly after his induction into office through his attempt to have enacted a railway fellow-servants' law. The fight became bitter and personal, with the result that for the first time in many years the lobby was driven from power; and although they prevented the enaction of the fellow-servants' law during his administration, his work had been so effective that it was forced through by the first legislature after he left office.

There had been prior to and during his term of office notorious election frauds in the large cities of the State. He urged and secured the passage of fair-election laws which tended to minimize this evil.

He proved himself the friend of the public-school system of the State and a champion of the university, sending to the legislature a special message upon the latter subject in which he favored the establishment of a substantial endowment fund.

As stated in the discussion of his record in the House of Representatives, he sought to relieve the situation brought about in St. Clair and other counties by the imprisonment of the county judges, sending a special message to the legislature in that regard, advocating a memorial to Congress upon the subject, and a law empowering the Government to appoint a commissioner with special powers to carry on such parts of the duties of the county court as might be designated by the governor and which were necessary to prevent the paralysis of the affairs of the counties.

POLITICAL.

During his term as governor he took a very prominent part in State and national politics. Among the subjects in question to which he devoted himself was the silver question, with which you are familiar. Others were as follows:

During his term the American Protective Association reached the zenith of power. This was an organization whose sole purpose was to oppose the holding of public office by any Catholic. It introduced into politics the religious issue, and seems unquestionably, at least in Missouri, to have been allied with the Republican Party. It became very formidable and public men were careful in opposing it. He, however, declared vigorously against it, denouncing it in unmeasured terms as un-American and fighting it so effectively that the Democratic convention of 1894 adopted as a plank in its platform a denunciation of the organization. The fact that he was bitterly denounced for this action and received a great number of letters threatening his life had the, with him, natural result of increasing his opposition.

Out of all his speeches I am sure he would have me select for preservation here these words which he uttered in the Missouri campaign of 1894. He would desire to have them preserved because he spoke them out of the fullness of his heart, because they mirrored his broad, generous soul and his true Americanism:

Thomas Jefferson was the father of the Democratic Party. On his tomb is an inscription which he had written for himself, "The author of the statute of religious freedom of the State of Virginia."

There are men within the hearing of my voice now, I doubt not, who recollect how the so-called Know-nothing Party rose up and became a political potentiality in the forties. Its objects were twofold—to deny the ballot to citizens born outside the United States and to Catholics the right to hold an office. And the first Democratic national convention, after this organization arose, denounced it as un-American, wrong in principle, as an attack upon the liberty of the individual and the integrity of our institutions. The Republican Party shortly afterwards nominated a President and Vice President and formulated a platform. But it said not one word in denunciation of that Know-nothing movement. It dodged the issue and said nothing. It has been prone to this policy ever since. Fellow citizens, that political party is not worth your vote or mine that hesitates to do right no matter what comes of it.

I denounce this present Know-nothing movement, this A. P. A., as our party has denounced it, because it is un-Democratic, un-American, and un-Christian. It is un-Democratic because it is inequitable and unjust. It is un-American because it is contrary to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that no religious test shall ever be required to the holding of public office. And a similar provision is written in the fundamental law of our own Commonwealth. Finally, I leave it with you all if it is not un-Christian. I do not speak to-night from the standpoint of a Catholic. I am not a Catholic. By birth, by marriage, by conviction I am a Protestant. I speak from the standpoint of an American citizen, a Democrat, and a man.

He championed the rights of the States and of local government.

He also advocated the construction of a deep waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf, with improvement of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers.

In September, 1894, in a speech at Carthage, he strongly advocated the popular election of United States Senators.

At the annual banquet of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation at Delmonico's in April, 1894, as guest of honor, he responded to the toast of "The Western Point of View." His speech was a eulogy of the greatness of the West, which he loved, and of the political and patriotic necessity of a combination of the West and South against the East to secure fair national treatment, unless the East would recognize the situation and accord it. This speech attracted national attention and placed him among the presidential possibilities widely discussed.

Senator STONE's career is fresh in the minds of those who meet to-day to pay respect to his memory. Nevertheless, for the sake of history, I shall very briefly review some of his principal acts in the Senate during the years he sat here in this Chamber exercising a potential influence upon public events.

WILLIAM J. STONE entered the Senate March 4, 1903, succeeding George Graham Vest, Missouri's renowned "Senator of two Republics," whose service in the United States Senate covered an eventful period of 18 years. It is well known in the political history of Missouri that Mr. STONE could have been elected to the Senate in 1897, upon his retirement from the governorship. It is known that he declined the overtures made by Democratic leaders in the legislature because of his profound respect for the towering abilities of Senator Vest, and because he considered the distinguished services of Vest merited continued tenure in the Senate. It was not until Mr. Vest announced his forthcoming retirement that Gov. STONE consented to become a candidate for senatorial honors. He was elected by the legislature in January, 1903, following a caucus nomination of his own party, without opposition, his only opponent having withdrawn upon the eve of the ballot.

His senatorial career began with the special session of the Senate in the Fifty-eighth Congress, called in March, 1903, to consider the Cuban reciprocity treaty. His first entry into senatorial debate was on January 26, 1904, with an address upon the Panama Canal treaty concluded with the new-fledged Republic of Panama by the Roosevelt administration. The debates upon this treaty were largely conducted in the open Senate through the medium of resolutions touching the controversy presented by various Senators. Senator STONE drew the attention of his new colleagues by a clear, incisive discussion of the somewhat unusual features of the revolution out of which the new government had sprung. He supported the treaty, accepting the opportunity to advance the great canal project, of such great concern to Americans, but condemned the methods he believed to have preceded the separation of Panama from Colombia, urging a more liberal policy in dealing with the Latin-American nations. His words upon this occasion were prophetic, suggestive of a new policy in our relations with Central and South American States, a policy now generally approved and accepted as both wise and just. Among other things, he said:

> The true policy of this Government with reference to the Republics south of us would lead us on different and higher lines. We should so comport ourselves as to inspire the confidence of our neighbors. They should not stand in dread of our power, but rely upon it as a shield for their protection. We should link them by bonds of mutual amity and interest. What boots the Monroe doctrine to them if it stands only to guard them against European aggression, while the door is open for us to invade at pleasure?
> If I could be potent in shaping our policy in this behalf, I would be governed by one supreme consideration—that of attracting the southern Republics to us by a course instinct with the spirit of candor, justice, and fair play. I would enter into such compacts with them as would promote our commercial relations and make them for all practical purposes, offensive and defensive, a part of us. I would strive to inaugurate great republican policies of government—monetary, commercial, and political—common to all America, and these I would oppose, if need be, to the monarchical policies of the Old World.

Senator STONE received exceptionally good committee assignments, including places on the Commerce, Indian Affairs, Philippines, Public Buildings, and Education and Labor Committees, all active, important bodies. At that time, with the Indian problem in an acute stage, prior to statehood for Oklahoma and the Indian Territory, his assignment to the Indian Affairs Committee, of which he afterwards became chairman, was particularly important. Many thousands of Missourians were residents of the two Territories named, and these people naturally regarded Mr. STONE as their representative. Accordingly he took an active interest in all legislation dealing with the settlement of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes, sponsoring and advocating many constructive measures vital to the people of the Southwest. Among these were bills looking to the removal of restrictions upon the alienation of the surplus lands of full-fledged citizens; the control of the sale and leasing of mineral lands in the territory so as to protect the Indian, prevent unscrupulous exploitation, and at the same time promote the legitimate development of a region of marvelous growth and prospect. He exposed and thwarted many designs of speculators and lobyists who sought to profit at the expense of the Indian and this new country. Statehood was then the vital issue in the Territories, and, though not a member of the Territories Committee, he consistently advocated and voted for statehood, preferring separate statehood, but finally supporting the only possible measure that could be passed, under which Oklahoma was admitted into the Union. In connection with his consideration of the Indian problem, he strongly supported the established policy of Congress and the Government in suppressing the liquor traffic among the Indian tribes, and was the author of the self-enforcing prohibitory provision afterwards incorporated into the Oklahoma constitution, known as the Gallinger-Stone amendment to the statehood enabling act.

Through his fight with the railroad lobby in Missouri he had become familiar with the evil effects of corporation activity in politics. He had succeeded in securing the adoption of a party declaration upon the subject by the Democratic national convention in 1900, which he wrote and championed. This declaration reads:

> Corporations should be protected in all their rights, and their legitimate interests ought to be respected, but any attempt to interfere with public affairs of the people or to control the sovereign which creates them ought to be forbidden under such penalties as will make such attempts impossible.

During the last days of the Fifty-eighth Congress he delivered in the Senate a remarkable address upon the subject of campaign contributions by corporations, and was one of the first to advocate stringent penalties for future offenses of this character. It has since been provided by law in practically every State, and by Federal statute, that no corporation can make contributions to committees or candidates. STONE was among the pioneers in urging such legislation.

He succeeded Senator Vest on the Commerce Committee, then, as now, dealing with waterway transportation projects of great consequence to the States touching the Missouri and the Mississippi Rivers. During the early period of his service on this committee the policy of Congress respecting the upper Mississippi and the Missouri was distinctly unfavorable. Senator STONE began a long and for many years an apparently hopeless fight for a systematic improvement plan, adequately financed by congressional appropriations, covering both waterways. This was before commercial bodies in the Mississippi Valley had undertaken extensive educational propaganda directed toward the development of public sentiment in sympathy with these projects. Many of the appropriations which maintained these two waterways upon even the most temporary basis during these years of determined opposition by potent factors in legislation in both Houses of Congress were due to the persistent and persuasive efforts of the Missouri Senator. Dealing with the haphazard method of river appropriations, he said in the Senate on February 27, 1907:

> Yet we wonder why the commerce on the river goes down, and why the capitalists of St. Louis do not invest in boats and barges for river navigation. There is neither justice nor reason in such a condition. A policy such as we are following creates uncertainty, destroys confidence, and retards the development of that immense commerce that would almost certainly follow if more assuring conditions prevailed.

He had the privilege of subsequently aiding in framing the provision of legislation which established permanent annual appropriations for the Missouri River and increased allotments to the upper Mississippi. At all times he was an ardent advocate of the project known as the Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway.

In his service upon the Commerce Committee he became a close student of the national shipping problem and was always a staunch advocate of liberal treatment of American shipping. More thn once he advocated in the Senate repeal of the restrictive navigation laws, which he argued were responsible for the decline of the American merchant fleet. He had always been one of the foremost advocates of progressive merchant-marine legislation. Practically every public utterance of his, upon the stump and elsewhere, dealing with general national issues had contained strong appeals for merchant-marine legislation upon broad lines. He had opposed subsidies upon all occasions, owing to his pronounced conviction that the repeal of the navigation laws would alone promote the growth of a national fleet under American registry. Years afterwards, in the Sixty-fourth Congress, when as an administration leader, with his own party in power in the Senate, he was one of the foremost Senators contending for the passage of the shipping bill, which afterwards became law in a modified form, resulting in the establishment of the present Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet. His activities in this behalf are well known. His strong advocacy of an adequate naval program was inseparably connected with his ardor for a great merchant fleet. Speaking on this subject in the Senate, April 27, 1908, he said:

> For many years, both in and out of Congress, I have been an ardent advocate of an increased Navy and also policies looking to the restoration of our merchant marine. The two things are so related that I can not think of the one without thinking of the other. The decadence of our maritime prestige and power constitutes one of the most discreditable and humiliating facts in our history. * * * No man is more solicitous than I to see our merchant ships swarming all over the world, and I doubt if any is more keenly alive to the wisdom and necessity of constructing a war Navy adequate to subserve the needs of our country.

During the long session of the Fifty-ninth Congress the railroad-rate legislation pressed by President Roosevelt was the acute issue. The bill finally presented to the Senate empowered the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix rates upon prescribed standards. Debate in the Senate was extended, finally turning upon the question of judicial review of the commission's acts. Many great speeches were made upon the various phases of the legislation proposed. Senator STONE delivered during this session one of the most carefully prepared addresses of his legislative career, in which he discussed these problems with rare clearness of thought, taking advanced ground upon both the legal questions presented and the general policy of rate fixing. In this speech, delivered April 5, 1906, he opposed enlargement of the power of the judiciary to suspend the orders of the commission, and strongly advocated the policy of allowing the commission to initiate and fix rates. He favored the regulation by statute of the practice of courts in dealing with the decrees of the commission, saying:

> A law of this kind to be effective, and orders of this kind by a commission of this kind to be of value, must be promptly enforced. The courts should be open to every suitor, but the privilege of resorting to them should not be turned into an abuse. While guarding the right of everyone to seek a judicial remedy for private wrong, the exercise of that right should be so regulated as to prevent it eventuating in a public wrong.

The original interstate-commerce act, which placed a ban upon rebating, contained a clause punishing violations of the anti-rebate section by imprisonment. In the Fifty-seventh Congress the imprisonment penalties were abolished by act of Congress. In his speech of April 5, 1906, Senator STONE advocated the restoration of these penalties, being the first Senator to speak upon the subject. Later he offered an amendment to the pending bill which restored the penalty clauses of the original act. This amendment was adopted and the bill as finally passed contained the provision.

In 1907 he made an extended tour of the Philippine Islands and the Orient, and upon his return to the Senate he prepared and afterwards presented a constructive program for the treatment of the islands. He proposed to restore them to their own people 15 years after the date of the treaty of Paris, with a provision for the neutralization of the territory, retaining naval bases for the United States. This measure was widely commented upon and received the practically solid support of those who favored Filipino independence. The Democratic national platform of 1908 contained a plank indorsing this policy, expressed in language almost identical with the terms of Senator STONE'S joint resolution.

Throughout the entire discussion of tariff legislation dealing with the Philippines, Senator STONE opposed free trade with the islands. In a notable speech delivered April 20, 1909, he set forth in a strong argument his reasons for his position, based upon constitutional grounds and considerations of sound policy. He contended that if the doctrine which accepted the Philippines as a part of the United States was well founded no customs barriers of any kind should be raised against them, but that, if the Nation proposed to return the islands to their own people, it would be unwise to create such commercial relations as would make it difficult to accomplish our national purpose, adding that we were under no such obligations to the Filipinos "as to make it our duty to support their government or to build up their industry at the expense of our own."

Probably his most active work in the Senate, covering a period of over seven years, was in the great Finance Committee, of which he was appointed a member on December 8, 1910. Even before his service upon the committee began he took an active part in tariff legislation and tariff discussions. He participated extensively in the debates on the Payne-Aldrich bill, the Canadian reciprocity measure, the schedule-by-schedule revision attempted in the Sixty-second Congress, and on the Underwood-Simmons bill—the present law. In the celebrated contest over the Payne-Aldrich bill, during which the majority party of the Senate divided into sharply defined factions, Senator STONE, still a minority Member of the Senate, was conspicuous. Though not a member of the Finance Committee at that time, he availed himself of the counsel of experts, conducted an independent research into the various schedules, and carried on a vigorous fight in the open Senate for lower duties. Many of his exchanges with Mr. Aldrich, of Rhode Island, then the chairman of the Finance Committee, attracted national attention. Senator STONE may justly be termed one of the leaders in the fight against the bill, which probably aroused more intensity of feeling among the respective factions than any other tariff bill in our history, stimulating a greater variance of opinion with men of all parties. It was largely due to his fight on the Payne-Aldrich bill that his appointment to the first vacancy on the Finance Committee was made.

During the last session of the Sixty-first Congress a heated contest developed in the Senate over the charges against William Lorimer, then a Senator from Illinois. Possibly none more bitter, and few more intense, involving a personal issue, ever appeared in the Senate. Senator STONE was not a member of the committee which investigated the charges, but after the evidence had all been presented and Mr. Lorimer himself had addressed the Senate in his own behalf, Senator STONE, on February 28, 1911, in an extended speech attacked Mr. Lorimer's position and declared his intention to vote to oust the Illinoisan upon the facts submitted. This speech was remarkably dispassionate, displaying in the most striking way the Senator's great powers of analysis and judgment. It was regarded by many as one of the best efforts of his senatorial service, and was undoubtedly of great weight in the final determination of the question. He dwelt strongly upon the ultimate responsibility of Mr. Lorimer for admitted irregularities in the legislature and challenged the correctness of Lorimer's interpretation of his relations to his lieutenants, particularly a member of the Illinois lower house named Browne. Senator STONE said:

> Does it seem probable that Browne would discuss money considerations with his followers, make promises and afterwards keep them, with utter ignorance on Lorimer's part as to what was being done? Lorimer was in command, and he was to be beneficiary of the contest. Can Lorimer's lieutenants be guilty of these crimes and yet Lorimer himself, the beneficiary, be wholly innocent?

This address is cited as one of the most powerful evidences of Mr. STONE'S abhorrence of corrupt practices in politics. The question involved in this case was not partisan—party lines were wiped out in considering the facts. Senator STONE weighed the evidence, and declined to compromise with what he considered a vicious thing. He believed the Illinoisan guilty of culpability in this connection, so declared and so voted, and his view finally prevailed.

In 1910 a political upheaval resulted in the election of the first Democratic House of Representatives since 1892. In the new Congress Senator STONE, as a member of the Finance Committee, took a prominent part in support of the Canadian reciprocity treaty presented by President Taft. He was one of the most constant attendants upon the sessions of the committee, which were largely occupied for a time in extended hearings. It developed that many of the President's party associates in the Senate were opposed to the measure, so that a very considerable portion of its advocacy fell upon the shoulders of Senator STONE and his party colleagues. He was frequently called into consultation by the President, and worked faithfully and assidiously for the passage of the treaty. He was one of those who were keenly disappointed when the measure was rejected, owing to the fall of the Laurier government in Canada through the elections in 1911 and the accompanying reversal of the policy of the Dominion.

During this Congress the Democratic House, under a pledge to revise the tariff, passed several bills revising separate schedules of the tariff law, including the free list, cotton, and woolen manufactures, and so forth. These measures had a stormy passage through the Senate, but all of them were supported and in large measure sponsored by Senator STONE in committee and upon the floor. Such of the bills as were passed by the Senate, through the cooperation of progressive Republican Senators with the Democrats, were vetoed by the President.

In the Democratic Senate of the Sixty-third Congress Senator STONE was the second ranking member of the Finance Committee, and as such participated in the framing of the tariff bill passed in 1913. He was the chairman of a subcommittee considering several of the most important schedules. His responsibilities in this connection were very great and his labors arduous. His colleagues on the Finance Committee have already testified to the continuous and painstaking devotion of Senator STONE to the exacting duties of his position. He worked many weeks upon the schedules assigned to him. Anyone familiar with the details of tariff legislation can well testify to the demands upon the legislator who deals with these matters in a conscientious way. It involved many tedious hours of listening to experts, manufacturers and consumers, importers and exporters, with many patient days and weeks of laborious research and discussion.

Senator STONE applied himself to this vast undertaking with his usual thoroughness during consideration in committee, upon the floor, and elsewhere. At the same time he contributed to the debates in the Senate many illuminating and striking utterances in support of the measure. A tariff bill, under the legislative system then prevailing, is a greater tax upon the legislator than almost any other. The Underwood-Simmons Act became a law in October, 1913, and about a month later Senator STONE was taken critically ill, largely through overwork during the long period of the consideration of the tariff measure. His illness continued for nearly five months, developing a complication which indirectly contributed to the cause of his death.

During his convalescence in the spring of 1914 Senator Bacon, of Georgia, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, died, and Mr. STONE, the ranking majority member, was appointed to succeed him. He had served on this committee since April 23, 1908. He continued at the head of the committee until his death in April, 1918, covering a period of 10 years of service on the committee. When he returned to the Senate after his illness, having scarcely recovered, the relations of the United States with Mexico had become strained to the point of breaking and Congress had passed the joint resolution justifying the course of the Executive in using the armed forces of the United States against Huerta. Senator STONE strongly supported throughout the measures of the Government in dealing with the usurper.

During his service at the head of the Foreign Relations Committee he piloted through the Senate many important treaties, including arbitration treaties, the so-called Bryan treaties for the advancement of peace, the convention providing for the purchase of Danish West Indies, the Nicaraguan convention, and many others of minor importance.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR JAMES.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, I offer the following resolutions, which I ask may be read, and I move their adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). The Secretary will read the resolutions.

The resolutions (S. Res. 434) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate assembles as a mark of respect to the memory of Hon. OLLIE M. JAMES, late a Senator from the State of Kentucky, in pursuance of an order heretofore made, to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Senate again expresses its profound sorrow at the death of the late Senator from Kentucky.

Resolved, That the Secretary transmit a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives and to the family of the deceased.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, it is a sad and solemn occasion whenever we are gathered here to pay tributes of respect and regard to the memory of one of our departed comrades in the membership of this body.

In the strenuous and feverish times of the last few years, engaged as we have been in the most arduous and important work, and going out of one session of Congress into another without rest or relaxation, we have frequently, far too frequently it seems to us, been reminded of how slight is our hold upon this life, and have been called upon to pause in our work and contemplate in grief and sorrow the earthly separation from us of one of our coworkers in the Senate. Death, which has been in these recent years more unsparing and rapacious than ever before throughout the world, has not overlooked the Members of the Senate in its world-wide harvest, and we have severely felt its heavy hand many times upon some of our most useful and conspicuous associates here.

Since I entered the Senate, Mr. President, a little over three years ago, of the 96 Members at that time 15 have passed away, and I have no doubt that this unusual and excessive mortality is in a large measure due to the extraordinary and tremendous amount of work that has fallen upon the Members of Congress in these troublous and eventful years of sorrow and death.

When I came here in December, 1915, my late colleague from Kentucky, OLLIE M. JAMES, who had been a Member of the Senate since March 4, 1913, was one of the most striking and popular figures in Congress. Of giant physique, big of body as well as of mind, in the very flush and prime of a useful and distinguished life, full of zeal and enthusiasm in the public service, for which he was so well equipped, he seemed to be the very picture of vigorous and robust health; and one who saw him in those days could well believe that the ravages of time and old age alone could conquer such a specimen of manhood, and that there stretched before his ambitious and patriotic vision the promise of many more years of valuable service to his country. His strength and vitality seemed to be irrepressible; he loved life and his fellow men with boyish enthusiasm; and it never occurred to one who saw him then that the scythe of the Great Reaper could be so near him.

But, alas, Mr. President, death is still as it ever has been, cruel and remorseless in the victims it selects. It still loves a shining mark. It spares neither the young nor the old, the weak nor the strong; it strikes down without concern either the exalted or the lowly. The door of the greatest deliberative and most dignified body on earth can not any more bar its entrance than can the door of the humblest cottage in the land. And now we find that our friend, in the flower of his manhood, like a strong young oak in the forest singled out by the fierce storm in its destructive course, laid low in his earthly career; and we are assembled here to-day as his colleagues to render to his memory in some degree the testimonials of our respect, our admiration, and our affection for his many generous and noble qualities of heart and mind.

As one who knew him intimately and well almost since his boyhood days, I feel that it is impossible to express in the necessarily limited time of this occasion all that might be said of him and of his remarkably successful and brilliant career in the public affairs of his State and of his country. However, I may be permitted to give briefly some of the leading and important events in his biography.

OLLIE M. JAMES was born in Crittenden County, Ky., July 27, 1871. His father, Judge L. H. James, a leading lawyer and a highly respected citizen of that county, still lives at a venerable and honorable old age, and bears in his heart with Christian fortitude and patience the deep sorrow of the untimely end of his distinguished son, in whose remarkable and creditable success he took so much pardonable pride and joy. Senator JAMES's good mother, to whom he was so devoted, preceded him to the grave less than a year, and was spared the grief which came to the surviving members of his family when he joined her on the other side.

He was educated in the public schools of his county, and, although he was never a profound student, he early manifested that quickness of intellect and breadth of mind which made up to a large extent what he lacked in the opportunities of collegiate training and higher education. In 1887 he was a page in the Kentucky House of Representatives, and it was there that he probably acquired that intense interest in political questions which was the guiding factor in his life afterwards.

He studied law with his father and was admitted to the bar in 1891. Although his practice of the profession was frequently interrupted by his activity in campaigns and his participation in political affairs, he demonstrated a broad and keen comprehension of the fundamental principles of the law, and with his natural gift and love of oratory he became a most effective and successful advocate before juries.

In 1896 he was a delegate to the Democratic national convention in Chicago, and became an ardent and eloquent champion of the nominee of that convention, Hon. W. J. Bryan, and of the principles for which he stood. In 1904 and each succeeding four years thereafter he was a delegate from the State at large to the Democratic national conventions, where he always attracted considerable attention, and at the convention in Baltimore in 1912 and the one in St. Louis in 1916, he was selected as permanent chairman. He therefore enjoyed the distinction of presiding over the two conventions that nominated Woodrow Wilson for the Presidency; and it is well known with what a high degree of confidence and esteem he was held by President Wilson. His relations with the White House were so close and cordial that he was often regarded as a spokesman of the President, and he never faltered in his loyalty to him nor to the policies for which the President stood.

His ambition as a boy and as a young man was always directed to a seat in Congress. He never sought nor held any other office, and in 1902 he was elected to Congress from his district, beginning his service in the Fifty-eighth Congress March 4, 1903. He served in the House with credit and distinction for 10 years, leaving it March 4, 1913, to enter the Senate, to which he had been elected by the General Assembly of Kentucky. His term, therefore, will expire on next March 4. But less than a month before his death last summer he had been renominated in the State Democratic primary, and had he lived would undoubtedly have been reelected in the November election for another term.

Senator JAMES was one of the most popular and vigorous speakers of his day. He possessed natural talents as an orator. His striking appearance, his splendid voice, and his great skill in clothing his ideas in forceful words and sentences gave him a wonderful hold upon his audiences; and in the later years of his life no political speaker in the country had more demands upon his time for speaking appointments than he had. Upon the stump, the platform, in convention halls, and upon the floors of Congress he always commanded the most attentive hearing. He was never tiresome and always exhibited the happy and rare faculty of knowing when to quit. He had an instinctive knowledge of the psychology of audiences. He seemed to know when to speak, what to say, and the proper time to close.

I recall in a national convention some years ago where he demonstrated this unusual power over an assemblage. The convention had been in session nearly a week. Upon this occasion it was very late in the night and the convention was impatient in its long waiting for the report of the committee on resolutions. The delegates and the many thousands of visitors were exceedingly weary and restless. Many speakers, some of them of first-class oratorical attainments and reputations, made numerous and futile efforts to entertain them; but the tired crowd would not hear the speakers, and with jocular and good-natured interruptions drove them from the platform. Finally OLLIE JAMES was induced to try. It was a dangerous experiment for a speaker with a crowd in such a humor. But as soon as he stood upon the platform before them they became at once quiet and attentive. His massive form, the stirring tones of his great voice, and his well-rounded sentences soon captured the audience and they listened and cheered him repeatedly. He made an appropriate speech for the occasion and did not sacrifice his triumph by speaking too long.

He was very skillful and successful in joint debates, and even in early days before he came to Congress he dared sometimes to challenge and meet in debate some of the veterans of the hustings, and frequently bore off the honors of the encounters. He proved himself a ready and forceful debater in Congress, and in party controversies he was always regarded by his party associates as one of their most effective pieces of artillery.

He was a Democrat of the strict and regular school, believing with profound faith in the principles of his party; and although he was a partisan he always fought fairly and chivalrously and was esteemed and admired by his Republican associates as well as by his Democratic friends. He was absolutely loyal to the principles in which he believed, and never failed in his championship of them. His ideas and views upon public questions were essentially democratic, and all his sympathies were entirely with the masses of the people, and throughout his public career he never failed in his support of those measures which he believed would bring the greatest good to the largest number of the people.

In his five years' service here in the Senate he won many friends, and the sincerity and fearlessness of his views were recognized by all. He rarely spoke on the floor of the Senate, but when he did he was sure of the most respectful and considerate attention. His last speech in the Senate was made just about one year ago, and it was a strong and ringing defense of the war policies of the administration. He had about reached the zenith of his power and manhood. He was still a young man, with a future before him full of hope and promise. He sought to serve his constituents to the fullest extent, and I believe, Mr. President, that his earnest efforts to serve his people in the great multitude of demands made upon his time and energies under war conditions had much to do with the breaking down of his health. Senators are familiar with the vast increase of work upon us since our country entered the war, and how difficult, if not impossible, it has been to meet every request or demand upon our time. The burden has been very heavy, and my late colleague in his conscientious efforts to meet his part of it, even with his strong constitution, sacrificed his health and his life.

Not only in his public life was he successful but also in his private life, and in his home he was most contented and happy. Married in 1903 to Miss Ruth Thomas, of Kentucky, a most lovely and admirable young lady, he had enshrined her as the idol of his heart, and had gallantly laid at her feet the triumphs and victories which he had achieved. In the sorrow and bereavement which have come upon her the hearts of all who knew this happy couple have been deeply touched. With so much to live for, it is difficult for us, with our limited and finite knowledge, to understand the ways of Providence in striking him down at such a time.

When he last spoke in the Senate on the occasion to which I have referred, he acquitted himself well and ably, but those who sat near him could see that the stalwart frame was not what it had been and that serious illness was upon him. After that day he was never able again to take part in the work of the Senate. He was soon confined to his bed, and all that medical science and the tender ministrations of his devoted wife and of friends could do was done to relieve and restore him. He lingered for some months, bearing his sufferings patiently and heroically, until at last on August 28, 1918, in the hospital at Baltimore, he breathed his last and gave up his spirit to his God.

He was only 47 years of age, but in that brief span he had made a name for himself, a name associated with an honorable and brilliant public service, and a name cherished and loved by the people of his native State and by many thousand of others who had come to know and admire him. Kentucky, Mr. President, was proud of OLLIE JAMES, and in the years to come our people will continue to honor his memory and to count him among that bright galaxy of statesmen that our State has given to the Nation. They will always remember him as a brave and eloquent leader, as a faithful and conscientious public servant, and as a man who never failed through fear or favor to do what he considered his duty. To his sorrow-stricken widow and to the other members of his good family who have been so grievously afflicted we shall always bear the deepest and most heartfelt sympathy.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, certainly not within recent years, if ever, has the Senate met to pay its tribute of respect to the memory of two such distinguished men as Senator STONE and Senator JAMES. When I listened a few moments ago to the eloquent and just tribute which the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] paid to his late colleague I could not help thinking how justly practically everything he said would apply to that other great Democrat in whose memory we have met. I am gratified to have the opportunity to say a brief word relating to his service, for I am proud to think that I was included among his personal friends.

Senator JAMES entered the House of Representatives at the beginning of the Fifty-eighth Congress, one term before I became a Member of that body, and thereafter until his death we served together continuously in the House and later in the Senate, so that I came to know him and his policies very well. He was one of the most consistent party men I have ever known, a fact I mention because it is not altogether usual in modern times and is one which has my general approval. A government conducted by two great political parties, in my opinion, has a more stable structure and produces more beneficial results to its citizens than any other method which may be followed. A failure to govern by parties in the final analysis means personal government, which may be good or bad; but it is quite certain to lack regularity and stability. Good government or good business can only result by following a well-defined policy. An illustration of Senator JAMES's views on this question and his recognition of it happened in a conversation he had with me shortly after we became Members of the Senate. He approached me with a proposition that we pair on all matters of legislation. I assented, and then asked him why he had made that proposal to me. His reply, I think, was characteristic. He replied:

> You are a consistent Republican on party measures and I am a consistent Democrat. Therefore it is a fair arrangement.

Of all the men I have known in Congress I can not think of one who had a more dominating personality. His record as a party man in the councils of his party clearly justifies this statement. Kentucky has been represented by a large number of men of national importance, many gifted orators, and, considering its population, has had an almost unequaled number of men prominent in national politics. This fact makes it all the more remarkabe that Senator JAMES was the chairman of his State delegation at a national convention when he was but 25 years of age, and from that time—1896—to the last national convention of the Democratic Party no man in his party occupied a more prominent or influential position than did he.

I never had the pleasure of hearing him in a political campaign, but the testimony from his State is universal—and that might be extended to include the entire country—that no man in his day—and this is extreme praise when you think of the gifted men who have been active in Kentucky during the last 25 years—exerted a larger influence on the stump than he. His very presence was one of authority and dominating influence. Not only was this true in his State and in national party councils, but it was true in the Senate. His ability was recognized on both sides of the Chamber. Although very partisan in his activities, he never failed to be fair in his relations with his political opponents. Indeed, he may be described as a square man in his dealings with friend and foe alike. He struck hard, but never below the belt.

His passing at the early age of 47 has removed from the stage of national affairs a man who would have been a leading figure in this country in some capacity for a generation. If my information is correct, he was impregnable in his political position in Kentucky; and his return to the Senate—in fact, his continued returns—would have added more and more to his influence and importance as a political leader.

The country can ill afford to spare any man who has aptitude for public service, well-defined conviction, and a courage to stand by them. It would much better have among its public servants men who are wrong in many of their conclusions than to have in their place timeservers who base their actions on passing whims and whose main purpose is to maintain and augment their own political importance.

I assume from its past history that Kentucky will continue to be brilliantly represented in the Senate, but I am confident that it will be many days before that State will send to Washington a man who will exert a more important influence than did Senator JAMES or a man who will be more jealous of the interests of the people of his State. To secure his interest and his effective aid, it was only necessary to be a resident of Kentucky or even to have been by birth a Kentuckian. This undoubtedly was a characteristic which had much to do with the strong hold he had and maintained over the people of his State.

I pay Senator JAMES this brief tribute with great pleasure, and notwithstanding the fact that we were antagonistic in our views on many important public questions, I most sincerely regret that the career of this remarkable man has ended.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, formerly the membership of the Senate was composed largely of elderly men. During recent years that rule seems to have been modified and many comparatively young men have entered this body. Notwithstanding this fact, the death rate among Senators appears to be increasing.

Since March 4, 1913, if my memory is accurate, 25 Senators and ex-Senators have died, 9 of them having returned to private life.

The roll of Senators who have died within this period of less than six years is not confined to the feeble and the aged; it embraces also many who have been stricken in the prime and vigor of manhood. The high death rate among Senators may be accounted for in part by the fact that many have entered the Senate at advanced ages, and after arduous labors elsewhere have reduced their vitality. This does not account for the increasing mortality in our membership. Congressional duties have multiplied in number and increased in importance during the last decade. The outbreak of the war and its progress brought many new problems of vital importance to the Nation and to the world, and also created new labors of a quasi-official nature sufficient in number to overwhelm the most vigorous Congressman. The physical and mental strain incident to labors in Congress during the war now closing accounts for the loss of some of our ablest and most influential members.

The Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. Gallinger, passed away at the ripe age of 81 years, retaining his mental vigor and comprehensive grasp of public questions until the end.

Senator STONE died at an advanced age after long public service. Senator JAMES died in the prime of life, at the high noon of his usefulness and influence. Prolonged service in the House of Representatives familiarized him with the details of national legislative procedure and afforded him accurate knowledge of the many difficult problems connected with the progress of our country. When Senator JAMES began his career in this Chamber he enjoyed, in addition to this knowledge of legislative problems and procedure, an intimate friendship with many Members in both Houses of Congress which contributed to his influence here.

It may be said that some of the most striking characteristics of his public service are epitomized in the phrases "Party loyalty" and "Responsiveness to the will of the people."

Senator JAMES was a partisan; passionately, but not blindly, attached to the Democratic Party. His partisanship was frank and aggressive. He was recognized throughout the Nation during the present administration as a powerful factor in its councils.

He believed that virile political organizations are indispensable to the proper administration of government under our Constitution. He supported the platforms and nominees of his political party with unhesitating fidelity. During 15 years of intimate association with him in the House of Representatives and in the Senate, I never knew him to expressly or impliedly repudiate a platform declaration to which he was committed or to fail to champion, when occasion arose, the administration or organization with which he was allied. Senators present will recall his eloquence and impetuosity in debate. His striking personality, forceful manners, and fluency of speech gave him a degree of power on the platform equal to that of any speaker who has appeared during this generation. He was, perhaps, with the exception of Mr. Bryan and the late former President Roosevelt, the most popular campaign orator of his day.

Notwithstanding the marked attachment which Mr. JAMES always manifested to the Democratic Party, his attitude on public questions was marked by a responsiveness to the will of the people rarely evinced by men in public life. He was not ashamed to avow his readiness to effectuate the public desire in legislation. He believed that the people are the source of all political power under our form of government, and that they can be safely trusted to govern. In political debates, both here and when speaking from the stump, he frequently appealed to public opinion as the supreme political tribunal. This practice was not the outgrowth of demagogy, or of political cowardice. It was the natural development of an abiding faith in the integrity and intelligence of the people.

In spite of partisan views and utterances, Senator JAMES enjoyed many intimate friendships—friendships of the enduring kind, not to be accounted for by the simple rules alleged to govern human relationship, but having their origin and growth in the indefinable but nevertheless powerful laws of human nature. One of the most valuable compensations of service in Congress is the associations members enjoy with one another and the lasting friendships thus formed. Neither politics, religion, nor similarity of habits form a standard by which our friendships are established or mantained. This fact, unimportant as it may appear when first suggested, is of tremendous importance in giving elasticity to our social and political institutions. It enables us to witness the passing of political control from one party to another, with calm assurance that the fundamentals underlying our civilization will be preserved and safeguarded, because we know that the patriotic purposes of American citizenship are not monopolized by any one political party.

Mr. President, it is a pathetic fact that we are so busy here with present and prospective duties that when a Senator dies his prominence is quickly forgotten, indeed rarely recalled.

When a leader in the Senate falls another advances almost unnoticed to take his place. Our proneness to forget Members who have passed beyond is due in no part to lack of appreciation for their virtues. It is occasioned by the responsibilities of public duty—constantly changing; always pressing.

The memory of OLLIE JAMES will be perpetuated here, where he toiled so effectively for the preservation of the people's liberties. He will not be forgotten. The Nation will remember him for his unhesitating loyalty when it summoned American manhood to the defense of civilization.

Kentucky will gratefully preserve his name and fame. Kentuckians honored him while he lived—honored and loved him. They love his memory. That love is as tender as the starlight of a Kentucky night, yet as warm as the sunlight of a summer day upon Kentucky fields and hills.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, out of the affection which I bore for OLLIE JAMES I could pay tribute at considerable length to his splendid qualities as a man, as a citizen, and as a legislator, but the hour is growing late, and I shall abbreviate considerably the remarks I had intended to make upon this occasion.

Taking the oath of office by a Senator is always an interesting event. I can well remember—it seems but a few weeks ago, though, in fact, it was nearly six years—a powerful physical giant coming down the center aisle, standing at the Vice President's desk and taking the oath as the new Senator from the State of Kentucky.

I had known of him and of his career, but had no personal acquaintance. He impressed me at that time as a thoughtful, earnest, determined, courageous man, and a fine specimen of American manhood. I came to know him well and intimately during his term, and the impression made on that day became more fixed.

While we differed in our adherence to political parties, I have seldom found myself out of harmony with his views on any question that related to the average everyday folks, and the news of his death brought to me the shock of a great personal bereavement. Such a man, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has said, the country could ill afford to lose, especially in these troublous times.

Kentucky has given many eminent men to the Nation. It has been a land where oratory has flourished. The intense struggles of the Civil War produced in its subsequent history a rugged kind of character; a self-confidence and determination to stand for the right; a noble type of honor and chivalry. A wonderful history is that of Kentucky, not only subsequent to but before the Civil War.

From a log cabin of Kentucky came the greatest of all Americans, Abraham Lincoln; likewise from that State came the President of the Confederacy, Jefferson Davis. To-day there presides over the House of Representatives one of the most brilliant sons of the Nation, proud of old Kentucky as his birthplace, CHAMP CLARK. Henry Clay was a son of Kentucky, and likewise our departed and beloved OLLIE JAMES.

He had a liking and an aptitude for politics. Starting as a page in the Legislature of Kentucky his rise was rapid, until at last his ambition for a seat in this body was gratified; and who can tell, had he lived, but that higher honors would have awaited him? Certainly he would have been one of the most prominent candidates for President before the next Democratic National Convention.

Probably no more interesting event ever occurred in his life than the reception given him by his home folks after his election in 1912; for, after all, it is the opinion of the folks at home, who know a man in his everyday life, who see him as he walks among them and communes with them that really counts.

It is not always true that the prophet is not without honor save in his own country and among his own people. At least, if that may be true of prophets, it is not true of men with red corpuscles in their veins. It was not true of OLLIE JAMES. I have copies of some telegrams that were sent to Senator elect JAMES at that time and read at that banquet. One, from CHAMP CLARK, reads as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 19, 1912.

OLLIE M. JAMES, Marion, Ky.:

The noblest Roman of them all, hearty greetings. Next to an ex-Kentuckian, whom I will not mention for the sake of modesty, I would rather you, another Kentuckian, were shown the straight and narrow path to the White House. If, later on, I am shown that path, I in turn would be happy to have 100,000 Missourians shown that majority for OLLIE JAMES; that would be about the right figure. Your fellow townsmen no doubt will drink to this sentiment with their ayes at the banquet to be tendered you to-night.

CHAMP CLARK.

Another message on the same occasion:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 19, 1912.

Hon. OLLIE M. JAMES,
Senator elect, Marion, Ky.:

If your home folks think as well of you as we Standpat Republicans do, it is jug-full and then some. Wish I could gaze upon your big, broad, good-natured face to-night and drink to your health and happiness. As I chew the end of my Pantello, and imagine wreaths of smoke curling upward, I can not help meditating on the fact that the Democratic Party is more obnoxious to me than ever; for you are a shining light of that party and it does not deserve such good fortune.

JOSEPH G. CANNON.

And another:

LINCOLN, NEBR., January 19, 1912.

Senator Elect OLLIE M. JAMES,
Marion, Ky.:

Remember 1916. If you are not the standardbearer of our party that year I will be greatly disappointed, for Democracy needs just such men as you to succeed the Democratic nominee we intend to elect next November, one term being enough for any good Democrat, even if he is defeated after two times in the running like some I know of.

My congratulations on the enthusiastic reception I feel reasonably certain your own townsmen are according to you to-night.

WILLIAM J. BRYAN.

Mr. President, in order to be a leader one must inspire men. Ollie James did that. He was a master of great assemblies. Probably never in the history of the Nation has one man, save Bryan, exerted more influence in the various national conventions of his party than he. In 1912 and 1916 he was permanent chairman of the Democratic national convention. It will be difficult, I think, to find, though it may be possible, that the same man has twice in succession presided over a national convention of either party. His speech as permanent chairman of the St. Louis convention in 1916 is one of the masterpieces of political oratory. He had been a great lover and follower of Bryan; also of CHAMP CLARK, whom he earnestly desired to see nominated in 1912. When Woodrow Wilson succeeded, and became President, he became his staunch defender; and no man ever had a better one. His speech, hereinbefore referred to, at the Democratic national convention, was a wonderful tribute to the President, and it came from the depths of his heart.

His ability as an orator would be conceded by all who ever heard him. The old-fashioned, flowery sentences seemed to flow naturally from his lips. The pathos of his soul gripped the heartstrings of his hearers. Tested by the ability to move and convince people, OLLIE JAMES was one of America's great orators, and certainly stood among the leaders as a political campaigner.

He was true to the common folks. He loved them, not for politics' sake, but because he had known them, and been raised in the hard school of adversity. He was a true representative of the everyday, average citizen of the Nation, and he was willing to fight in legislation and everywhere else for anyone whom he thought was the under dog in the fight. And OLLIE JAMES was a real fighter in the cause he espoused.

No one would claim that he was not an intense political partisan, but he was fair. I think it would be difficult to have convinced him that the Democratic Party ever made a mistake; but at the same time he could see good in the opposition. Members of this body will not forget his contest with Senator Camden on the floor. The ship-purchase bill was under discussion. I shall always remember with what dramatic power he hurled these closing words of his very remarkable speech:

But, Mr. President, above everything, if this bill must go down, if this great constructive measure must fail, if this must be the first defeat for the greatest President who has occupied that chair in 50 years, if he must fall and above his body the wild shouts of a triumphant Republican Party shall rise, I do pray God that I may be spared the humiliation of reaching down to pull from his body a dagger bearing the impress of the hand of a Kentucky Senator.

I have seen him sway great audiences and arouse them to fighting mood. He could rally his own party forces. His very appearance inspired confidence. They knew he could always take care of himself—in repartee, in humor, or in sledge-hammer blows. Intense partisans want their champion to flay the other fellow. They were sure not to be disappointed when this son of Kentucky got into full action.

He was always anxious in his legislative work to represent the people of his State, although OLLIE JAMES realized that a United States Senator, while accredited to a State, should represent the entire Nation; and he was a big, broad American, hemmed in by no local influences. I have talked with him frequently on the prohibition question. We differed radically; but when things commenced to be going dry pretty fast in the country he said to me one day that while he did not believe in prohibition, if the people of Kentucky got around to where they wanted it, he should be for it. He believed in the people, and the people believed in him. That was the secret of his strength, and that made him the idol of Kentucky Democracy.

The night of the discussion over the war, some of us talked with him and urged him to make a speech. We had had speeches through the day—not much fire in them—and some of us wanted him to make a speech that would stir up enthusiasm. He did, in a speech glowing with patriotism and fiery invective against the enemies of America. His father had been a Union soldier, and OLLIE JAMES loved this country as a man loves his mother.

I never dreamed but that OLLIE JAMES had many years of service left to his country. His splendid physique seemed to insure him long life; but the reaper, death, so busy in this body, had marked him for its own. It had not seemed possible that OLLIE JAMES could die. His physical power seemed proof against death, but the cord of life snaps so easily. Truly—

The leaves of the oak and the willow shall fade,
Be scattered around, and together be laid;
And the old and the young, and the low and the high,
Shall moulder to dust, and together shall lie.

Thus it has ever been; thus it will ever be. And so the great soul winged its flight to those mysterious, unknown realms. It was as if the strong oak of the forest had fallen before its time, and with its fall fell the hopes and aspirations of his friends for yet greater honors for him. For OLLIE JAMES bound to him friends with hoops of steel—not merely everyday friends but the kind who will go through stress and trouble and fight for him.

It was not so much as a politician and statesman that one was drawn to OLLIE JAMES, but it was that something about him that made one feel he was an unusual kind of friend; that he was a brother man, a heart man. He needed a large body to hold his great heart. No one was ever turned from him when needing help, no poor soul without encouragement.

Brave, generous, noble-hearted OLLIE JAMES! We will not see your like again. Sad to us that you should be called to leave this Senate before the full fruition of your life work; and yet such spirits as yours live on in the hearts of those they have befriended. The best epitaph that can be written of any man is that men and women and children are a little happier because he has lived; that the world is a little better for his life. That could truly be written above the grave of OLLIE JAMES. That is enough to say of anyone.

As Sunday after Sunday we are meeting here to pay our humble tribute to those who have preceded us on "the long, long trail a-winding," may we not gather a better inspiration for our own lives; a firmer resolve so to live and to act toward one another that we shall be of those who are missed by humanity when the great summons shall come? It is not far away for any of us.

'Tis the wink of an eye, 'tis the draught of a breath,
From the blossom of health to the paleness of death,
From the gilded saloon to the bier and the shroud—
O why should the spirit of mortal be proud?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I first met OLLIE JAMES at the Chicago convention of 1896. He was a large, ungainly giant of a young man, ill-attired and very self-conscious. The Kentucky delegation occupied seats directly in front of that to which I belonged. Mr. JAMES had been chosen chairman of the delegation; a notable distinction for a young and inexperienced leader. It had been instructed to vote as a unit, the majority at all times to determine what that vote should be. The delegation was a very turbulent one. Free coinage of silver was the issue. It had enthusiastic friends and a few determined enemies in Kentucky, and both sides were represented in the delegation, with silver in the majority. The minority, led by the redoubtable Col. Halderman, never failed to assert itself as occasion required—protesting, denouncing, and defiant. But the chairman, always self-controlled, polled his delegation, announced the rule, and cast the vote, unperturbed by the outcries of his outraged but helpless colleagues. Our acquaintance, beginning amid such dramatic environment, soon ripened into a close friendship, which continued without interruption to the end. I visited Washington frequently during Senator JAMES's career as a Member of the House, when he always made me welcome. He entered the Senate very shortly after I did, and from that time onward our relations were very close indeed.

Senator JAMES was an old-fashioned, uncompromising Democrat. His party faith was to him a sort of religion. Democracy was the only true gospel, and Jefferson and Jackson its great apostles. What his party did was right; what others did was wrong. Party disloyalty was high treason. The candidate having been chosen and the platform announced, every man should fall into line and obey the orders of the high command. To do otherwise at any time or under any circumstances was to him unthinkable. Honest, straightforward, and courageous himself, he could neither understand nor forgive in any man the offense of repudiating his party platform or opposing his party nominees, whatever the reasons. To him these were anathema.

But such things mattered not at all in his daily intercourse with men. His friends were many and were of all political creeds. These he bound to him with hooks of steel. And he was a welcome guest and companion everywhere, for he was kindly, lovable, brilliant, and entertaining.

Senator JAMES was gifted beyond most men of his generation with the great power of persuasive eloquence. He was a man of fine attainments. Nature had endowed him with a commanding presence, a great voice, rich in tones of harmony, and a marvelous faculty of expression. He was not a student, yet one of the best educated men of his time. He possessed fine intellectual faculties. His active mind easily absorbed and always retained information. His knowledge of men and of events, of political history, and of current affairs was remarkable for one who apparently devoted so little time to their contemplation.

When I returned to Washington a year ago after a somewhat extended illness, one of the first of my colleagues to welcome me was Senator JAMES. He was apparently in perfect health. I congratulated him upon his immunity from the ills and humors to which less rugged mortals were subject. To my great surprise he replied that he was far from well, and had for some time been in the care of his physician. It was difficult to believe him. But shortly afterwards his very dear friend, the late Senator Hughes, passed away. From the shock of this great grief he never fully recovered, and I have no doubt that it hastened the development of his malady. A few days afterwards he addressed the Senate upon the conduct of the war by way of reply to a speech of the senior Senator from Oregon upon the same subject. This address was characterized by all the earnestness and eloquence of the man. No listener could have suspected the speaker of illness, nor yet of waning physical or mental vigor. But he sustained himself to the close of his speech only by the most painful and prodigious effort, and retired to the cloakroom completely exhausted. He appeared in the Senate Chamber only two or three times thereafter.

He died at a critical moment in public affairs. The allied advance was in full swing, but the German power was as yet unimpaired. New armies were gathering in America, and the Nation was preparing for its mightiest effort. His services and his influence were needed as they never had been.

The grim summons could not have come more inopportunely for him nor for his country. But matters like these lie beyond the power of human regulation and must be borne because they can not be avoided. And since man is ordained to die, the life of no single individual, however exalted, is indispensable to the welfare of the race. Society adjusts itself to the inevitable, and the inexorable processes of time are seemingly undisturbed by the tragedies of life or the needs of statecraft.

He was a typical son of Kentucky. There he was born and there he always lived. For him there was no other landscape so green, no skies nor sunshine so winsome, no people so lovable. His was the one country of the earth, and Kentucky the fairest jewel in her crown of Commonwealths. He loved her with the same passionate devotion which the Frenchman lavishes upon the land of the tricolor and the lilies. And she returned his affection by crowning him with her highest honors. He served her well, added his name to the long and shining list of her illustrious sons, and sleeps peacefully in the sheltering embrace of her generous bosom. May the grass upon his grave be green while time endures.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, what an interesting exception we have lately made, sir, when the Members of this body and our colleagues of the House adopted the holy Sabbath as the day when men shall assemble in Congress to speak there the feelings of the heart as to one who is dead. And yet, sir, if there is anything that can suggest to the mind that there is no death, it must be tributes such as we have heard falling from the lips of those who speak only as the heart feeleth. For if there were death in the sense we are sometimes taught to appreciate that word, men could not live in the souls of those who love them like some inspired spirit breathing its own incense of beauty and their fragrance of life—aye, to the last moment of memory. That we should on the Sabbath turn our worship a little while to those who personified in their existence that which is meant by religion is a beauteous adoption on the part of these, sir, who represent this assembly.

Yet, sir, our meeting here speaks the fact that great men, great as has been described by these eminent orators in merit of mind, in character of life, in virtue of public integrity have died. Truly, sir—

> The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,
> And all that beauty, all that wealth, e'er gave,
> Await alike the inevitable hour.
> The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

I heard the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] Republican so called in the political division, the eminent Senator the colleague of Senator JAMES, Senator BECKHAM, Democrat, each pour out his tribute to the splendid State that gave birth to these two great men whose characteristics we commemorate this day, Senator STONE, of Missouri, and Senator JAMES, of Kentucky. Sometimes, sir, I am moved to the fact that as there is a certain soil which may produce a celestial bloom in floral growth and others that impart massive strength to forest tree, so, too, sir, there are certain places in regions of earth that produce men in different flavor and varying standards from that which cometh up from other soil.

Kentucky. Her every mountain preaches strength, and presents something of a titanic aspect. Her hills huddle themselves together in something of glory, the furze of autumn and the flowers of spring sparkle in original beauty. In Kentucky every stream ripples through a sacred soil, while the shimmering light falling on her grasses makes radiant that which the world apostrophizes as the bluegrass of Kentucky.

Natural, indeed, that from such a State there should come forth such spirits that embody within themselves characteristics something apart, indeed wholly different, from that which may be possessed by men elsewhere. Though we will not say of all that they were in all superior in their primal endowments, yet, sir, by comparison they were never failing in their virtues. Kentucky! There was Clay, Crittenden, Marshall, Beck, and now James. How their names loom before us and rise as something ascending on the mountain steps and presenting to us truly the visages of greatness.

What a startling partiality this great State presents, where there seems to come nothing from her but that which shall be called wonderful!

Mr. President, I am not a qualified witness to the virtues of the noble dead we celebrate. My contribution can not be regarded impartial. I can not speak of the statesman OLLIE M. JAMES in the abstract analysis that these distinguished gentlemen have shaped, framed, and clothed him. I knew him intimately as a close, dear, personal friend; as such I loved him. In the House the distinguished Member from Alabama, Hon. THOMAS HEFLIN, was probably the closest, apart from members of the delegation of Kentucky, of any of his colleagues in that branch. The eminent Senator from Colorado, Mr. THOMAS, in his epic contribution but a moment past referred to the closeness that Senator JAMES bore to Senator Hughes of New Jersey. Pardon me if I add, sir, that early conditions of acquaintance drew me within that circle as one of the few to whom I think Senator JAMES ofttimes came with those little personal matters which mark the man as human, apart from the official and the statesman. I therefore knew him, sir, as a man, as did many of you who sit about me on this sacred occasion. He learned through the vicissitudes of life and the arduous struggles of one who had to combat all obstacles from men to feel that only within himself was there the true resource of conquest and victory. He had not the aspirations to acquire riches with which he might purchase immunity from the world's struggles and exemptions from its burdens or its miseries. He sought not that social exclusiveness that might look down with disdain upon his fellow men in lesser spheres of life. Nor, sir, did he strive for heights of renown in that thing which we call statesmanhip in office that he might glorify himself in something of flashing radiance above his fellows.

To him ever was the single object in whatever avenue he thought and whatever path he walked that all his efforts might lead to the aid of his fellow men. He recognized that all to be done and achieved was within himself. His creed was that of Henley:

> It matters not how strait the gate,
> How charged with punishment the scroll;
> I am the master of my fate,
> I am the captain of my soul.

This text, sir, guided him. This it may have been that charmed and allured him to toil and undertaking, and by that standard he achieved. That standard, sir, he applied to all those about him. He ever felt that men should be natural and true to themselves as men. That men should look within themselves to find their standards and from such behold what should be the guide of their conduct. There was not a man he knew, however humble, to whom he would not extend his hand. There was not one in distress who could not look to him for refuge. He did not know how not to be a friend.

Can we forget instances here in this body, when an humble Armenian whom no one knew, who seemed to have been friendless in the invention that he thought he had conceived that could contribute something of welfare to our Nation? There were few who had confidence in the invention; but Senator JAMES, as chairman then of the Committee on Patents, though smirked at and smiled at by those of his beloved friends who understood his credulity and how easily he was impressed with any cry of distress from any quarter, nevertheless, sir, was found here pressing the claim of that obscure man for a hearing. This man was so situated that he could contribute to Senator JAMES nothing personally or politically. Senator JAMES did not know whether his petitioner could contribute anything of material benefit to the Government, but the advocacy by Senator JAMES was an evidence, sir, of a nature so boundless in all its generosity, so large in all its sacrifices, so gentle in its mercies that he could turn his great office and solicit at the hands of his legislative comrades the highest service to be given to any mankind. This he would have done anywhere for anyone, however high or low the pleading mortal who asked for a hearing. I saw nothing in all his life to me so significant of the generous soul that beat through all his life as this exhibition he gave us of his solicitude in behalf of a helpless man, without means and without influence.

Mr. President, it was as a statesman that these his colleagues could well turn their attention and address their tribute. They have done so with beauty and power. Kentucky, sir, was a State which was cradled in all the swinging flame that flashed to and fro in the awful strife between the States of this Union.

There was not a village within her sacred precinct that was not accursed with the differences by which brothers oftentimes faced each other with frowns, and not infrequently with swords, on the battle field. Kentucky was removed in a great degree from many of the extended questions and widening problems that agitated and agonized the great general land—particularly in the great West, in which I live. Yet it is interesting to observe that when Mr. JAMES came into public life from Kentucky he extended his mind into the broad area of the needs of all humankind. He declined to be narrowed to the mere demands of his dear hills and sweet valleys, and while as the distinguished Senators who have just addressed us have imparted to him the attribute of faithful party affiliation, he was a Democrat who aspired only that he might represent the principles of the great democracy of man as he understood it. Yet, Mr. President, let justice be done to him, and that is to say that it was ever the great breadth and sweep of his whole country that engaged his attention and solicited his services and to which he dedicated his daily life.

There was never a grievance in any part of America that was not his. There was not a wrong done in a State that he did not feel. There was not a suffering of humankind in the circle of this whole Republic that it was not his trust to remedy. There was not suffering about him even of the humblest of mankind that did not beat against his heart and surge in every vein of his existence. For the removing of all this he was a statesman. It was to remedy the wrongs of his country; it was to do justice to his fellow men he spoke, he served, he lived.

Sir, it is said he was an orator. Yes; and truly Senators may refer to the conventions in which he exhibited such marvelous skill and the display of such talent, readily to be envied by any mortal. But I beseech you for a second to dwell on one passing thought. Senator JAMES was truly the follower and supporter of Hon. CHAMP CLARK, of Missouri, for the Presidency. He presided over the convention at Baltimore city with all the solicitude that a friend could have. Yet so impartial and so just was he there that he commended himself to the followers of the successful rival, Mr. Wilson; and four years thereafter he was seen to be the chairman of the convention that was known to be for the then successful President, Woodrow Wilson. So just was he in all his rulings, so impartial in all his career, so manifestly true to all, that there was no one to lift a voice against his elevation to the same authority, because it was not to men as persons he rendered his devotion but to principle, and whoever carried the colors of that principle of right and justice it was under that he marched and for that he drew his sword and blew his golden trumpet.

Thus it was he became such an orator. He spoke from his heart. He echoed from his soul. He cried out to mankind, and, sir, he suffered the wrongs he abjured and condemned when suffered by others. He felt hurt in the pains wounding others, and he lived the hopes that he prayed for in behalf of his neighbors and his fellow citizens. Sir, thus it was he was the manner of man we have listened to, 47 years of age, hardly, sir, at the threshold of what begins a public career of greatness to other men, when he was summoned to celestial service. Truly, as Byron described Sheridan:

> Fruits of a genial morn and glorious noon,
> The deathless part of him who died too soon.

But, Mr. President, I decline to bear that solemn sadness that pervades many of my friends who have spoken so beautifully of the departed one. I have seen a candle burn down to its socket. I have seen its light go out. I have seen a little remnant of oil that marked where once a living flame burned and glowed, and I was saddened.

I have seen men come to public life akin to that candle and burn their lives out so long and so low that none could see the reflection of the flame where once it flashed, nor could behold the beauty which was woven by the threads of silken sweetness.

Here is a man who through his gifts and by the permission of Heaven was allowed to climb the mountains of greatness as high as men can usually ascend, and just at the pinnacle—indeed, at the top—with the glowing sun of success radiating about his head, he is beckoned to and ascends heavenward, carrying with him, sir, the aureole of his reputation, the love of every friend, the admiration of man, and added to these the fresh memory of his splendid achievements to praise before the world as the pride of Kentucky and the glory of the United States Senate. As such he becomes the idol of his State and the example to ambition to emulate as a standard of a Christian and a famous man. What could Heaven give man greater than this to pass on to his family, to transmit to his generation, and to establish in praise and in commemoration in ages that shall remember him?

Sir, that I mourn my friend it is true; that I deplore his loss, yes; because I saw the sweet and gentle life which he lived among those who loved him; but, sir, I can not but say that as death must come and as there must be the end of the journey to us all, I would to heaven that those I love could have so sweet a fate, that when they go out they could go in such a golden glow as gleamed upon his existence and lighted his way to heaven. Truly of him we may say: "A great tree has fallen in the forest, and with its crash the gates of heaven opened and angels came forth proclaiming to the Master, 'There cometh one to us whom we now receive for that we loved him long and dearly.'"

Mr. MARTIN of Kentucky. Mr. President, the associates and colleagues in this body of him whose memory we have here gathered to honor have so feelingly paid him tribute, and have with rare and choice expression so accurately portrayed those well-known, outstanding traits, attainments, and characteristics which gave to OLLIE M. JAMES his fame and endeared him to his friends, that I feel as impotent to add anything to their eulogies as I am powerless to do justice to the life and character of this most remarkable man.

Yet I avail myself of the privilege on this memorial occasion of recalling to the Senate some incidents of his career showing what manner of man he was and of laying upon his grave as my own, and the tribute of a grieving, true-hearted Kentucky constituency, a wreath of kindly memories which he so well deserved.

From the beginning of his political history until its close by death at Johns Hopkins Hospital on the 28th day of August last, Senator OLLIE M. JAMES was constantly and conspicuously in the public eye—first in his congressional district, then in his native State, and finally as a figure of national renown.

For 15 years he was the undisputed, unquestioned, recognized leader of his State's Democracy. His leadership was founded upon his own power, his unique personality, his unparalleled popularity. He ignored machine politicians and the methods of machine politics and was never embroiled in the factional differences which so often divided his party in the State. He was indifferent as to whether the party organization was under the control of friend or foe. With the consciousness of his power and of his predominating influence with the masses, who recognized in him an aggressive exponent of the principles in which they inherently believed, he was content to trust his political fate and fortunes to their keeping.

Early in his career politicians found that he was too strong to be stayed; aspiring ones knew that when he wanted place he got it. They dared not oppose him, and practically without interference he was returned time after time to the National House of Representatives, then elected to the Senate by the general assembly, and again, while in the very throes of death, he was chosen, with the certainty of election, as the nominee of his party for the term beginning March 4 next. During his first term in Congress, when in his thirty-second year, he took a commanding place; he was well informed on principles of government as well as those of his party, whose tenets and faith he advocated and defended valorously on all occasions.

In legislative action he was guided by and strictly adhered to what he considered the limitations of the Constitution and always stoutly defended his conception of the Democratic doctrine of State rights. Consistently with his belief he opposed vigorously Federal legislation on both the liquor question and woman suffrage. He regarded such action as an invasion of State sovereignty. Despite the entreaties and persuasions of close political and personal friends, steadfastly and courageously he maintained his convictions on these subjects. While he revered and defended the mandates of the Constitution, he was not reactionary, and had no patience with those who shielded such tendencies behind abstruse technicalities of constitutional construction.

This is shown by a speech he made in the Sixty-first Congress, defending a bill restricting gambling on cotton futures, in which he said:

I have been here a number of years now and during that time I have seen many a knight of the Constitution come galloping into the lists gallantly, bearing himself with skill and ease, but I have during my service here seen not one of these knights of the Constitution, with visor down and lance at rest, come into the lists to do battle for the man who sows the grain or reaps the harvest or digs the ditch.

Mr. President, there are preserved in the records of the House and Senate as a monument to his talent and genius, as evidence of his patriotic solicitude for the welfare of his native land, numberless utterances, profound in thought, striking in style, eloquent in appeal. The last of these was made on this floor one year ago in this month, when, sensing the hideous magnitude of the war's meaning to the United States, and quickly realizing the burden that was to rest upon the shoulders of the President, he plead for support of his policies and decried criticism, then so prevalent, of the conduct of the war; he reminded the country that there were in the days of the American Revolution men who tried to displace George Washington, though he afterwards waved in triumph the conquered sword of Cornwallis; that there were critics in Lincoln's time whose policies, if adopted, would have ended in disruption of the Union instead of a triumphal march of the American Army down Pennsylvania Avenue. With confidence that Woodrow Wilson, if unheckled and unannoyed, would measure up to his great task, he predicted in that speech that—

The time will come in the providence of God when our victorious Army, with America back of it, will come back home in triumph and march down this same great Avenue, panoplied with the flowers and love and tears and pride of all America in review before Woodrow Wilson, the man whom not only America but all the civilized world trusts. Liberty will be safe and Americanism will be secure.

His judgment was justified, his prediction has come true. Before the snows of a single winter had fallen on his new-made grave the armistice was signed; peace had come. "The war drum throbs no longer; the battle flags are furled." That victorious Army is coming back home, and before this month shall have passed will march triumphantly down this Avenue in review before the President of this great Republic, whom, in the eventful and crucial days of preparation for war, when he was beset by pacifists, pro-Germans, and critics, OLLIE M. JAMES, with unsurpassed patriotism, supported, defended, upheld, and encouraged.

Mr. President, no tribute to OLLIE M. JAMES would be complete, no history of him could do his memory justice without reference to his honor, his honesty, and his intensely keen sense of the obligation of a Senator and public servant.

During the last years of his life his services were sought in two important legal cases which would have paid him a fabulous sum—much more than lawyers of acknowledged ability could earn in a lifetime. Yet he refused to accept employment in either of them, for he believed that it was not his legal ability which the litigants sought, but that they were seeking his services because of his political prominence. In the summer of 1917 he had a contract with the Northwestern Chautauqua Association, by the terms of which he was to receive the sum of $10,000 as a platform speaker for that association during the summer of that year. Conceiving that his duty required his attendance upon the extra session of Congress which was called, he canceled the engagement and gave his time to his congressional duties.

His intellect, Mr. President, was one of marvelous native power; his lack of collegiate education was largely compensated by the opportunities which he had and embraced of acquiring knowledge from the school of experience. He was most noted for his gift of oratory; but he did not owe his triumphs so much to this as he did to an extraordinary mind, to steady work, and the impression he made on others that he was a man of ability. He was wonderfully adept in his power to engage and hold the attention of great throngs, and to this was due largely his great success in presiding over and controlling two great turbulent Democratic national conventions. His oratory was not the construction of phraseology into the "business" style, but as a speechmaker he was distinctly southern, a master of flowery language, with the taste and tact not to employ it beyond effective limits. Old-fashioned it may be, but in the case of OLLIE M. JAMES no man can say that he ever listened to one of his speeches all the way through and never got a single thrill out of it.

Mr. President, OLLIE JAMES was a brave fighter, who never lost a battle and never surrendered except to the malevolent final foe; he was, above all, a man and a gentleman, in whose soul burned brightly the light of chivalric courtesy and heartfelt consideration for others.

These qualities to Kentuckians, who hate a coward and to whom it means something precious and sacred to be a gentleman, appealed with such compelling force as to make of him the idol of his people, the most popular and admired man of his day.

The late distinguished Senator from Kentucky, Mr. President, has yielded the floor, never again to be heard in this Chamber. Kentucky is proud of his record here; the Nation will never forget him. We who knew him personally will always hold his memory in sacred and deep affection.

As a part of my remarks, Mr. President, I desire to read into the RECORD the resolutions adopted by the Democratic State central and executive committees of Kentucky, which met to select a nominee to succeed Senator JAMES in this body:

In the death of Senator OLLIE M. JAMES democracy has lost a great and gifted champion, the Senate an acknowledged leader of approved skill, the President of the United States a chosen champion and sponsor, and the people of Kentucky an idol son, whom she regarded, not without cause, with pride and affection.

Stricken in the meridian of his splendid manhood, his short life was crowded with splendid achievement. For 20 years a representative of the State in every national convention, twice he was chosen to preside over deliberations called to select his party's champion for the highest office in the civilized world. For five successive terms, without opposition, he represented his district in the Federal Congress, and upon his voluntary retirement from that post of honor he accepted a higher and more coveted position. From the hour of his appearance in the Senate of the United States he served with that distinction for which his ripened experience and brilliant talents so well fitted him.

His death at this hour is regretted not by a party alone, but by a Commonwealth and by a Nation.

Loyal, ardent, patriotic, brilliant orator, accomplished statesman, "though dead he still speaketh." His memory will be enshrined in the hearts of Kentuckians long after monuments of bronze or marble erected above his ashes shall have ceased to defy "the wasting tooth of time."

Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the late distinguished Senator from Missouri and to the memory of the late distinguished Senator from Kentucky, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Monday, February 3, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

Welcome and Leave-Taking of Members of Congress as They Come and Go in the Highest Legislative Body in the World.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAVID A. HOLLINGSWORTH,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, December 10, 1918.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I have not been much impressed with the congressional leave-taking usually incident to the retirement of Members as they come and go in this the greatest popular legislative body in the world. The lure and fascination of congressional life added to its honors and the opportunities it affords for great usefulness are generally sufficient to induce Members to wish to prolong their term of service. Few Members, indeed, whether they be distinctive leaders or of the average type, retire without some qualms of regret, unless it be to cross over, as many do, to the other end of the Capitol or possibly, as at least three Members from my own State, now called the Modern Mother of Presidents, have done in recent years, gone to the great white mansion at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue. I should not expect full credence if I claimed otherwise or pretended to be indifferent, but, nevertheless, my constituents know and I trust my friends here may believe that my retirement to private life is of my own free will and accord. Early in my present term I announced my purpose to follow a well-established third-term rule in my district, and adherence to this purpose has been to me quite a source of satisfaction. Security leagues, of which we have recently heard much and, I think, just complaint on the floor of the House, have not had any terrors for me. If critical of my official acts, they have not been offensive and have not even brought to my attention their self-conceived patriotic classification of the membership of the House. I have never seen or, if I did, never read one of their intended-to-be fear-inspiring documents of this kind.

Self-sufficient individuals known as lobbyists have also been considerate, have uniformly treated me with respectful courtesy, assuming, evidently and very properly, that not being a candidate for reelection I was immune from the blandishment, abuse, and other questionable influences to which public men are too often subjected. I have been permitted in a quiet way to do my own thinking. My votes have not been viséed by any influence other than my own desire to be right.

Even when my own party has been in the majority I have not been of the rubber-stamp variety.

Orthodox in my Republicanism, I have not always been lamblike in my following of would-be party leaders.

Cherishing to an extent my own individuality, I have recognized the same right in others and have not sought to unduly influence my fellow Members to my way of thinking.

During two of my terms in Congress my party has been in the minority, as it is now, and yet I have been assigned congenial committee work sufficient to occupy my time. A crumb or two of voluntary nonpartisan official patronage also came my way, one of my best known Republican constituents having been appointed recently to an important post-office inspectorship in a distant State. In fact, I have had but little cause of complaint, and it has been difficult for me not to believe in the good faith and good intentions of the membership of both parties as I have met and associated with them in this House. I have tried on my part to avoid unjust criticism or faultfinding. Especially is this true of the present Congress, in which both parties, so far as I know, although at times differing in nonessentials, have in all real war-winning measures acted as one, so that, now that victory has come, all may claim to share in the credit and devoutly thank God and the American Army that there is glory enough for all. If any man, big or little, gets more than his share of the limelight glory of the present, he may be sure corresponding darker days of shadow will follow. Time is sure to thwart pretense and is a great leveler of human ambitions. And if any Members have faltered in patriotic purpose, as charged by the Security League, or any have attempted to exploit their own importance by self-wrapping themselves in the American flag and vainly imagining themselves better than their fellow Members, it is a good time to forget them, leave them to their own vanity and individual folly. They are harmless.

I trust, therefore, in retiring to private life, returning to my law office, where I have pleasurably, if not profitably, spent much of my life, I may take with me the conscious good will and respect of every Member of the House on either side of the Chamber, and in return I give assurance of my own profound regard and appreciation of all. I have felt honored in being permitted to associate with such a splendid body of representatives of the people, fearless as they have been in judgment, honest in conviction, and true as the stars to duty and the best interests of our common country.

It is an inspiring thought and gives one an individual distinction likely to be cherished to the end of time.

I count myself fortunate—honored, I may say, beyond my deserts—in having had a part, however humble, in the deliberations of this body, in the consideration and solution of the great, overwhelming problems which have come to the Sixty-fifth Congress and caused it to be known, as it will be in history, as the war Congress of the ages.

Without any touch of vanity or reflection on other districts, I claim to represent one of more than ordinary interest and historic fame, certainly one of the foremost in the great State of Ohio.

In early days it was called the "reservoir of genius," noted far and near for the fame of its public men and its private citizenship.

Let me briefly call the roll of my own little home town of Cadiz, with less than 2,000 population by the last Federal census:

Edwin M. Stanton, the great war Secretary of Lincoln's Cabinet, commenced the practice of law here and was elected and served as county prosecuting attorney before going to his larger fields of acknowledged leadership.

The far-famed Bishop Simpson, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, known throughout the world as a most wonderful orator, said by Lincoln to have been unexcelled in history, was born here and partially educated by private tutors of the town. Afterwards, when the whole Nation was in mourning, he officiated at the Lincoln obsequies in Springfield.

John A. Bingham, our most conspicuous citizen, distinguished as the "silver-tongued orator" in Congress during the Civil War, a veritable pillar of Lincoln's administration, judge advocate at the trial of the conspirators who planned his assassination, chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House on the impeachment of President Johnson, and in charge of his trial before the United States Senate, where he delivered the final plea for loyalty to American institutions, and afterwards appointed minister plenipotentiary and ambassador extraordinary to Japan, where he did much to open up that land of the morning to the sunlight of modern civilization.

Maj. Gen. George Armstrong Custer, Grant's dashing cavalry leader and personal attendant at the final scenes at Appomattox, and whose tragic death in 1876 at the Custer massacre startled the whole civilized world, was an appointee of Mr. Bingham to the Military Academy at West Point.

Other names of almost equal prominence might be mentioned, but an extended list might seem like vanity to those not acquainted with the good little town where most of my life has been spent and where I expect to end my days.

Go into Belmont County and the same high-class citizenship appears:

Benjamin Lundy, of St. Clairsville, early organizer of the abolition movement. He knew every station and conductor on the underground railroad in slavery days. He was a sort of McAdoo director general of the line.

Charles Hammond, lawyer, editorial writer of national fame, and statesman.

Wilson Shannon, twice governor of Ohio, minister to Mexico, Territorial governor of Kansas, Congressman, able lawyer, born and long a resident in the county.

William Windom, a native, Secretary of the Treasury and twice United States Senator from a Western State.

Benjamin Ruggles, United States Senator.

J. M. Thoburn, bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

William Dean Howell, native and to the manner born, known to the world perhaps best as America's leading writer of fiction.

Congressmen, judges, and high officials galore, "too numerous to mention," but readily recalled as prominent members of the early families of Danfords, Kennons, Cowens, Carrolls, and many others of possibly greater eminence.

The county was for a time the center of civilization for the Northwest Territory, the town of St. Clairsville being named for Gov. St. Clair, and being the headquarters of pioneer life and activity.

In Carroll County they point with just pride to the old Dan McCook homestead, where he and his sturdy sons wrought and gave character to public thought before they became known to fame during the Civil War as the "tribe of Dan of the Fighting McCooks." The county is small in area and was late in organization, yet it counts among its early residents such citizens as Gov. Potts; Mr. Archbold, of Standard Oil Co. fame; Maj. Gen. William Crozier; Gen. and Congressman Ephraim R. Eckley; and others of like distinction.

From Columbiana County came another branch of the "Fighting McCooks," the "Tribe of John." Together this noted family of a dozen or more high officials gave to the district a most enviable military reputation, supplementing, seemingly in a local way, the great labors of Secretary of War Stanton, and leaving an example of heroism which young men in the present day have not been slow to follow. Headed by a McCook, a direct descendant, who has since made the supreme sacrifice on the fields of France, they began rushing to the colors as volunteers as soon as war was declared, without waiting for the slow-moving and, in the minds of some, doubtful processes of the selective-draft system.

And in this connection it ought also to be said that the McCooks were not alone soldiers of distinction, but they occupied high civic positions and were by nature and training high-toned gentlemen, educated, refined, and quite capable, as they did, of giving caste and dignity to their local surroundings.

Columbiana County was also rich in other respects, adding much to the fame and distinction of this so-called "reservoir of genius." The head and front of organized abolitionism centered at Salem, and to this day its citizens point with a degree of pride to a monument erected at the grave of an early enthusiast, Edwin Cappoct, who, leaving Salem, joined John Brown at Harpers Ferry and went with him to the scaffold at Charleston, a martyr to conscience and love of his fellow men.

The old town hall of Salem, still standing, was as famous in the days of antislavery agitation as Faneuil Hall at Boston in Revolutionary times. On its plain, wide platform eloquent and touching appeals on behalf of the slave were made by William Lloyd Garrison, Wendell Phillips, Abby Kelly Foster, Parker Pillsbury, Horace Mann, Fred Douglass, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Lucretia Mott, Oliver Lovejoy, Joshua R. Giddings, Salmon P. Chase, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Benjamin F. Wade, James A. Garfield, and many others, magnificent men and women, whose souls burned with a desire to free the bondman. It was the beginning, the torch of liberty, starting a conflagration in the world destined in after years to end in the universal freedom of mankind, such as is now presaged by the great victory just won over autocracy and imperialism.

Columbiana County is also famous in other respects. It was the high-water mark of the Southern Confederacy, John Morgan's raid having ended in his surrender within its borders and his troopers being sent to the Ohio Penitentiary.

Its citizenship in early days and now was and is of a very high order, impossible of detailed mention in reasonable limits without obvious omissions.

I mention but one, feeling sure no other citizen at this day will object to not being associated with him in name. His old homestead is one of the show places in Lisbon, and the prejudice once existing against him, especially among his neighbors and those who knew him personally, has long since oozed out of local minds. Brilliant, honest, determined even when wrong, Clement L. Vallandigham certainly added to the notoriety if not the fame of this so-called "reservoir of genius."

Lincoln, wiser, it may be thought, than some recent war officials, commuted a prison sentence against him for disloyalty to banishment among his friends, but this did not deter a great political party from nominating him for governor in the darkest hours of the war for the Union. The contrast between that day and this, between the action of the minority party then and now, is worthy of profound thought and study.

Coming to Jefferson County, the only remaining county in the district and the home of my successor to be—a most worthy business man, for whom I bespeak merited consideration at the hands of the Sixty-sixth Congress—I find the same difficulty as in Columbiana in naming, on account of their numbers, its conspicuously worthy citizens.

Besides the Wilsons, father and grandfather of the President, Edwin M. Stanton, born in Steubenville; United States Senator Tappan; the "Fighting McCooks"; Lieut. Gov. Richards; and Congressmen Updegraff and Gill, who have given the county much distinction, there are really many other names of substantial and able citizens, too many for classification, who have been or are now shedding renown upon the county and giving to it unusual importance as a business and social center. The city of Steubenville, the largest in the district, has been made attractive to home seekers, and men and families of wealth, culture, and business attainments have moved from other sections and by their association and refining influences have enriched its citizenship, already of a high order.

No city in the district has done more to justify and vindicate the sobriquet "reservoir of genius" than Steubenville, picturesque gem, it may be said, of the upper Ohio Valley.

This picture, Mr. Speaker and fellow Members, is not overdrawn.

I would not, however, have it understood that the importance of this section of Ohio has decreased in recent years. On the contrary, it has moved forward along all the lines of human progress and development. Education has become more general, good citizenship among the masses is held in higher esteem, and the rights of the individual man are more sacredly regarded.

Freedom and liberty of conscience have given to the people, the whole people, an uplift and dignity in marked contrast with earlier days when the Republic was young.

Industrial activity has advanced with marvelous rapidity, making of the district a veritable center of business life and progress.

It is the ceramic center of the universe, producing more pottery than any other like area in the world. In manufacture, mining, agriculture, grazing, and other business pursuits it claims unsurpassed distinction.

Intellectually, socially, and religiously its citizenship yields the palm to none. If occasion required, the district could, no doubt, easily furnish on short notice a full complement of well-equipped Congressmen, judges, governors, Cabinet officers, and even Presidents of the type of Hayes, Garfield, McKinley, and Taft.

Is it any wonder, therefore, that I am proud of my constituency? Is it any wonder that I am grateful for the opportunity I have had of representing them in this great war Congress? I ask no higher honor.

In taking leave of such a constituency and of the pleasant associations formed here in Congress I confess that as the time approaches regrets arise unbidden, but as the war is ended and permanent peace in sight I fully realize that my going or staying can not have any appreciable effect on the great upward and onward movements of mankind already forecasted and sure to follow the peace deliberations at Versailles.

The future of the American Republic, yea, of the whole world, is to me roseate with hope. Earth's millennial glory may dawn upon the world as suddenly as the war came and thus end for at least a thousand years the misery and wretchedness of mankind.

It is due, however, in parting that I make brief report of my stewardship to those at home whom I have tried to serve and to those in official life with whom I have had pleasant relations during my service in Congress.

Before the United States entered the conflict there was much and sharp controversy on the so-called subject of preparedness. Alarmists on the floor of the House and among the people expressed fears of an attack from one or the other of the belligerent powers, whichever one might be victor at the close of the war.

Serious-minded advocates divided on the subject.

Defining my own position on February 12, 1916, over a year before the United States was forced by German aggression to enter the war, in a public address at the Union League, in Philadelphia, printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on February 23, I used this language:

"A Nation of 100,000,000 of freemen, with unlimited resources, situated between two ocean barriers, and these barriers equipped as they are, or should be, with adequate coast fortifications, mines, submarines and submarine destroyers, aircraft, good roads, as in Germany, connecting such ocean barriers and thus furnishing ready means of transportation for an army from one point of danger to another on inside lines, need not, in a just cause, fear a combined world in arms, even if our Nation does not have a Navy 'the strongest and most powerful in the world,' as suggested by an eminent but somewhat belated militarist.

"We are not an aggressive people; our real permanent defense must always be in the justice, sincerity, and fair dealing of our Government with all the world.

"A patriotic, God-fearing, level-headed, just citizenship is needed at this hour in America in both official and private life. The teachings of history, instead of hysteria, should guide the Nation, uniformly successful as it has been in all its wars, two with Great Britain, one with Spain, and another with Mexico.

"Meantime the United States and its citizens, at peace among themselves and with all nations, owe duties to the world, to the belligerents, and to mankind—duties as positive and imperative and as delicate as those which confronted Abraham Lincoln in 1861, when Fort Sumter was fired upon and the smoldering fires of rebellion broke forth in all their fury. The warning of Washington against foreign entanglements must not be forgotten. Absolute neutrality with honor must be the American watchword. American citizenship at home or on the high seas, or anywhere else on earth where they have a right to live, must be respected. International rights and the broad claims of humanity must not be jeopardized or brushed aside lightly by any of the belligerent powers, and the Washington Government, in contending for these safeguards, must be backed to the limit so long as it in good faith tries to deal fairly, justly, and impartially with all the warring nations. Political scheming in an hour like this, in high or low places, is little less than treason to the Republic.

"A just and brave people can never be permanently conquered in this world, and, in my judgment, those who from timid fear or from honest judgment, or, worse, a contractor's ugly greed, seek in advance to turn this country into a vast continental military camp and our harbors into mere ports of entry for big battleships, on the theory only of preparing for war possibilities, are making a mistake.

"A nation situated as we are, inland between two great oceans, with limitless resources and a patriotic, God-fearing, just citizenship, composite mixture of the best races of mankind, can in defensive warfare defy the world in arms.

"If there is real danger of attack from any of the great powers, and those in high authority have secret information of the fact, as might be inferred from public acts and speeches, why does not the Government instantly commandeer and seize, as it should, the ammunition plants and factories of the country and keep their products at home safely stored for the emergency? Why the shipment of immense quantities of arms and ammunition to Canada and out of the country by every outgoing steamer? Such an embargo would at least attest the sincerity of the extreme preparedists. It is not craven or unpatriotic, as suggested by some fierce advocates of militarism, for a Nation of 100,000,000 free-born citizens, 10,000,000 of whom are subject to military duty in emergency, to feel secure against foreign invasion without keeping itself constantly on a war footing in time of peace.

"Such a nation is invincible unless it becomes the aggressor, and who is there among us, big or little, willing to admit such contingency? It was war-mad preparedness, without reason or sense, that plunged Europe into the frightful struggle of to-day. A match carelessly dropped into a tinder box may cause instant explosion, but a dozen such lighted and thrown into cold storage only cause a little spluttering, a fizz, a flare-up, and then gradual burning out without harm. The suggested war parallel is perfect. Calm thought and coolness are of more value than hasty action.

"Encroachments on the liberties of a free people come from military, not from civic, leaders. The man on horseback is always well groomed, booted, and spurred. He comes as Napoleon came, after the people have grown weary and exhausted from the maintenance of big standing armies in time of peace.

"I do not believe in Bryan's peace-at-any-price patriotism, nor do I believe in the blood-and-thunder, chip-on-your-shoulder attitude of a few very big men in this country, some of whom were old enough to have taken part in the Civil War, but were at that time strangely docile. Eventualities are uncertain, and it may be the ungodly forces of European malice or the so-called yellow peril shall unexpectedly break loose upon our fair land, notwithstanding its justice and absolute neutrality, but if so it will be an instant call to arms, and soon the war cry of the sixties, 'We are coming, Father Abraham,' changed only to apply to the present Executive, will be heard in stern resolve throughout the length and breadth of the Republic, and the quick response will be an army so overwhelming in numbers as to crush and destroy any possible invading force. It is a misnomer to call such intelligent citizenship a mob, as has been done by some self-opinionated military critics. The undrilled riflemen of Lexington and Concord were effective against trained British redcoats, and later, at New Orleans, a small force of irregular raw recruits, hastily called together under Gen. Jackson, were more than a 10-to-1 match for the trained veterans of England. So it has ever been and ever will be with the American volunteer when nerved to duty by an intelligent conviction of the righteousness of his cause.

"The 'common people,' as Lincoln loved to call them, still rule in this country, and they can not be deceived or cajoled into leaving the plain beaten paths of the Republic; they prefer the safe landmarks of the fathers."

The contest, intensified by organizations among the people, pro and con, on the subject of militarism, grew in force and interest as the presidential election of 1916 approached. The election centered largely upon this point.

The people were for peace. Whether, with or without reason, I do not undertake to say, they believed in the claims made by the friends of the President that he had kept us out of war, and, reasoning from this, they believed he intended to and would keep us out of threatening European complications.

They hailed him as a second George Washington warning his countrymen against foreign entanglements. Those who had watched his diplomacy in Mexico, and studied or knew of the secret John Lind hunt for Huerta's scalp, were incredulous, but they were not strong enough to turn the tide which had set in for the reelection of a "peace President."

Expecting myself to stand for reelection, as I did, and not wishing to be misquoted or misjudged, I sought opportunity to place of record my own views on the subject of militarism in general.

Accordingly, on the 23d of March, 1916, during the consideration of what was known as the Hay bill, to increase the Military Establishment, I submitted the following:

"Mr. Speaker—

"Four score and seven years ago—

"Said Abraham Lincoln on the historic field of Gettysburg—

"our fathers brought forth on this continent a new Nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

"Hitherto militarism in varying degrees had ruled the world and the power and influence of the nations had been reckoned by the number and strength of their standing armies. From feudal lords to kaiser and king the course of empire had been marked by blood and iron. The army was a distinct class and often overthrew the Government and humiliated the civic classes of the people. In early times the rank and file were quartered in private homes. It was the dominant force, a permanent military establishment, and ordinary citizenship seldom rose above the rank of serfdom. King and army were the government.

"But it was different with the new Nation, thus brought forth on the American Continent. Its basic principle rested with the people. Its power and strength in peace was to depend upon the justice and fair dealing of its citizenship and those who might be temporarily selected to exercise the functions of government. In war its reliance was to be upon a volunteer army, called temporarily from the walks of civil life, and to be disbanded and again become an integral part of the citizenship on the passing of the exigencies of war.

"A big standing army in peace, eating up the substance of industry, was not to be thought of. It was a reproach in the eyes of the men of 1776.

"Thus was liberty and republican government established in the New World. The new Nation, thus constituted, flourished and waxed strong. And at Yorktown, where the world's militarism received its first great shock in the surrender of British regulars and hired Hessians to the volunteer forces under Washington, its form of government and citizen soldiery were vindicated.

"Again and again, in the War of 1812, and in the Mexican War, this basic principle of free government was attacked and repeatedly vindicated.

"But the supreme test did not come until civil war shook to its foundation this new form of government, and caused President Lincoln, in this same speech at Gettysburg, to exclaim in sorrow:

"Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation or any nation so conceived and so dedicated can long endure.

"It stood the test. 'A new birth of freedom' came to the Nation at Appomattox. The lessons of that hour and the example of Grant and Lee, great leaders of volunteer armies, in at once disbanding their forces and retiring with them to the peaceful pursuits of civil life ought for all time to be a warning against militarism in every form.

"For a half century it seemed as if such warning would be world-wide and effective. The leaven of American liberty gradually worked itself upward and outward around the world. Absolute governments became constitutional, and in some notable instances, like that of France, purely democratic in form. The Russian Duma and the Republic of China may be extreme and to some extent doubtful experiments, but they show the clear tendency of modern thought away from the militarism of the past.

"But in an evil hour, seizing upon the unhappy war conditions in Europe, a new propaganda of militarism, under the specious name of 'preparedness,' made its appearance in the land of Washington and Lincoln, of Grant and Lee. I shall not stop to discuss the cause. Be it hysteria or sense, it is here in such force as to dominate the executive and legislative branches of the Government; and, very naturally, the favored few who have been retained in the military service, or at least on the pay roll, during the years of peace, assume to possess all wisdom and knowledge on this subject. The ideas and example of Grant and Lee are forgotten in the words and seerlike suggestions of those who see conflagrations and 'spark flying' everywhere.

"But details are unimportant. As Members of Congress, in the consideration of the pending bill (H. R. 12766—Hay bill) we are up against a condition. The splendid response of Congress and the country to the recommendations of the President, now that actual war exists in Mexico, and the fact that Congress has already, by a practically unanimous vote, provided for a further enlistment of 20,000 volunteer citizen soldiers, and indicated its willingness by like unanimity to back the Executive to the limit with additional volunteers, now that American lives are in actual peril and Old Glory has been wantonly insulted, does not seem to abate or modify the zeal of these propagandists of militarism.

"Their grip upon Congress and public sentiment seems to tighten.

"Leaders on both sides in Congress, in this wild movement to revolutionize our form of government, change and alter the basic principles of the new Nation brought forth by the fathers in 1776, have grown excited, dictatorial, and arrogant, and even the President, on the theory of preparing for unknown possibilities, is understood to have demanded that all the business of the country in Congress be suspended until a huge Army and Navy of royal and monarchical size can be provided for as a permanent, voracious, tax-eating substitute for the volunteer citizen soldiery of the Republic, who have heretofore successfully defended our country when assailed by both foreign and domestic foes.

"We are asked to abandon the beacon lights of experience. We are asked to return to the iron age.

"Nine-tenths of the present American Congress, in my judgment, are ready to stand by the President and follow any so-called preparedness plans he and his advisers may submit, even though some of them may doubt his disinterested motives. They are not disposed to be critical or stop to inquire the cause of undesirable facts. Congress is moving rapidly, and, although much time is wasted in volunteer speech making intended for use only in the districts, the time has come for every Member to take his position and do his duty as he sees it. If he acts conscientiously, without personal or political considerations, looking only to the practical welfare of his country, he may, even if mistaken, calmly face the future conscious of his own integrity and without fear of those at home who may be hoping to see him submerged politically by a U-boat or mine set for the unwary.

"Under such conditions what is the duty of a patriotic citizenship, what the duty of their Representatives in Congress?

"Answering for myself, with due deference to those who are older than I am in service in Congress and those at home who may not agree with me in sentiment, I believe it to be my duty to so vote and act as to get the best results possible for my country out of existing conditions, and keep the old ship of state, now rocked in angry seas, as far as possible away from the dangerous reefs and swift-moving currents of the present and as near as possible to the safe headlands and courses charted by the fathers.

"Accordingly, I shall vote against any and all amendments to the pending bill calculated to increase its tendency toward militarism and in favor of every one calculated to modify or minimize such tendency. Some amendments, like the Kahn proposition to more than double the present authorized strength of our standing Army, have already been voted down by substantial majorities, thus giving hopeful promise of the future. The bill itself, as unanimously—in form, at least—recommended by the committee, is not a radical measure. It increases the peace footing of the Army by only about 40,000 above the number at present allowed by law, and this increase is to be gradual. Other details, already fully discussed, might be referred to by me, but it would only be a waste of time. Suffice it to say that the bill as now amended and ready to be voted upon is, in my judgment, in the best possible form that antimilitarists can hope to have it. My fear is that, although on the floor of the House it has been repeatedly called the 'President's bill' by Chairman HAY, when it goes to the Senate the extreme militarists, self-styled preparedists, may be able to induce the Executive to look upon it from a different angle and demand that radical, almost revolutionary, changes be made."

My reelection followed in due course with an increased majority. A few voters of my own party with self-exploited patriotic ardor, but whose warlike desires seemed to cool off when questionnaire day came and the hunt for exemption or deferred military classification began, called me a pacifist, but their votes were not missed or regretted by me on election day.

During the canvass, although, like other Members, I remained on duty here, I had opportunity to speak on patriotic subjects.

Once, when the question was up of sending an army into Mexico to rescue the imperiled forces under Gen. Pershing, sent across the border in search of the bandit Villa, I said:

"Mr. Speaker, a grave blunder has been made in Mexico by the present administration as inexcusable, in my judgment, as that at Balaklava, when the 'Light Brigade' was ordered to useless slaughter. Its 'watchful waiting' and its 'in-again-and-out-again' policy have shown a total want of any definite, well-considered purpose, and has been fruitful only of unhappy results.

"It is regrettable from any patriotic or dignified viewpoint. It is explicable only on the theory of seeking partisan advantage.

"But actual war exists, call it what we may, and this, with patriots, should silence party differences and political scheming. At such a time, like it was with the troopers of the Light Brigade when ordered to advance, it is not for American patriots now 'to reason why.' 'Forward' is the order of the President, and this, to my mind, fixes the duty of citizenship. American blood has been drawn; American soldiers have been ambushed and shot; the American flag has been insulted and American citizenship has been outraged beyond endurance or decency. An inadequate American force is to-day in peril, if not already annihilated, on foreign soil, and the Commander in Chief of the Army, made so by the Constitution and the suffrages of the people, asks of Congress authority to call our State reserves to the colors. It is not a time for partisan thought or accusation.

"There is no middle ground for patriotism either at the White House or among the people.

"I am emphatically a man of peace. War is abhorrent. Although only a private soldier in the Civil War, I saw enough of its horrors to know that Gen. Sherman was right when in his blunt speech he said it was hell.

"But peace may be purchased too dearly. Loss of honor and self-respect in a nation or individual is the beginning of the end, and I shall not knowingly be a party to such a beginning.

"As for myself, I have no apologies to make for my support of this resolution. The tocsin of war has sounded for my country, and this is a signal to me to sink party differences, and figuratively speaking at least, join the colors. What boots it if we have a Democratic administration? What boots it if he has made serious mistakes in his past Mexican policy? What boots it if his partisan followers are seeking to coin political advantage out of the discharge of simple, plain, patriotic duties? What boots it to whom the honors of success shall fall when Old Glory returns in honor from Mexican soil? We are all Americans, and patriotism should not have any dividing party lines. Only the selfish and self-seeking think otherwise."

Again, May 1, 1916, when a determined effort was made in the House to fix a time for the withdrawal of American influences in the Philippines and haul down Old Glory in the Orient, I protested as follows:

"Humanity, national honor, and the solemn trust assumed by our Government at the close of the Spanish-American War forbid the abandonment of the Philippines at least until the Nation shall have discharged its full duty to the native islanders as pointed out by President McKinley in his last message to Congress, in which he called the Philppines the 'wards of the Nation,' and further explained that—

"Our obligation as guardian was not lightly assumed. It must not be otherwise than honestly fulfilled, aiming first of all to benefit those who have come under our fostering care. It is our duty so to treat them that our flag may be no less beloved in the mountains of Luzon and the fertile zones of Mindanao and Negros than it is at home, and that there as here it shall be the revered symbol of liberty, enlightenment, and progress in every avenue of development.

"With Old Glory thus raised in the Orient, we are asked to-day—almost commanded by the Executive—to order it hauled down, furled, and laid away, as was the first American flag raised in Hawaii and afterwards taken down by order of a former Chief Executive of the same party faith, only to be again raised in honor when the Republican Party came into power. Gem of the Pacific, no American to-day with an ounce of red blood in his veins thinks of abandoning this island.

"I can not with my convictions of duty aid in the sacrifice of national honor proposed by this bill. The American flag, once raised in honor, shall never be lowered in dishonor by my vote while I remain a Member of the American Congress. I would rather resign at once and let some one of easy conscience take my place who can substitute expediency and sycophancy for national honor and duty.

"I propose in my vote to-day to stand by the administration of President McKinley in its settlement of the Spanish-American War; stand by his soul, heart, and conscience, as I knew and understood them from intimate personal association with the man, and by the wise councilors of state whose advice he sought, and by the Congress of the people to whom, in a constitutional way, he made recommendations, but never sought to dominate or control."

As election day approached and signs of Republican success began to multiply, Democratic leaders grew apprehensive and, throwing civil-service rules to the wind, rushed the campaign with reckless energy.

As illustrating conditions in my own district, I quote from a speech in the RECORD of September 7, 1916:

"Mr. Speaker, the leading Democratic newspaper of my district, published by a corporation whose president is postmaster in its principal city, recently attacked my vote against the Senate amendment to the House naval bill, which, according to the statements of this paper, provided for the construction of 157 new American war vessels, suggesting further that the President, who not long ago said we already have an efficient Navy, had his heart in the measure and used his influence to bring about its passage, adding with usual partisan zeal that I would be 'called to explain' my vote, and that I 'would have to step aside and let a younger man take my place,' indicating that such younger man was to be my present Democratic opponent.

"Believing it the right, in fact duty, of every good citizen, whether friendly or otherwise, in or out of the Government service, to call upon his Congressman for an explanation of any of his votes, if desired, I promptly acted on the suggestion and sent to the paper my explanation, expecting naturally it would be given the same publicity as the attack on my vote, although in this expectation I was disappointed.

"It follows substantially:

"'Whether or not the President is in favor of this colossal increase in naval expenditures, greater in amount than ever before proposed in any Government on earth in war or peace, is not and can not be known until the bill reaches him for Executive action.

"'The Army bill, just vetoed, was in like manner put forward by his friends in the House as one of his pet measures without any thought of a veto. Democratic leaders seemed to speak for him with authority, and, being a conservative measure, it met with little opposition on either side of the Chamber, or elsewhere until the Senate largely increased it, followed by a presidential veto.'"

"'Anyone reading the details of this bill, with the added Senate amendments, must realize that by it a new and distinct un-American class, independent of the people, is formed in this country with a provision for its continuance years after the hoped-for change of administration shall take place by the inauguration of President Hughes in March of next year.

"'A shade of doubt is also cast upon the sincerity of the President, if he really does favor this great and increasing naval expenditure, by the fact that the keels of a number of war ships, long ago authorized by Congress, have not been laid or begun by this administration, and the certainty that this program can not be completed until 1920. Facing this condition, and with this knowledge, with signs of peace on every hand, as stated by the President, how should I have voted? Of course, I could have dodged or not voted as did other Members according to the RECORD, some doubtless for fear of just such newspaper attacks as have been made upon me. But I never dodged a duty in my life and am too old to begin. I admit mistakes, but no fair-minded man or woman ever charged me with evasion. The only choice, therefore, left to me was to follow my own convictions and vote as I did with the minority, including Mr. KITCHIN, majority leader, and such sturdy Republican leaders as CAMPBELL, of Kansas, and LENROOT, of Wisconsin, instead of with the majority, certain as it was of success, and exultant under the leaderhip of the Democratic chairman of the Naval Committee and the Republican minority leader. I am on record as a conservative and in favor of honest neutrality, but have supported every war measure asked for by the President without a thought of partisan advantage accruing to him, except the present proposition, if he be in fact in favor of it.'"

Election day came. The Republican slump in Ohio and California resulted disastrously to the party, but I was reelected in my district, plucked from the burning, so to speak, much to the chagrin of local Democrats and the few voters I have referred to of my own party who claimed I was too slow stepping for their warlike souls. German atrocities continued. Sparks from the European battle fields began to fly in every direction. The militant spirit of America was aroused as the Germans added horror to horror. The Lusitania was sunk. U-boat warfare was extended ruthlessly to noncombatants, women, and children. Honor, self-respect, and manly chivalry left but one course to pursue. The President followed that course and a very large majority of this Congress followed him. The result is glorious history.

That no one, friend or foe, in my district might longer pretend to be in doubt as to my views, I rose in the House April 5, 1917, when the declaration of war was under consideration, and in a brief speech explained the impossibility as I saw it of America attempting longer to play the rôle of neutrality. Further dalliance seemed like inviting attack; seemed like an admission that "we were too proud to fight."

I quote substantially in full:

"Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this resolution as a patriotic duty; I shall vote for it in the same spirit with which over a half century ago I offered my young manhood to my country on a similar call from President Lincoln.

"I shall vote for it because our present duly elected Chief Magistrate has said to us in effect that he has exhausted all proper means of avoiding war with a nation which happily heretofore has been at peace with us during all our national life. As the President has well said, 'It is a most fearful thing to lead this great peaceful people into war'; but his is the responsibility; our duty in a sense is of lesser degree—that common to all official and patriotic citizenship.

"I represent a district in which there are many so-called pacifists, sturdy, rugged, conscientious believers in the peaceful doctrines of William Penn; nonresistants, if you please, and yet men and women of the type of martyrs, unafraid in any human presence. I honor them. Family traditions and teaching point me in the same direction, and yet, as in the lurid days of the Civil War, placing country above family ties or personal considerations, I must respond to duty as I understand it—answer the call of the President and stand by him in matters of immediate concern, such as the resolution we are now considering, reserving only matters of conscience and the future exercise of deliberation and judgment on doubtful governmental policies which may or may not arise after the exigencies of the hour shall have passed.

"With me it is not a matter of excitement or hysteria caused by war propagandists or aroused by the more serious and burning words of the President. I do not agree in sentiment with all he has said. I have felt that absolute neutrality, even to the extent of an embargo on the shipment of arms and ammunition to belligerents, was the duty of this great Republic, and I am loath to waver in judgment in this respect. But I fear we are approaching a condition where not to stand by the President—elected for four years by the people and the only one we have or can have in the present emergency—would be like attempting to tie the hands and embarrass the executive branch of the Government, a thing which I feel no Member of Congress ought to be expected to do in such an hour of national peril.

"This does not mean that all Members of Congress should follow him in extreme ideas for the future, such as the construction of big battleships in large numbers which can not possibly be put in commission until after present dangers are past, or in big standing armies for the future formed by compulsory military training; in other words, abandoning the ideals of the Republic for the reactionary ideals of monarchy. My hope has been that permanent peace and disarmament might come together."

The declaration was full and complete. It solemnly pledged to the winning of the war all the resources, men and money, of the most powerful Nation on earth, leaving details and methods of execution to the future action of the President and Congress.

Presumably the traditions of the Republic were to be preserved; they had stood the crucial tests of five successful wars.

The volunteer system of organizing armies was not an experiment with free, patriotic, self-governing peoples. It had been tried and not found wanting. It was based upon man as a responsible, thinking being, while the opposite or conscript system reckons with him more as a physical force.

The inherent right of a free citizen to volunteer and fight in defense of his country had never before been questioned. It seemed as well recognized and as sacred as the right to defend one's person or family when attacked.

But new light and wisdom were professedly said to have come to the President and his advisers from "experts on both sides of the water," as they were aptly termed by the President himself, and thereupon the traditions of the Republic and the experience of its founders and defenders in past wars were ignored.

Congressional action was necessary to give sanction to this innovation, and a sharp controversy arose. It raged for days with rare earnestness in the House, backed by the administration, but finally the policy of conscription, sugar-coated as selection, won, and the volunteer system was discredited for the first time in the history of the Republic.

The new system, selective drafting, has proven a success, judged by the only standard permissible in war—success itself. It is not now a subject of discussion; believers in the old traditions of the fathers and the volunteer system are silenced.

But what it may lead to in the hazy realms of the future can not now be told. Whether or not it means the entering upon a broader, more liberal, and more genuinely republican policy than that of Washington and Lincoln, leading eventually to the consummation of the higher ideals of a free world, must for the present remain a matter of conjecture. He who rules and must reign, on earth as in heaven, alone can tell. My hope and prayer is for its success, although admitting a fear that some time in the years to come, in an unguarded moment, some imperialistic believer in big standing armies and big military establishments, like Napoleon or Caesar, may appear on horseback and seek to lead a confiding people backward and wrench from them the fair fruits of liberty won by our armies of to-day at such fearful sacrifice.

Having, as stated, honestly and in good faith as a Representative in Congress contended for the volunteer system, I deem it only proper on this occasion to let the printed RECORD fully explain. I have no apologies to make for my votes, nor desire to conceal my beliefs on this or any other public question.

On April 25, 1917, a few days after war was declared, the House having under consideration the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment by volunteer enlistments, which had been reported with a favorable recommendation by the Military Committee, a motion was made to strike out this volunteer feature and substitute in its place one authorizing conscription or compulsory military service, I said:

"Mr. Chairman, I can not vote for this bill if its volunteering features are stricken out as proposed. I will vote for it if such features are retained, out of deference to the judgment of the President, assuming that his wishes are correctly reported to us by the war journals and by those of our House leaders who are supposed to speak for him, although some of its other provisions, its colossal magnitude, its suggestions of close foreign cooperation and possible future entanglements, contrary to American ideals and contrary to the thought of many Members of the House when they voted for the declaration of war believing, as they did at the time, it was to be an American war, waged by American volunteer soldiers in defense of American rights ruthlessly invaded by the German Kaiser, as set forth in the President's address. Members of Congress of all parties were willing to trust the management of such a war to the President and his official advisers under American plans, not expecting them to resort to royal ways or royal advice.

"Consideration of my own duty, therefore, in regard to the measure has been largely confined to the question of conscription without first giving the citizen, able and willing to serve his country, an opportunity to volunteer in its defense whenever or however it may be attacked. Conscription, without such opportunity, is, in my judgment, unrepublican and un-American. It is a stigma upon patriotism. Its advocates are fundamentally wrong in their basic conceptions. They declaim loudly about universal military service being the duty of every citizen of the State, but they strangely omit to mention the fact that in a Republic the people are the State and that therefore the duty they proclaim is but the ordinary reciprocal obligations of good citizenship, universal and binding alike upon all who would enjoy the blessings of a republican form of government. It is a proud privilege, a freeman's heritage, a most sacredly guarded right of the citizen to voluntarily join his copatriots in defense of their common country when assailed without being conscripted or unjustly classed with the unwilling or unworthy. Conscription implies involuntary servitude by force, a stigma not to be put upon the patriotic citizenship of a Republic excepting only when the volunteer system fails to produce satisfactory results.

"This has been the rule of the Republic ever since its foundation. It has brought victory and never defeat to the Stars and Stripes. Its virtue has never heretofore been questioned. But it is now said a great emergency has arisen and that there is no time to study the historic lessons of our own Republic, founded by George Washington and his compeers, and that, therefore, American traditions and ideals must be abandoned and the old, old lights of the world invoked for our own immediate guidance.

"A great English general, hero of nine wars and first British officer to meet the German line, according to reports in our war journals, tells us that the volunteer system is a failure. But his viewpoint is from that of a monarchy; he speaks for the citizenship of a kingdom, not of a republic. A study of some of the great battles of our Civil War, fought by volunteer soldiers, Federals and Confederates, might tell a different story.

"The wheels of progress and thought are to be turned backward toward militarism, backward toward a condition which our modern Secretary of War, in his letter to Chairman DENT, calls a 'philosophy.' So be it. This bill with its elastic volunteering feature provides for just such supposed contingency, but it places the responsibility where it justly belongs—with the President. The House committee has wisely provided that—

"In the event the President decides that such additional force or forces shall not have been effectually raised under the call for volunteers as herein provided the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to raise by draft as herein provided, organize, and equip an additional force of 500,000 enlisted men, or such part or parts thereof as he may at any time deem necessary.

"No limitation as to time is put upon this power of the President. If in his judgment conditions exist warranting it, he has power to so order at any time after volunteering begins. It is left discretionary with him; he is the sole judge, and the bill does not seek to restrain this exercise of Executive power.

"Early after the election of the President last fall, induced largely by the cry that 'he kept us out of war,' I resolved, as a matter of patriotic duty, to stand by his administration in so far as conscience would permit. I resolved in my humble way, waiving all conditions not vital to conscience, to follow his leadership. I have tried in this respect to be true to my country's best interest according to the light God has given me.

"In this spirit I voted approval of the ill-starred expeditions into Mexico, although not entirely convinced that the Taft policy was wrong in declaring an embargo on the shipment of arms and ammunition across the Rio Grande and keeping the American Army encamped on the north bank ready to protect and defend American life and property from any and all assailants.

"I voted without question for the President's modest recommendations, as originally made, for increasing our Army, relying, like a majority of American voters, upon his campaign promises.

"I voted to sustain him in his German diplomatic letter writing, believing it to be in line with a well-considered policy of avoiding actual rupture with a great nation with which we had been at peace all our national life.

"I voted approval of his severance of diplomatic relations, although I felt some hesitation, thinking possibly the necessity might have been avoided by a little stricter adherence to our announced policy of neutrality and the exercise of more real diplomacy in dealing with the German Embassy at Washington.

"I voted for the authority asked by the President and his advisers to arm American merchant vessels to defend against German submarines, which now on all hands seems to have been a useless waste of patriotism.

"I voted, with confessed misgivings as to where it might lead us, but in accordance with my desire to patriotically stand by the President, for the $7,000,000,000 appropriation asked to carry on the war, the immensity of which is staggering and has no parallel in history.

"I have expressed my willingness to vote for this bill giving, as it does, to the President an absolute war power greater than that ever conferred upon king or potentate, saving only that over the life and death of the subject, if only the ideals of the Republic and its founders can be preserved in a land where now none but free men live.

"I can not follow the President in this.

"I criticize no one who differs with me.

"I answer only to my conscience, to my ideas of an overruling Providence, feeling that I am immune from the embittered charge of political self-seeking hurled against Members of the House, not expecting again to be a candidate for Congress and having no ambition except to do my duty as God gives me to see it during this Congress, the most important parliamentary body ever assembled in the history of the world. I shall hope, however, if I live until March 4, 1919, to take home to my constituents a clear conscience and a pair of clean hands. [Applause.]"

A few days afterwards when it became apparent that the motion to amend the bill would carry, April 28, the RECORD shows I made this further suggestion:

"As this discussion draws to a close it has become apparent that the American volunteer system, successful heretofore in all our wars, is to be stricken down. The conscription system is to be substituted in its place as the future military policy of the Republic by influences powerful enough in this House to override the earnest pleadings of our honored Speaker, former Speaker CANNON, the chairman of both the Military and Naval Committees, the majority leader, Mr. KITCHIN, Dr. FESS, Mr. MONDELL, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, and many other leaders of experience and conscience.

"I desire to say a last word on this subject to fellow Members of this House, whose good opinions I value, and to my constituents. If a law favoring conscription and leading to permanent militarism be enacted, I shall stand ready to vote full power to the President to exhaust, if necessary, all the resources of a brave, free people, all the resources of the Government in men and money, to bring the war to a successful conclusion."

The roll was called, the vote taken, and the record made up.

I stand by it, and, since then, following my expressed purpose, have conscientiously given support to the big Army supply bills and other war measures asked for by the President. Some of them have been colossal and startling, staggering, in fact, to plain people like myself; but, like Stephen Decatur of old, I have tried to be for my country, right or wrong. His, however, in large measure has been the responsibility, and now that victory has come, is it remarkable that a corresponding feeling of personal triumph should affect the President himself, who after all is much like the rest of us, merely human? He is welcome, so far as I am concerned, to break all previous presidential records for absence from the country and sit for a time, if he wishes, at the head of the most wonderful peace conference the world has ever known or will know again. His friends may well claim for him this honor and this distinction.

Perish, therefore, any thought that he goes abroad seeking on foreign soil only the plaudits and limelight glory of a world now wholly freed from bondage and not for the expressed object of finally achieving for mankind his high hopes and ideals.

Let us be just to the Executive head of the Nation even though we do not agree with him in politics or in matters of taste and official detail in the office he temporarily holds.

The decisions of this peace conference are likely to be just and be final for all time. It will no doubt seek to render to Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and may God in his wisdom be with America in her efforts to return to normal conditions. She did not enter the war for conquest; her public men are not now exploiting, as the newspapers report some of the representatives of the allied powers, the billions expected to be exacted as their separate indemnity from the German people, nor are we proclaiming in advance of the meeting of the peace conference that America will insist upon or accept any particular world privilege such as reported of England by King George's premier to the effect that her ancient claim of right will be revived and unalterably insisted upon to maintain in peace or war a fleet powerful enough to dominate the world. Shades of Valley Forge, Yorktown, and New Orleans! Can not such disquieting thoughts remain in the shadows where they belong and where they have been since 1812? It is an unhappy time to revive memories of the past. All questions between the allies or with America should be held in abeyance, at least until they can be discussed in friendly conference. The Talleyrand diplomacy of Vienna must not be repeated at Versailles. It might be fatal to the future peace of the world.

The pathway of America from temporary autocracy, from absolute war power temporarily lodged in the Executive, back to plain republican simplicity is fraught with dangers seen and unseen; it is a long and rugged road, but in the final destiny of the world its success or failure must be the real test of human liberty. It will reveal the final strength or weakness of American institutions. We have reached the crossroads of destiny.

Partisan scheming for or selfish criticism of the President in an hour like this is little short of treason to American ideals.

Mr. Speaker, I have little further to add to the report of my stewardship. I have not, as you and my fellow Members of Congress know, sought the limelight or had special hobbies to exploit on the floor of the House or in the public press. My individual acquaintance in the press gallery is almost negligible, although duly appreciative of this powerful third house of Congress. I have not sought notoriety in any way; my time has been fully occupied by the plain duties of a Congressman.

Besides necessary attention to the local requirements of a district of great and varied industrial interests, my general committee work has been sufficient to keep me busy, except when the House has been in session for business. My record of attendance on the daily sessions is good. I have been a willing, patient listener, but as a speaker I have been somewhat modest and unobtrusive—a rare combination, I may say, without intending offense in this House.

My committee work, although important and wholly selected by others for me, has not been of the kind conducive to floor prominence. The iron-bound rule of seniority in service, not in experience or years, has kept me off the only committee—the Judiciary—in harmony with my whole life work, but personally I can not say that I regret it. It may have been for the best in my case, certainly has been for many of my constituents, comrades of the old and comrades of the new Army, for whom I have been able to labor with greater diligence; but I express the hope that in the Sixty-sixth Congress it will, like the autocracy of the Kaiser, be utterly destroyed. It has no place in a free, open forum of the people. It is a relic of the old absolutism of the Speaker, happily and timely snuffed out in the Sixty-first Congress.

In this age cards must be played face upward on the table.

Modesty, Mr. Speaker, is said somewhere to bespeak one's merit; and if this be so, then I claim title to a certificate of merit from this House. Speech making merely for the sake of being heard has not been my rôle. By my acts and my votes I am willing to be judged by my constituents. My votes are of record; I have never dodged unless absent on account of sickness or other sufficient cause.

Outside of my support of war and patriotic measures, my votes will show that I have stood for the general uplift and encouragement of my fellow men, stood for moral righteousness and reform whenever or however presented.

Modestly I have tried to remember the unselfish dream of the poet:

> Honor and shame from no condition rise;
> Act well your part, there all the honor lies.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. MOON,
OF TENNESSEE,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 7, 1919.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me, I insert the following letter and synopsis by Theodore N. Vail, discussing the telegraph and telephone systems and the wisdom of the union of the two, and Government ownership of the same:

NEW YORK, January 3, 1919.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
Chairman Committee on the Post Offices and Post Roads, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Inclosed please find corrected proof sheets of my communication of December 30, and also a condensation of the contents.

Sincerely, yours, THEODORE N. VAIL.

DECEMBER 30, 1918.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON, Chairman
Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter, inclosing House bill 368 and letter of the Postmaster General relating thereto requesting my views, is received.

It is my assumption that the request covers my views upon the broad question of a proper solution of the problems of the electrical transmission of intelligence by any means and under such an organization or such policy as will bring about the greatest possible extending and broadening of its usefulness under the present state of the art and also insure the greatest possible future development.

It is admitted that the great utilities of interchange and intercommunication, which have been so largely instrumental in the great development of the economic and social world and upon which the progress and continuity of such development depends, are suffering from the application and interpretation of existing laws concerning control and regulation, and as the proposed bill calls for some plan of organization it is also my assumption that my views should also cover some suggestions as to the underlying features of a curative solution of the question of control and regulation.

It is not my understanding that this bill is a Government ownership and operating measure, but its purpose is to give sufficient time to prepare and present to Congress a specific proposition for the reorganization on some basis which will work for efficiency and economy of all the international and intranational wire systems operated and controlled from the United States. There would seem to be no question as to the wisdom of such an attempt.

A thoroughly considered, well-thought-out solution can not be prepared under pressure or in a short time.

We know the "don'ts" in unmodified government operation, and the "don'ts" in unrestricted private operation, and the "don'ts" in our present uncorrelated, uncoordinated control and regulation, and these should be the guides.

The solution involves new economic practices of which there is little or no direct experience.

It is recognized that in the interests of the public advantage the utilities should not be returned to the owners without some correction of the existing deficiencies in regulation and control.

Under the present status of Government operation and control little can be done toward the ultimate solution which must take place which will not have to be undone when the period of control ends and the systems are again subjected to the present interpretation and application of existing laws.

It would seem as very desirable for the country that time should be given for such a solution. It would also seem, in simple justice to the owners of the existing systems, that during that period whatever is done by and with the consent of the companies interested and of the public authorities toward partial unification of the wire systems should be exempted from the application of existing laws.

My position upon Government ownership and operation has been repeatedly and unmistakably expressed.

Unmodified Government ownership and operation is no solution because of the absence of essential factors to efficient operation, such as continuity of administration and consequent lack of opportunity for the full fruition of incentive and initiative, lack of rewards both in large opportunity for promotion and such compensation as will retain those of the organization who have developed qualifications and accomplishment against the rewards afforded in private industry.

Neither is unregulated or uncontrolled private ownership and operation a solution because of the opportunity for selfish exploitation.

Between these extremes there must be found a solution.

The great difficulty will be to settle upon a solution which will not leave opportunity for, and perpetuate in some other form the same evils which now exist in, the multiplicity of uncorrelated, irresponsible, complex, contradictory, and overlapping forms of control or regulation, or leave opportunity for unjudicial and biased action or selfish aggression.

There is, however, in my opinion, a possibility of a simple, complete, and satisfactory solution.

There is without doubt an opportunity for a great piece of beneficial and constructive work by combining and coordinating all the various existing utility services, or those that are complementary and supplementary, into one or more well-balanced systems, the extent of which should be determined by the nature of the service, by the extent of the service rendered, and by commercial, geographic, economic reasons; and by combining in a direct manner, and as far as possible divorced from political or partisan or class influence, the requisite power and authority of the Federal Government expressed in a mandate to equilibrate revenue, operating costs, and capital charges, with an operating organization adapted to the requirements of the service, and based on the methods which experience, enterprise, and operation in the industrial world have shown to be effective, efficient, and economical.

Government control and regulation and restrictions need the same cure that our utilities do—combination, coordination, cooperation—"one system" interdependent and interrelating, with a single or coordinated responsible control over all similar utilities, and over all the factors that make for operation, for continuity, for permanence, for efficiency and success, and above all there must be recognition of the fact that neither labor, management, nor capital is independent of the others, and that neither can permanently get any benefit at the sacrifice of the others, and that permanent maintenance of operating organization depends upon reasonable rewards for the actual contribution of each to the work.

ELECTRICAL TRANSMISSION OF INTELLIGENCE.

Facilities for interchange of intelligence or ideas by electrical transmission are substantially different from facilities for other interchange, in that nothing tangible is transmitted or transported; the transmission is a series of electric vibrations or interruptions, totally dissimilar to transportation of goods, letters, passengers, in which the actually tangible thing is carried in bulk or in quantity and can be handled or transferred; and the vehicle or the train of vehicles in which it is carried is the nearest to a unit of transportation.

All utilities of transportation can be divided up into systems of greater or less extent. In through passenger or freight service there is a limit to direct continuous transit due to the methods and machinery and facilities of transportation. In telegraphy the more direct and continuous the transmission the more perfect the service, but in the telephone service direct and continuous transmission is essential to any service. In all other utilities of intercommunication the transmission or transportation must be from one point to some other point and need not be continuous, direct, or necessarily over the same system. Telephone transmission, however, must be direct and continuous; it is an actual conversation between two parties. The connection must be continuous, direct, and over the same system. This introduces an essential prerequisite to service in telephony which does not exist in any other public service.

The transmitting currents of the telegraph and telephone are similar in many of their features, but the telegraph transmits vibrations or interruptions of current which are translated into letters and written words, while the telephone transmits vibrations or partial interruptions of the current which in themselves form the spoken word.

It has developed early in the evolution of the telephone service that while there were common features in the technique, the service rendered was entirely distinct, each having its own particular field, not competitive but complementary. Long before the common use of the wire plant for both purposes was developed the advantage of a combined system of telegraph and telephone under one control was recognized.

The ideal of one wire system, universal (national), interdependent, intercommunicating, under one control, has been consistently pursued by the Bell system, against the cry of monopoly and usurpation and charges of aggression and so-called competition. This ideal has been completely vindicated in that one system is now recognized as the only method for comprehensive telephone service, and is now being urged on opposing systems instead of being opposed.

The combination of the telephone and telegraph systems, which was undertaken by the Bell system but set aside under the interpretation and the application of existing laws, demonstrated in the short time of its existence the advantages.

In 1909 it was thought that a great public benefit could be obtained from the union of the telephone and telegraph and that by gradually utilizing all wires for both purposes, and by making one plant serve for both purposes, the maintenance, the organization, and above all the depreciation, which is very large in open-wire systems, of one plant could be saved. While the immediate utilization of one plant for both purposes would require reconstruction and rearrangement of facilities which would be too costly and make too much disturbance, the ultimate utilization would be made in the ordinary course of maintenance and reconstruction in the course of a few years with little cost and no disturbance. It was, however, immediately possible to make every one of the 10,000,000 telephone stations day and night telegraph stations and thus reduce the number of telegraph offices which were maintained at a loss, and to expedite and cheapen delivery of messages beyond the delivery districts or in the country; and it was also possible to introduce some new forms of cheap deferred service.

The wire system of the future will be one nation-wide system, under single control, by or over which direct connection can be established between any two places for the electrical transmission of any communication or of the spoken word; and every individual place will be the center of the system for transmission in any direction to the limit of transmission.

The science of industrial application of electricity is almost as new as the telephone. The whole telephone art had to be created; it did not exist, nor was there, as is usual in new enterprises, anything analogous to it upon which to base action and policy. It was necessary from the very beginning of the telephone development by the Bell system to maintain a research investigation experimental department. At first small and inconspicuous, but extremely alert and wide awake, it has grown into one of the largest laboratories of the application of science to industrial development in the world, and engages the services of a large number of the most eminent scientists, who are devoting themselves to the unfolding of natural laws and phenomena and their application to the art of electrical transmission of intelligence. To this branch or department is due the fact that this country leads the world in that art, and its work has made possible a continuous reduction in the average charges per unit of service through the savings in cost of operation, equipment, construction, etc. It is estimated that the present savings over methods prevailing not many years ago in operation and construction amount to at least $50,000,000 a year.

The marked development which justified the early belief in the common factors of telephonic and telegraphic evolution was the superimposing on the telephone wires simultaneous telegraph transmission—now so developed that all toll lines of any length are being or can be used for the dual purpose. Among the multitude of other improvements was the twisted pair wire circuit which neutralized extraneous noises induced by high-voltage electric power or light transmission and by static currents which are so deadly and so limit the usefulness of wireless transmission; and the multiple switchboard, which made immediate connections possible in exchange service; these two have contributed more than any other two things to make exchange and long-line service popular and practicable.

The development of the utilization of plant and the search for new uses both for telephone and telegraph were continuous.

The multiplexing of the telegraph side of the telephone wire, the phantom telephone circuit by which a third telephonic circuit could be superimposed on every two telephone circuits, were two very important results. The studies and observations on applied telephone practice may be said to have greatly cheapened, and to have revolutionized apparatus and operating methods, each few years. The distance of transmission through aerial and underground cables was extended from a few miles to 500 miles, and now it is certain of being extended to 1,000 miles or more. This will ultimately be productive of great economy on leads carrying a large number of wires and of great efficiency in bridging districts where there is frequent occurrence of destructive sleet and wind storms. The reduction of the size of the wire and the weight of copper required in the transmission circuits not only greatly reduced the cost of material but made it possible to use in the underground conduits cables with as high as thirty times the number of circuits for which they were originally intended. When we consider that there are over 20,000,000 miles of copper wire in use and the reduction in weight to one-half or even one-quarter of what was formerly needed, the saving can be appreciated. When we realize that the underground conduits for the telephone cables have cost over $100,000,000, some idea of the saving in construction through increased capacity can be formed. Open-wire transmission was developed from a somewhat indifferent transmission from New York to Chicago requiring special terminals in exchanges to commercial transmission across the continent from any exchange terminal, and at the same time it was made possible to run the long-distance circuits through the underground exchange systems and not around them, as was the practice.

Early in 1915, after several years of experimenting, research, and investigation, wireless or radio telephoning was made a practical demonstrated success. Through the courtesy and assistance of our Navy Department in giving us the use of the Arlington wireless station and the cooperation of naval officials the voice was transmitted by radio from Arlington, Va., to Paris and Hawaii by radio transmission, where were stationed members of the research department of the Bell system. The Secretary of the Navy from his office talked by wire and wireless to the commander of a war vessel off Hatteras, as did also the commandant from Mare Island, Cal., by transcontinental wire and radio. This radio has been most useful in our late war. Through the cooperation of officers of the Signal Corps and the experts of the Bell system it has been adapted to communication between aeroplanes in the air and between them and ground stations, and it was used with great effect in locating hidden guns, in communicating the aero observations of the effect of bombardments, and so forth. It was also of great service in the submarine warfare. It is now possible to establish, and had it not been for the interruption caused by the war there would have been in operation, a combination of aero and wire transmission between the land exchanges and vessels off the coast.

A method of multiplex typewriter transmission has been developed which many times augments the telegraphic capacity of the wires, and only recently the practical application of a method of multiplex telephony, the result of the work of years, has been made, by which four or more telephone circuits can be superimposed on the regular telephone circuit; and, curiously enough, the transmission over the superimposed circuits is superior to that over the regular circuit. It is not a valuable but an interesting scientific feature that it is possible for two people at one end of the circuit to talk to each other via a distant point over the same circuit.

These great developments of the utilization of plant for simultaneous and greatly increased service are the latest practical applications of the work of the technical department of the Bell system. With less than half the weight of copper that was formerly used to transmit one conversation, it is now possible to transmit over one wire circuit at the same time at least five and one-half telephonic messages and a large multiple of the number of telegraph messages formerly possible.

While these new uses require the most delicate balancing and adjusting and close attention, they are simple in operation. To introduce them, however, requires so much rearrangement of circuits and instruments that immediate utilization is too costly, and it must be done—as it can be at small cost—in the process of reconstruction over a course of years.

It can be safely said that with the same weight of copper which was formerly required for one telegraph or one telephone circuit, ten or twelve times the telephone and telegraph use is now possible at any one time, and when we consider the total capacity which in the telephone system is unutilized at certain hours, many new services, in addition, which would be of great benefit to our commercial and economic and social organizations can be introduced. Distant accomplishment is usually foreshadowed by present evidence, and, judging from the past, there is abundant evidence that the future accomplishments will be greater than any that have gone before.

While these results are the work of and were possible only because of this technical scientific department of the system, much has been done and much will be done by individuals working along more or less the same general lines of investigation. Such work has been contributory. Almost without exception, improvements in apparatus or operation which are considered integral or complete in themselves are really the coordinated combined results of many individuals working upon many ideas in connection with experimentation and practical application and to obtain certain results. In fact the art has reached a point in development where it is impossible to differentiate research and experimentation as between the separate methods of transmission, and all laboratory and experimental work in all lines must be coordinated and carried on in connection with the practical operation over a system corresponding in extent with the system upon which it is intended to be used. The work of investigation, research, and experimentation is at best expensive, but is indispensable in a new art and the cost if spread over a large system is relatively small.

Whatever the status of a wire system, Government owned or private owned, it is and must be a virtual monopoly, combining both telegraph and telephone. Competition in the telephone service in its real sense can not exist. If there are two systems in any place, the choice of the system is controlled by the list of subscribers connected on one or the other of the systems; beyond a small percentage, there would be no duplications. Opposition telephone service means two payments to get complete service. Each system, where there are two or more, offers an entirely different service in that the great majority of subscribers are not the same.

Competition in the telegraph business in the true sense of the word has not existed for years. It is true that there has been competition for, or a division of, the profitable business at less than one-fifth of the public telegraph offices, serving about one-half the population in this country. There is no competition at the other four-fifths of the offices, which are maintained at a loss for the purpose of giving a public and necessary service to about 50 per cent of the population; and one of the competing companies frankly states in its published reports that it has no intention of competing for unprofitable business. If this is to be the rule, a large part of the public could not be given the essential facilities for everyday life.

In every public service the revenue comes from uniform charges based on average costs. Some service must be rendered at a loss; the average profit must carry the business as a whole. When competition divides the profitable business the average charge must be not only sufficient to carry the unprofitable business but also to pay the fixed charges and operation of a duplicate and unnecessary plant.

The public pays for competition either in cost of maintaining duplicate systems or in lack of quality or quantity and extent of service.

In 1917 the Bell system of toll lines alone embraced over 350,000 miles of pole lines and 3,500,000 miles of wire, of which 1,000,000 miles were underground, while the combined telegraph systems embraced less than 250,000 miles of pole line and 2,000,000 miles of wire.

These telegraph facilities represent an investment of at least $200,000,000 in poles and wires alone, without equipment. Depreciation and destruction of open wires and their maintenance calls for at least 10 per cent a year, while interest charges are 6 per cent, totaling $32,000,000 a year additional cost for the maintenance of a separate system, a sum equal to the gross telegraph revenue only a few years ago.

While the economy of the combined system could not be brought about immediately, as the cost of the reconstruction and rearrangement for that purpose would be very great and disturbing, it could all be brought about with small increased cost in a few years as maintenance and destruction and depreciation call for reconstruction, and substantially all existing plant can be utilized for necessary expansion.

While much of this may at first seem to be immaterial to the question under consideration, it is most pertinent. In these accomplished results and developed experience are the potent factors which must control the final determination of the solution of the problem. Based on experience of the past and foreshadowed evolution of the future, the evolution of the economic and practical operation of electrical transmission in all its forms, is indisputably toward one common system embracing all methods of transmission of intelligence.

The measure of the extent and comprehensiveness of the future wire system is and always will be the telephone system.

Upon the interconnecting system of wires necessary for telephone purposes every other possible form of electrical wire transmission of intelligence or exchange of ideas can be superimposed, with abundant room for a great expansion of new and cheaper services.

In all this development we claim for the Bell system a respect and regard for public service which has not been destroyed or handicapped by private selfish interests. The shareholders of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. have been content with a return on their investment which in good seasons as well as bad has been sufficient, but not more than sufficient, to enable them to raise the large sums necessary to meet the public demands for enlarged public service. This return has not been materially increased, nor have any extra dividends or "plums" been divided for at least 30 years; all surplus has been put back into plant and the public have had the use of it.

There is no "water" in the securities, as there has been paid in premiums to the treasury of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. considerably more than the par value of the stock outstanding.

The amount paid out as dividends and interest in 1917 was 4.74 per cent on the actual book value of the plant, and the aggregate book value exceeds the aggregate of all official appraisements that have been made. Average charges per unit of service have been continuously reduced; a very large majority get the service at much less than the average charges, and some class of service has been placed within the reach of all.

In order that there should be a nation-wide system, large cities and extensive areas, in fact whole States, have been operated at an actual loss by the Bell system. The service and plant have been maintained at a uniform standard that transmission over the whole country might be had in every direction and between all points. Otherwise, it would be impossible to give dependable local service except in certain and restricted areas, and long distance service only between the principal places and there not through the regular exchange service. This has only been possible because from the beginning all the surplus earnings over and above the regular charges have been invested in plant of which the public has had the use directly and indirectly without any capital charge.

Notwithstanding the great increases in wages and material, which have more than doubled costs, only in places where glaring inequalities existed, has any increase in charges been made on this account, and it is expected that not more than an average of 10 per cent increase will be necessary to meet the abnormal increases in costs.

This constitutes what is in fact a reduction of at least 50 per cent in the charges for telephone service, as compared with the increased charges for every other class of service and as compared with relative ability to pay.

CABLES.

Should the United States become the center of a cable system commensurate with and sufficient to fully protect its political and economic position?

Substantially all the developments of electrical transmission by open wire have reflected on submarine cable and aero electrical transmission. It is impossible at this advanced state in the art of electrical transmission to differentiate experimentation or investigation between the different methods, and many of the new devices and principles which have been developed are most far-reaching in their applicability to all systems of transmission. Submarine-cable capacity for transmission has already been greatly increased, and the prospects of still greater increase are promising.

Over land lines, submarine cables, and radio it is within limits to say that electric signals can be transmitted any distance, even around the world; over land lines and aero the same may be said of the transmission of speech, but as yet the transmission of speech over submarine cables of any length has not been possible.

Submarine-cable plant is the most costly plant for electrical transmission of intelligence. The coordinated operation of all cables giving more or less similar service is essential if the most effective cable service is to be had at the lowest possible cost. A certain percentage of cables are out of commission all the time and a large percentage most of the time. These interruptions of individual cables extend over long periods—at times a year or more. This makes competition wasteful and necessitates high prices for service.

If operation is coordinated, the total capacity is greater than the total capacity of the systems operated separately, and other but less direct routes can be used to cover periods of emergency.

There is on any cable system a variable load, determined largely by the difference in time and the overlapping business hours in the various countries between which the transmission takes place. This results in a large percentage of unused facilities which under unified operation could be used for circuitous transmission in an emergency or in competition with direct service, or for deferred services at cheaper rates where a little delay is immaterial.

INTERNATIONAL INTERCOMMUNICATION.

Commerce depends on facilities of intercommunication and intercourse. Without them it is impossible. With poor facilities it is speculative, uncertain, because of the time and risk involved. Quick communication reduces the capital needed and makes frequent "turnover" possible.

If the purchaser and seller at distant points can get into quick communication, business can be done on small margin. If days, weeks, or months are necessary to complete the purchase and sale, the margin must be relatively large at the expense of the producer.

Quick, cheap, abundant, dependable facilities of intercourse and transportation are necessary in the development of regular commerce. We are building the ships, and ships can be transferred from one port to another as commerce demands. To keep our ships and our mercantile agents in touch with home ports and home offices, we are now dependent on facilities centering on the other side of the ocean.

My efforts toward an intranational and international electric communication system are of long standing. The whole development of the Bell telephone system from the beginning was based on comprehensive intercommunicating system by wire. When the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. bought the Western Union its first attempt was to secure trans-Atlantic cables by laying one and leasing several. Some new and beneficial services were inaugurated, more were contemplated. It was our intention to develop this system and ultimately bring the United States into focus with the great arterial cable systems throughout the world. The combination was not then countenanced by the Government.

If the United States is to maintain commercial supremacy or even equality there must be established the great trade forerunners, which in these days of intense activity is a comprehensive cable system. If American commerce is to be developed it must have better means of communication at a cost which will not handicap a large volume of business at a small profit. The days of small business and of large profits passed with the clipper ships and indifferent mail communication.

Mail communication is by far too slow for commercial development in these days. Wireless communication is yet far from perfect, and while it has its place and an important one, it is not probable that it will ever be dependable. The only existing method of quick communication is by the wire and cable. These facilities take time and enterprise to establish. Cable construction and laying take time, and cables can not be readily moved from an original location except by reconstruction.

Where abundant facilities exist, however, if under one control, they can oftentime be readily and quickly rearranged and connected to suit changing conditions.

The world's system of international electric communication, largely cable, while comprehensive, abundant, and efficient, has been built up primarily on the basis of connecting the commercial world with the Old World centers; focusing these world facilities, as it were, on the Old World's centers of finance, commerce, and industry. National prestige, local interests, competitive enterprise have influenced location, extension, and combinations so that these facilities are not in all cases arranged to be productive of the maximum possibilities of either broad efficiency or the greatest economy.

The United States is connected with this world system, but on one side as a contributing field to be reached and exploited and not primarily as a center. This must be changed and the United States put into its relative world position, put into the focus of a world system of electrical intercommunication, as one of the most, if not the most, important center of commerce, industry, and finance that full advantage may be taken of its position and the opportunities now existing.

We must give our commerce what it needs and what the commerce of the old countries already has. Our international wire service has become a "utility of necessity" and must be treated accordingly.

From the United States to the greater part of the world electrical intercommunication is expensive and roundabout.

While we have communication with South America, our South American electrical communication now goes through several intermediate countries and the interchange between the eastern coasts of North America and South America has to cross either two continents or two oceans. While we have one cable between the Pacific coast of America and the Pacific coast of Asia, one cable for such a distance and such an extent must necessarily be uncertain and more or less indirect. The east coast of South America must have a direct cable to the United States entirely under control of American interests and not a foreign connection. There must be a North Pacific cable connecting the United States wire system with the Asiatic wire and cable system, and an alternate route to Europe across the Eastern Continent. Where our communication must necessarily pass through other countries we should have alternate routes passing through different countries.

By utilizing and unifying the operations of the existing and abundant transatlantic cable facilities, direct connection can be established with every country in Europe through some immediate rearrangement, and as soon as possible some relaying, relocating, some extension of the old and the laying of some new cables.

While private property must be respected, proprietary rights should not be allowed to obstruct this solution, any more than proprietary rights of any utility should prevent regulated or controlled operation. The constitutional rights in each case are identical.

While our national wire systems are wasteful in superfluous plant, our international wire systems are correspondingly as deficient, especially in the location and arrangement of plant.

To meet our national requirements we must have a combined intra and inter national electric transmission service which will place all of our great centers in quick and close and available communication with the great centers of every country with which we have developed or potential business.

The United States must be brought into the center of a world system of electrical intercommunication. Its ships and merchants must not depend upon the gracious courtesy of any other country to get direct home wire communication. If there is not, there should be an international comity which will allow this. If done thoroughly, this must be done under the ægis of governmental authority, through specially shaped legislation. Much can be done by the present cable systems combining and operating in close connection with the land systems. To do a thorough piece of work, however, there must be considerable expenditure of capital on relocation, extension, etc., and if we are to have an independent international cable system we must be independent of foreign cable manufacture. For our extensions and repairs we must not be dependent upon any other nation. In an international system there would be sufficient demand to warrant the establishment of a cable-manufacturing plant in the United States.

The most immediate part of the program, the part that will bring the quickest results, is the unifying and coordinating of the existing cable systems, followed as quickly as possible by such relocating as can be done at once, and by laying as soon as possible the east coast cable.

This country is spending thousands of millions of dollars to build ships to compete for foreign commerce, and yet leaves the very "essential" to the building up of foreign commerce—quick, reliable intercommunication—entirely to private initiative and to foreign enterprise. With as many tens of millions and the cooperation of the existing cable companies controlled in the United States, a system could be built up which would put the business of the United States, as it were, at the front door of every business house of the world; and while it would need Government aid at the start and until established, it will be indirectly profitable from the start, and without doubt will be profitable in time.

I do not think there is any question about the wisdom of the policy, one grand system reaching to all countries with which we have relations, extending as rapidly as possible to all other countries in which potentialities exist, fostered by the Government at the start. It is to be regretted that the questions of Government ownership and of superior foreign rights have been brought into this cable question to handicap the solution of this big and most important problem, which must be settled from an American standpoint by some coordinated, correlated combination of Government authority and private operation or operation founded on the best traditions of private operation free from political interference and combined in a federalized corporation.

When all this is done, working in close connection with or under the close supervision of the land system, the United States would have the most complete, comprehensive system of world intercourse and intercommunication in existence.

This can not be done directly by the Government, although some Government encouragement and aid at the start will be needed. There are many points of an agreement to be reached between alien individuals and corporations, there will be much dealing with the respective Governments which would be confined to the interests and questions involved if conducted by private individuals, but which might become international questions, although purely local, if the Government were directly involved.

If, however, all the advantages of the Government prestige, together with the admitted advantages of private operation under Government control could be obtained, it could be done by some new organization or by one of the old organizations as a nucleus about which to create the system—this corporation to be federalized and under Government auspices and regulation.

The attempt recently made to make an international question or raise a question as to the right of the United States Government to direct the operation of cables, owned and controlled and terminating in the United States, so as to obtain the greatest efficiency in a time of abnormal demands, emphasizes the fact that the United States should have at least equal facilities to those of other countries and at least equal control over the facilities terminating in the United States.

There must be no question as to the right or the necessity of the United States to build up a commercial international wire system, of which the United States is the center, instead of remaining at one side of an international system which centers in the English Channel. Nor should there be any such a spectacle as an American-owned company obstructing the creation of an all-American cable system.

For what is the United States spending thousands of millions of dollars on means of transportation of American commerce if it is to have no abundant available facilities for the agents who spread that commerce and if the ships that carry it can not have a ready communication without the consent of any foreign nation?

Under the comity of nations in times of peace, citizens, mail carriers, ships, etc., have, subject to reasonable regulation, the right to land, and to cross or pass in transit to other countries. The mails are communications of intelligence. The cable is a facility of intercourse and intercommunication—a carrier of intelligence. There should be—subject to reasonable and necessary regulations and restrictions, such as a sovereign country has the right to, and must prescribe for its own protection—the same rights as to the electrical transmission of intelligence.

In making this reply it has been my desire to present the actual conditions and salient features of electric communication and the possibilities of the future.

While some suggestions are made in this communication as to the requisite features of the future organization of these systems, no attempt has been made to set out the details of such a plan. If so requested, it would give me great pleasure to furnish your committee with more detailed suggestions as to what would in my opinion be the most practical solution.

Respectfully submitted.

THEO. N. VAIL.

The following is a summary of the contents of a letter written to Hon. JOHN A. MOON, chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C., upon his request by Theodore N. Vail, of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. The letter refers to House bill 368.

It is admitted that the great utilities of interchange and intercommunication, which have been so largely instrumental in the development of the economic and social world, and upon which the progress and continuity of such development depends, are suffering from the application and interpretation of existing laws concerning control and regulation, and the proposed bill calls for time to enable some plan of organization to be perfected.

There is, without doubt, an opportunity for a great piece of beneficial and constructive work by combining and coordinating all the various existing utility services, or those that are complementary and supplementary, into one or more well-balanced systems, the extent of which should be determined by the nature of the service, by the extent of the service rendered, and by commercial, geographic, economic reasons, and by combining in a direct manner, and as far as possible divorced from political or partisan or class influence, the requisite power and authority of the Federal Government expressed in a mandate to equilibrate revenue, operating costs, and capital charges, with an operating organization adapted to the requirements of the service and based on the methods which experience, enterprise, and operation in the industrial world have shown to be effective, efficient, and economical.

It is not my understanding that this bill is a Government ownership and operating measure, but rather a definite purpose to give sufficient time to prepare and present to Congress a specific proposition for reorganization which will work for efficiency and economy of the international and intranational wire systems operated and controlled from the United States. There would seem to be no question as to the wisdom of such program.

A thoroughly considered, well thought-out solution can not be prepared under pressure or in a short time.

It is recognized that in the interests of the public, the utilities should not be returned to the owners without some correction of the existing deficiencies in regulation and control, hence it would seem highly desirable for the country and for the proprietors that time should be given for such a solution.

The principal problem will be to find a plan which will not leave opportunity for, and perpetuate in some other form, the same evils which now exist in the multiplicity of uncorrelated, irresponsible, complex, contradictory, and overlapping forms of control or regulation, or leave opportunity for unjudicial and biased action or selfish aggression.

ELECTRICAL TRANSMISSION OF INTELLIGENCE.

It has developed early in the evolution of the telephone service that while there were common features in the technique, the service rendered was entirely distinct from the telegraph, each having its own particular field, not competitive but complementary. Long before the common use of the wire plant for both purposes was developed the advantage of a combined system of telegraph and telephone under one control was recognized.

The science of industrial application of electricity is almost as new as the telephone. The whole telephone art had to be created. It did not exist, nor was there, as is usual in new enterprises, anything analogous to it upon which to base action and policy. On pages 2, 3, and 4 of the letter (proof) will be found a more or less detailed account of the evolution of the art of electrical transmission of intelligence, and the inevitable conclusion to be drawn from that experience, which is the wire system of the future, will be one nation-wide system, under single control, by or over which direct connection can be established between any two places for the electrical transmission of any communication or of the spoken word, and every individual place will be the center of the system for transmission in any direction to the limit of transmission.

With less than half the weight of copper that was formerly used to transmit one conversation it is now possible to transmit over one wire circuit at the same time at least five and one-half telephonic messages and a large multiple of the number of telegraph messages formerly possible.

It can be safely said that with the same weight of copper which was formerly required for one telegraph or one telephone circuit, ten or twelve times the telephone and telegraph use is now possible at any one time, and when we consider the total capacity which in the telephone system is unutilized at certain hours, many new services in addition which would be of great benefit to our commercial and economic and social organizations can be introduced. Distant accomplishment is usually foreshadowed by present evidence, and, judging from the past, there is abundant evidence that the future accomplishments will be greater than any that have gone before.

The measure of the extent and comprehensiveness of the future wire system is and always will be the telephone system.

Upon the interconnecting system of wires necessary for telephone purposes, every other possible form of electrical wire transmission of intelligence or exchange of ideas can be superimposed with abundant room for a great expansion of new and cheaper services.

On pages 3 and 4 of the letter (proof) will be found some interesting features of the Bell system.

CABLES.

Should the United States become the center of a cable system commensurate with and sufficient to fully protect its political and economic position?

Submarine cable plant is the most costly plant for electrical transmission of intelligence. The coordinated operation of all cables giving more or less similar service is essential if the most effective cable service is to be had at the lowest possible cost. A certain percentage of cables are out of commission more or less of the time. These interruptions of individual cables extend over long periods, at times a year or more.

If operation is coordinated, the total capacity is greater than the total capacity of the systems operated separately, and other but less direct routes can be used to cover periods of emergency.

There is on any cable system a variable load, determined largely by the difference in time and the overlapping business hours in the various countries between which the transmission takes place. This results in a large percentage of unused facilities, which under unified operation could be used for circuitous transmission in an emergency or in competition with direct service or for deferred services at cheaper rates where a little delay is immaterial.

Quick, cheap, abundant, dependable facilities of intercourse and transportation are necessary in the development of regular commerce. If the United States is to maintain commercial supremacy or even equality, there must be established the great trade forerunners, which in these days of intense activity is a comprehensive cable system. Post Office Appropriation Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM W. GRIEST,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, December 17, 1918.

Mr. GRIEST. Mr. Speaker, for the information of the Congress I will place in the RECORD a compilation showing how the village delivery service, an appropriation for which is included on page 23 of the pending Post Office appropriation bill, has grown from one experimental office, established in the ninth congressional district of Pennsylvania in 1912, to 552 offices which now enjoy the benefits of this service under permanent law. The offices are well distributed throughout the Union, being in operation in 228 congressional districts in 43 States. The reports are so uniformly favorable as to the success of this method of mail delivery that the department has withdrawn former opposition and, in addition, urges its establishment "in communities adjacent to cities having city delivery." In view of the great growth of the village delivery and the demand for its extension both in towns of less than 10,000 population and in communities adjacent to cities, the House Post Office Committee increased the appropriation from $720,000, the amount carried in the last Post Office bill, to $1,250,000. This is a conservative increase, is fully warranted, and I trust will become law.

A tabulated statement of village delivery offices follows:

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES O. LOBECK,

OF NEBRASKA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, December 17, 1918.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Speaker, I take personal pleasure in presenting to the Congress an article prepared and written for the Forum, published in November, 1918, by the Hon. John Skelton Williams, Comptroller of the Currency and Director of the Division of Finance, United States Railroad Administration, on the subject of "Usury and the banks." Believing this subject of national importance and of much interest to the Nation and to Congress, I respectfully ask that it may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Forum for November, 1918.]

USURY AND THE BANKS—FLEECING THE SMALL BORROWER BEING STOPPED BY THE GOVERNMENT.

(By Hon. John Skelton Williams, Comptroller of the Currency and Director of the Division of Finance, United States Railroad Administration.)

Thoughtful and conservative bankers—the men who really lead the banking sentiment of the country—in numbers steadily and rapidly increasing, are now setting their faces and giving their influence against an evil that for years had not only impeded the growth but was threatening the commercial life of important sections of our country, because oppressive and continuing usury inevitably means poverty and failure; and poverty and failure breed discontent, which strikes blindly to destroy and tear down. Despair hates the conditions which have produced it and is ready to go to war against society and governments, regardless of means and reckless of consequences.

The business man, the laborer, the farmer, driven to ruin by what he believes to be unjust exactions, sanctioned or permitted by law, becomes an anarchist at heart, carries within himself a sullen resentment ready to be touched to volcanic outburst by the first approach of opportunity. He has no hope but vengeance. His fury when he may give it vent is directed against the conditions under which he has been oppressed.

The vice, or evil, or peril of usury—it is all three—is no new thing under the sun and was not peculiar to this country. It was spreading among us, however, with rapidity no casual observer would suppose, and in different communities was silently and secretly sapping the life and eating away the foundations of commercial and social life to an unsuspected extent. I do not wish to talk politics or to discuss socialism. I have had opportunity, however, to notice that States and communities in which literature presenting the most violent, dangerous, and incendiary forms of perverted socialism was most eagerly read and accepted were precisely those in which my reports showed the interest charges to small borrowers were most extortionate.

The sin is one of the oldest known to humanity, and is believed to have been indirectly aimed at in the tenth commandment. The Hebrew word for usury signifies "cruel biting." Probably it began to bite along with the saber-tooth tiger. Its derivation may have suggested to a great English judge of five centuries ago his attempt to distinguish between what he called "biting usury," meaning exorbitant rates, and "toothless usury," or reasonable interest charges.

By divine ordinance the Israelites of old were forbidden to demand usury of the poor and needy, and in Deuteronomy we are told, "Thou shalt not lend upon usury to thy brother; usury of money, usury of victuals, usury of anything that is lent upon usury." But by another law they are permitted to lend to strangers—which banks, these days, are not accustomed to do. Loans to the Canaanites and other heathen on usury were, in fact, rather encouraged, the implication being that they might be conquered and overcome more readily this way than by the sword.

In ancient days, when men lived to be 300 to 400 to nearly 1,000 years old, he who began to lend money at the age of 25 or 30 must have accumulated quite a comfortable estate when gathered to his fathers, especially if the interest was compounded. Think of what Methuselah would have done! In this connection the thought occurs that if Noah had out any considerable amount of paper on terms similar to those which are being charged in some of our States, he may not have regarded the flood as an unmitigated disaster.

THE USURER UNPOPULAR IN KING SOLOMON'S DAYS.

The Israelites during the early years of their race maintained consistently their opposition to usury, although the Jews have figured so conspicuously since the Christian era as such prominent exponents. Five hundred years after Moses, King David and King Solomon had things to say against usury, and the usurer seems to have been a most unpopular character in those days. King David describes the holy and just man, he who was entitled to enter into the courts of the Lord, as one "who hath not given his money upon usury." The Jewish Talmud speaks of usury as a practice expressly forbidden.

The subject of usury was specifically dealt with in the ancient codes of most nations. Under the Code of Manu, in India, interest was regarded as of doubtful propriety, and money lending was prohibited altogether to the superior castes, the Brahmins and Kshattriyas, and even for the other two grades a sum lent to a person in distress may not give rise to any interest, because then the interest would be extortionate. The limits fixed by the code were 1¼ per cent per month with security and 1½ per cent per month without.

Among the Mohammedans the charging of usury was expressly prohibited. Money lending in Turkey until recent years was almost exclusively in the hands of Greeks and other foreigners.

The Law of the Twelve Tables among the ancient Romans authorized interest at the equivalent of 10 per cent per annum, subsequently increased toward the close of the Republic to 12 per cent. It was then called "usuria centissima," because in 100 months it doubled the capital, but this law was subsequently abolished and interest laid under a total interdict.

Julius Cæsar enacted severe laws against usurers, and Cato is said to have banished the usurers from Sicily.

Later on Tacitus tells us that the evil of usury greatly increased in Rome and the laws forbidding it were continually eluded. Some historians tell us that from this period, when usury so flourished, Rome dates the beginning of her decay. Trade languished and became disreputable and fell under the control of the worst elements in the community, preparing the way for the calamitous events which preceded Rome's final downfall.

Later, in the time of Justinian, the Government undertook to control interest rates, which were fixed at one-third of 1 per cent a month, or 4 per cent per annum, though higher rates were allowed to be taken by merchants where a greater risk was involved. During most of the periods of Roman history and before its decline and fall, usury was treated as an aggravated species of theft and punished with great severity. Whereas the punishment for theft was only a forfeiture of double the value of the thing stolen, in usury the criminal was punished by condemnation and forfeiture of four times the value of the usury taken. This severe penalty, it is said, was grounded on sound governmental reasons, for it was seen in those days that usury was one of the most frequent causes of sedition and discord among the people.

M'ADOO EMULATED TIBERIUS CÆSAR.

Secretary McAdoo in depositing, as he did on several occasions, many millions of dollars in the banks to alleviate the strain and bring down heavy interest rates which were being demanded in certain parts of the country, found a precedent for so doing in the acts of Tiberius Cæsar, who, the ancient historian tells us, deposited a "marvelous sum of money in the banks of Rome," the amount being estimated at £500,000, or about two and a half million dollars, for the purpose of breaking rates charged by usurers in those days, and this money was offered freely to those debtors who were able to give bond and security to double the value of the money borrowed. Secretary McAdoo's terms were more liberal.

"The canker of usury," says Tacitus, "is an old venomous foe and is the chief head of rebellion and variance in countries, and it was therefore banished in the old times."

In England as early as the reign of Alfred the Great laws were enacted against usury, usurers forfeited to the King their chattels, while their lands escheated to the lords of the fee, and it was further provided that usurers should not be buried in the sanctuary. In the reign of Edward the Confessor, 150 years later, the laws provided that the usurer should forfeit all his substance, be outlawed, and his heir disinherited. Other punishments were added by William the Conqueror, such as whipping, exposure on the pillory, and perpetual banishment.

In the Magna Charta, in 1215, attempts were made to regulate or restrain usury, the provision inserted showing clearly how general the evil was and how oppressive.

These laws were modified and changed from time to time in the twelfth century. According to Glanville, the usurer was not liable to be convicted during his lifetime, but forfeited his goods and chattels after death.

In 1487 two acts were passed in England to restrain usury and to meet the various devices which had become common. This law provided that offenders should be placed in the pillory, put to open shame, be imprisoned half a year, and pay £20 sterling.

In the reign of Queen Elizabeth the legal rate was fixed at 10 per cent. This rate was reduced to 8 per cent under the reign of James I. All contracts for more than 8 per cent were void, but the act contained a clause that "no words in this law shall be construed or expounded to allow the practice of usury in point of religion or conscience," inserted in the law to satisfy the bishops, who would not pass the bill without it.

USURY CONTRIBUTED TO THE DECLINE OF ROME.

In the reign of Charles II the legal interest was further reduced to 6 per cent, which had then become customary, and it is interesting to compare the conditions set forth in the preamble of this act, which shows the beneficent influences of favorable money rates, with the corruption and declining conditions in Rome, when usury flourished most in the Eternal City. The preamble to this act says:

"Forasmuch as the abatement of interest from 10 per cent in former times has been found by notable experience beneficial to the advancement of trade and the improvement of lands by good husbandry, with many other considerable advantages to this nation, especially the reducing of it to a nearer proportion with foreign States with whom we transact, and whereas in the fresh memory the like fall from 8 to 6 per cent by late constant practice hath then the like success to the general contentment of this nation as is visible by several improvements, and whereas it is the endeavor of some at present to reduce it back again in practice to the allowance of the statute still in force, to 8 per cent, to the great discouragement of ingenuity and industry in the husbandry, trade, and commerce of this nation."

The rate of interest in England was reduced to 5 per cent in the reign of Queen Anne, the preamble of the law stating that—

"It has become absolutely necessary to reduce the high rate of interest of 6 per cent to a nearer proportion with interest allowed in foreign States."

The various acts passed in the reigns of Charles II, William III, and George II, George III, and George IV, provided that all securities given on a usurious consideration or upon a gaming transaction were absolutely void.

In this country the Colonies first and the States later undertook to fix and regulate the rates of interest and to define and prohibit usury. Massachusetts fixed the legal rate at 8 per cent in 1641 and reduced it to 6 per cent three years later. Some of the older States, however, refused to adopt usury laws until within recent years. In many of our States usury statutes have been and are ignored, and where the transgressions against the usury law have been most marked and where usury has flourished most, unmolested, we find enterprise hampered and many unhealthy conditions engendered; which reminds one of a saying credited to Diogenes, that "where neither laws have force nor water hath course, there no wise man seeks to dwell."

To the substantial business man, accustomed to reasonable accommodations from banks, there is a kind of ghastly humor in some of the revelations resulting from an investigation into the subject of usury conducted some months ago by the comptroller's office.

USURY AIMS AT AMERICAN BANKS.

It was ascertained at that time that 1,247 national banks out of a total of 7,600 were openly charging rates of interest forbidden by the laws of their respective States and by the national bank act, and that despite the easy money conditions, 2,743 banks were charging on some of their loans interest of 10 per cent or more per annum.

One bank admitted under oath that it was charging an average of 25 per cent per annum on all of its loans; another an average of 36 per cent; and a third an average of 40 per cent per annum on all loans.

The alarming part of all this is that wherever such a case of oppression occurred the agitators, the chronic trouble makers, and the demagogues of the neighborhood or the county made it the text for incitement of rage against the capital and the commercial methods of the entire country.

I will not tire you with figures, but will mention just a few actual loans made by national banks and reported under oath to the comptroller's office, which may serve as illustration.

Here is a loan of $1,000 for a month and a half at 77 per cent, a loan of $2,067 for a month at 65 per cent, $553 for two months at 85 per cent, $491 for 80 days at 50 per cent, $200 for three months at 50 per cent.

A visitor to my office from a certain State not long ago, who held a high public office in that State, told me of a loan for $90 made to a farmer to help him to raise his crops, the loan being for less than a year. He said that the bank had charged this farmer, in addition to a large rate of interest, an extra sum of $50 for the trouble of going out to look at the land and for a few preliminaries to the loan.

The practice of making a deduction for expense, in addition to the rate of interest, seems also to have been an ancient one, and to have been resorted to hundreds of years ago. It has prevailed to an inexcusable extent up to a very recent date in certain of our States.

I am sincerely gratified to be able to report, after all this looking at the dark side of the picture, that in the past year or so there has been a vast improvement in the matter of interest rates throughout the country. The evil has been greatly mitigated, but it is not yet entirely eliminated. Hundreds of banks have made perpendicular drops from the excessive rates which they formerly charged. Many that had been charging on some of their loans as much as 50 per cent reduced to 12 per cent, and in thousands of cases they have come within the legal rates of their respective States.

NOW THE BANKS ARE REDUCING RATES.

In other instances, where only 12 per cent to 15 per cent rates had prevailed, borrowers are now accommodated at 6 per cent and 8 per cent. Some banks have adopted a conservative course and apparently have been afraid to reduce their rates too suddenly, but they are moving in the right direction. One bank testifies under oath that it has succeeded in reducing its maximum rate from 360 per cent to 109 per cent. Another in the same State reports that it has already brought its maximum rate down from 300 to 30 per cent; others report that they have brought their average rates of 18 per cent and 22 per cent down to the legal rate of 10 per cent.

I am very glad to be able to say that these sensational and inexcusable rates are steadily disappearing from the sections where they have formerly prevailed, and people of every part of this country are at this moment securing money for all purposes, whether it be for commercial business, farming, or industrial purposes, on more favorable terms than ever before in the history of our country.

In divers instances national banks which have been called on to reduce their rates of interest to those permitted by law have not only complied but have advised my office that they were conducting their business on a plane which is proving not only more satisfactory to their customers but, all things considered, more satisfactory to the banks themselves, as their business is showing a healthy expansion in response to more liberal treatment.

For example, the cashier of a national bank in the interior of Texas, which has in the past been charging excessive interest rates, in a letter to the Comptroller of the Currency said:

"While it has been rather hard for us to get down to the legal rate, I realize that you are absolutely correct, and I am sure that the cheaper rate of interest will bring, and is already bringing, this bank a large increase of business. Your stand in this matter is entirely commendable, and we will do our best to uphold you in it."

Many farmers who had never known what it was to borrow money below 12 per cent, even on cotton, through the operations of the Federal Reserve System are now enabled to borrow from their local banks at 6 per cent, and the small local banks are able to borrow in their turn from the Federal reserve banks at 3 to 4½ per cent, and the business men throughout the country, I am sure, are prepared to testify that in the past 12 months, despite the very active condition of business, which usually brings tight money, that in all our important cities merchants and manufacturers have been able to place their commercial paper at lower rates than you have ever known before.

To overcome the whole trouble and rid the farmer and the small merchants in the rural districts of the exactions which have often crippled and sometimes destroyed them, a bill has been introduced in Congress, requiring all national banks to keep a record showing the rate of interest charged on each and every loan, and authorizing and directing the Department of Justice to bring suit against usurers, upon information secured by the department from the Comptroller of the Currency, or from other sources. If this becomes a law, it will be possible to eradicate entirely usury from national banks. It would be difficult to overestimate the blessings which will come to many thousands of borrowers in all parts of the country if the maximum rate of interest throughout the States should be reduced from 100 per cent and more, which has been charged in the recent past in many banks, to a maximum of 6 or 8 or even 10 per cent, according to the legal rate in the respective States.

The subject of usury has been discussed, as I have shown you, through thousands of years and by countless learned men. After the Hebrew prophets and lawgivers, Cæsar and Cato and later Justinian in Rome and the Greek philosophers debated on it; prelates, kings, and great judges of great courts have studied and expounded it; parliaments, congresses, legislatures have turned it inside up and outside down; discourses on it in such bodies, in the pulpit, from the bench, have been innumerable in numbers, infinite in extent.

Yet in some parts of this country we found we were in worse condition in this respect than were the people of 50 centuries ago, and men and women in the United States, in the twentieth century were bitten more deeply than were the ancient Hebrews; were destroyed and enslaved more grievously than were the Canaanites, declared enemies of God's chosen people. There is no organized ecclesiastical protest against it, and the executive officers of the law stood inert and apparently powerless. In some of the newest and freshest parts of our land American citizens were practically in the position of the poor of Rome under the oppressions of usurers of distinguished families—

"No fire when Tiber freezes,
No air in summer's heat,
But stores of rods for freeborn backs,
And stocks for freedom feet."

Let us earnestly hope that the conscience of the country and the protest of the self-respecting and forward-looking bankers may be truly aroused to renew the old, old fight against the old, old instinct of tyranny and oppression, so cruelly contrary to all the teachings of Christianity, the lessons and purposes of civilization, and all the trend of modern thought—

"The good old rule, the simple plan,
That he shall take who has the power
And he shall keep who can."

No country can live, much less prosper, no people can keep their strength and maintain that unity of thought and purpose that makes nations conquerors, where wealth accumulates and men decay.

Pay of Wounded Soldiers.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SWAGAR SHERLEY, OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, December 12, 1918.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted I print in the RECORD the following letter from Brig. Gen. Lord on the subject of the pay of wounded soldiers:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 12, 1918.

HON. SWAGAR SHERLEY,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SHERLEY: With reference to the remarks which were made on the floor of the House yesterday, and at your personal suggestion, I am submitting the remarks which follow in connection with the complaints concerning the delay in making payments to the enlisted patients who have been returned from their overseas stations for treatment in hospitals in the United States.

With but few exceptions, the enlisted men who have been returned from France have arrived in this country without service records and without any other papers which contained a statement of their accounts, thereby making it impossible to determine what pay, if any, was due them. The delay in payments to enlisted men resulting from the separation of the soldier from his service record was made the subject of instructions issued by the War Department February 18, 1918, in Bulletin 8, which provided that emergency service records should be executed by the organization commanders of enlisted men from such data as was available, so as to enable the soldiers to be paid. Under date of April 30, 1918, Special Regulations 58a, War Department, was issued, which provides that all soldiers separated from their command be provided with a pay card which would take the place of a service record. This pay card is kept with the soldier in his personal possession and enables him to secure his pay independent of the fact that his service record may not be available at the place where he is serving or located. These two provisions entirely eliminated the trouble which was being experienced in the United States in making payments to soldiers who were separated from their commands, but did not seem to effect the conditions overseas, although both the bulletin and special regulations had application there as well as in this country.

I mention this so as to show that adequate instructions and forms were developed by the War Department to permit of the soldiers who were being returned from overseas stations to bring with them proper records to permit of their prompt payment in full upon arrival in this country.

At the Walter Reed General Hospital, District of Columbia, on the recommendation of this office, enlisted men arriving from their overseas stations without service records or pay cards were paid some stated amount per month, and this same plan was carried out in other hospitals in this country. With respect to the men at the Walter Reed General Hospital it was found on investigation that some of them had not been paid for many months, and in September of this year these men were taken up on a pay roll which was executed in this office and certified to by the writer of this letter, and payment made on that certification for the entire amount due the soldiers, based on their own statements as to the date to which they had been last paid and such other information as could be obtained in Washington with respect to their allotments and war-risk insurance. Since this payment there have been additional arrivals at the hospital, nearly all of whom were without the papers necessary to determine the status of their accounts with respect to pay, and the same procedure has been followed in their cases and payments made in full. It is admitted that there is no authority of law for the action taken in these cases; but the men were in arrears with respect to their pay; they were returned from France without any papers of any kind indicating what amounts were due them; and the only way in which they could be paid was to accept their own statements as to the dates to which they were last paid and, subject to such information as could be obtained with respect to their allotment and insurance status, paid on the strength of their own statements.

In the other hospitals located in the United States to which the enlisted patients are being returned from overseas, payments are being made of a stated amount each month so that the men will not be totally without funds, and this office has devoted its energies toward attempting to obtain information as to the exact status of their accounts so as to enable these patients to be paid their pay in full.

On September 20, 1918, the disbursing officer at each general hospital was informed as follows with respect to the payment of overseas casuals, viz:

"* * * War Department expects all men to be paid in full where sufficient data is available, such data, if necessary, to include the statement of soldier if in the opinion of the personnel adjutant his statements are correct.

"If there be sufficient information available to pay in full for the current month or a stated period, but not sufficient to pay from date of last payment, soldier should receive pay for such period without deductions for partial payments made to cover the period for which data is not available. In cases such as the above the partial payment should not be entered on pay roll until soldier is paid for the period for which he received the partial payments. Remark to be as follows: 'Due soldier pay for ———, $—— partial payment to be deducted.'

"If data be not available and there is cause for doubt as to the correctness of soldier's statement, payment should not be made in full, but his name transferred to a partial-payment roll, or War Department Form 369, and soldier paid as outlined in paragraphs 3 and 4, Special Regulations, No. 58a.

"Under no circumstances should enlisted men be allowed to go without pay on account of lack of records, as partial payments are authorized until such time as service records can be obtained as provided in instructions 9, Service Record, Form No. 29, A. G. O."

Realizing the seriousness of the situation, and with a view to keeping in close contact with the pay status of the enlisted patients arriving from overseas, this office, on December 7, 1918, made recommendation for semimonthly reports as to the condition of the accounts of these men. A copy of this recommendation is attached herewith.

There has been no lack of effort on the part of the War Department or this office to effect payment, at least in part, to the patients returning from overseas, but it is apparent from what is said herein that full payment can be made to these men only by accepting their own statements as to the date to which they were last paid. This has been done with respect to the men at the Walter Reed General Hospital, upon the personal certification of the undersigned, who assumes full responsibility for his action.

At the other hospitals partial payments are being made to the men, so that they are not without funds, and recommendation is this date being made that the action taken with respect to the men at the Walter Reed General Hospital be taken in the cases of men at the other hospitals. There is no sanction of law for this action, but it is felt that the situation demands remedy, and the only remedy is to accept the personal statement of the men themselves, as with but few exceptions no papers have been received from France which show the statement of their accounts with respect to the date to which they were last paid there.

It is clear that had the men who are being returned from France been furnished with a pay card or other papers showing the condition of their accounts, there would have been no delay whatever in effecting a full statement with them when they arrived at the several hospitals in this country, but it is assumed that the conditions existing in France, where the entire energies were being devoted to the winning of the war, made it impossible to accomplish service records or pay cards for these men, so as to have the official papers available when they arrived in this country.

The policy of this office has been to detail an officer to make a personal investigation at any hospital from which a report was received that the overseas patients were not being paid at least partial pay, and in accordance with this policy instructions have been given to have an officer proceed to West Baden, Ind., for the purpose of investigating the pay conditions of the overseas patients at that hospital, this being the specific place mentioned in the remarks made on the floor of the House yesterday.

Respectfully,

H. M. LORD,
Brigadier General, Assistant to Director of Purchase, Storage, and Traffic, Director of Finance.

DECEMBER 7, 1918.

Director of Finance.
The Adjutant General of the Army.
Data as to payment of patients in various hospitals.

1. Information has reached this office that hundreds of sick and wounded soldiers are being returned from overseas without service records, making it impossible to effect payment in full to soldiers. This condition emphasizes the necessity for a complete record of the pay status of these patients, such record to include partial payments made on pay cards, or pay record books, through the medium of temporary service records; also report of action taken with respect to obtaining their original service records. It is therefore recommended that a circular letter be sent to commanding officers of all general hospitals and other hospitals to which patients from overseas are being admitted, same to read substantially as follows:

"On the 1st and 15th of each month, beginning with December 1, 1918, commanding officers of United States Army general hospitals and all other hospitals to which patients from overseas are being admitted will render the following report to the Director of Finance, War Department, Washington, D. A Demand for Relief from the Serious Situation Created by the Failure or Neglect of Government Agencies to Make Payment of Allotments and Allowances to Soldiers' Dependents.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM S. VARE,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, December 12, 1918.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Speaker, the growing seriousness of the distressing situation created by the obvious failure of the War Risk Insurance Bureau and other Government agencies to provide increasing thousands of dependents of American soldiers with money to which they are entitled can not be questioned by anyone familiar with that situation.

Reports of the pitiable suffering, of the actual want and privation of increasing numbers of the mothers and wives and children of those American boys who fought so heroically overseas are accumulating daily—aye, hourly—in all sections of the country.

And why? Because of the long delay, and, in many instances, the utter failure or neglect of the Government agencies intrusted with so vitally important a task to remit to the families and dependents of our soldiers the allotments and allowances to whch they are entitled by an act of Congress.

During the horrible world war that has so fortunately terminated I consistently supported the administration in its efforts to prosecute America's share in it successfully. I refrained from criticism of the administration even when I was doubtful as to the wisdom of the course it was pursuing, because I felt it was the duty of every American to give the fullest support to the United States Government when it was face to face with so great a crisis.

Even now I am not criticizing the administration or the Government because I am of a different political faith from that which controls at present in Washington. I am not speaking as a Republican. I am speaking as an American who possesses indisputable evidence that American mothers and wives and children are facing the direst poverty—yes; and with Christmas not far away.

A merry Christmas, forsooth, it will be for these unfortunate mothers and wives and children of our heroic soldiers who find themselves penniless or in want, confronted by poverty or dependent upon charity. I am not exaggerating. Permit me to quote from the public press, in which are appearing daily the most distressing and circumstantial descriptions of the horrors—yes, actual horrors—which either failure or neglect on the part of agencies of the United States Government have made possible.

I have here the Philadelphia Public Ledger of December 11, 1918—of Wednesday of this week, mark you—in which appears the following startling revelation of the acute suffering, the wretched want, due to the inability of a father and mother to secure one cent of the allotment their soldier son made to them. Permit me to quote from this newspaper:

DIRE WANT FACING MANY DEPENDENTS—CHEERLESS CHRISTMAS LOOMS WITH DADDY OVER THERE.

With no coal in their home, living on bread and potatoes, and compelled to remain in bed to keep warm, Mr. and Mrs. Hyman Pearlstein, of 617 Segel Street, said yesterday they had not received a cent of the allotment from their soldier son, David, since last September. Mr. Pearlstein is 74 years old and his wife is 69. Both are unable to speak English, but, through an interpreter, related their distress and privation since the boy, who was their sole support, went away to war.

While the plight of the Pearlsteins was found to be most poignant among the kin of the men in the service whose allotments have failed to arrive, other mothers and wives said yesterday that unless the check reached here within the next 15 days Christmas would be a dismal and cheerless holiday in many a soldier home here.

Let me say to the House that this is not mere "newspaper talk," as some may be inclined to assert. In my own district in Philadelphia, in which the Pearlsteins live, many cases have been brought to my personal attention of the actual privation of mothers and fathers and wives and children of soldier boys who, whether in the Army or the Navy, left their homes and their dear ones behind them that they might answer the call of their country for fighting men.

I have here correspondence I have had with officials of both the Navy Department and the War Risk Insurance Bureau regarding but one case that has occupied my personal attention. As a Member of Congress I was finally able to secure relief for the mother of a seaman in the Navy, but what of the increasing thousands of similar cases involving those who do not personally know a Congressman to whom they can appeal for assistance in unraveling the great mass of governmental red tape in which the allotments and allowances of our soldiers are manifestly and, apparently hopelessly, entangled?

The particular case to which I refer is that of an apprentice seaman in the Navy who, although he made an allotment to his mother, who lives in my district in Philadelphia, on February 12, 1918, she did not receive it until about May 7, 1918, or nearly four months later.

Since that time she has not received another cent from the Government, although her son, upon whom she was dependent for support, continued in active service, until, under date of December 10, 1918, or seven months after she received her first and only allotment, I received a communication from the naval allotment officer that a check covering the arrearages due her, arrearages amounting to $175, would be mailed to her by the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

I could cite other cases similar to this one, but I will merely call the attention of the House to what has been appearing in the public press of my city—Philadelphia—regarding the most distressing conditions, which I am informed and believe prevail in other American cities to-day, and which, in my judgment, threaten to become a national scandal.

In my opinion Congress should take immediate steps to correct such a deplorable situation.

What will be the answer our soldier boys will receive when—as many of them are doing now—they return from overseas and ask why their mothers and fathers and wives and children were permitted to live in want or on charity while they were facing death, while they were being maimed or "gassed" and their comrades were being killed in battle? Gentlemen of the House, they will have a right to demand an answer to that question, and I would not like to be in the shoes of any man whom they can hold responsible for the suffering and privation of their loved ones, of their helpless wives and mothers and children.

Shall those wives and mothers and children be permitted to hunger, shall they be permitted to suffer from cold because the War Risk Insurance Bureau or some other incompetent or inadequate Government agency is responsible for their not receiving money with which to buy bread and coal and clothing? It is a shameful situation that confronts us, and it is high time that Congress gives the most earnest and thoughtful attention to it.

Here is what the Philadelphia Inquirer said editorially on this subject only recently:

FAIR PLAY FOR SOLDIERS' DEPENDENTS.

Some one in official life in Washington should stir up the War-Risk Insurance Bureau. Not long ago it was admitted that this organization was behind in its work to the extent of 80,000 checks for allotments to the dependents of men in the service. The situation has been partially relieved since that time, but only partially. In this city there are many cases, hundreds of them, where wives and mothers have not received any pay for three, five, and seven months. Scores of instances have been discovered where the dependents have been in actual want. Even in such cases the sufferers are not asking for charity, but only for that to which they are entitled by law.

This is all wrong. It is a condition which requires immediate attention. The very least we can do for the men who have been willing to make the great sacrifice is to keep the promise which has been made to look after their dependents. The Federal Government has the money, and surely in an emergency of this character it should be possible to cut the red tape and break down the barriers of delay.

"PARENTS SHIVER AS UNITED STATES HOLDS UP SOLDIER'S PAY—COUPLE COMPELLED TO STAY IN BED TO KEEP WARM WHILE THEIR SOLE SUPPORT IS MARCHING WITH PERSHING OVERSEAS—YULETIDE DREAMS OF MANY IN THIS CITY MOCKERY; KIDDIES' STOCKINGS TO BE EMPTY—DELAY IN ALLOWANCES ATTRIBUTED TO CONFLICT OF AUTHORITY; BUREAU IS CHARACTERIZED AS THE MOST INEFFICIENT AND OUTRAGEOUSLY EXTRAVAGANT BODY IN CAPITAL.

"Parents of a Philadelphia soldier are compelled to stay in bed to keep warm because they have not received any money through the Government from their soldier son.

"Christmas will be cheerless for mothers, wives, and children of soldiers, for many families are in dire want now, due to delay in allotments.

"War-Risk Insurance Bureau, six months behind in mailing allowances to dependents, permit clerks of an entire division to pose a long time for photograph.

"Delay in payments ascribed to conflict of authority between the Treasury Department and the bureau, and because officials, it is said, fail to grasp the enormity of their task.

"The bureau 'is the most inefficient, outrageously extravagant institution ever organized under the Government,' asserts Representative MADDEN.

"CLERKS IN LONG POSE WHILE FAMILIES WAIT—CONFLICT OF AUTHORITY ADDS TO DELAY IN PAY.

"WASHINGTON, December 10.

"Despite the fact that the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance is approximately six months behind in the mailing of allowances to the wives, children, and aged parents of American soldiers, the clerks of one entire division of the bureau passed considerable time this afternoon on the steps of the District Building posing for a photograph.

"Efforts to ascertain the fundamental causes for the present conditions in the War-Risk Bureau developed the view that responsibility is due primarily to:

"Lack of the proper organization at the outset.

"Failure of the officials in charge to grasp the enormity of their task and to prepare to meet it.

"Conflict of authority between the Treasury Department and the War-Risk Bureau in the matter of making payments.

"Members of Congress and other officials who have investigated the bureau generally are agreed the trouble is due primarily to organization; to an incapacity to employ the 14,000 clerks now at work in the bureau in the most efficient manner."

It is contended none of the officials selected to handle this big task had a proper grasp of its scope in the beginning and failed to lay the framework for a sufficiently elastic organization to keep pace with the growth of the military forces.

Much of the responsibility for this is said to have been due to the fact that the bureau was made a part of the Treasury Department instead of being established as a distinct department of the Government. Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo, it is held, could have put the bureau on an efficient basis had not he been restricted in his attention to it by numerous other duties. The point is made that proper executive authority could have so organized the bureau as to have overcome these difficulties months ago.

When the War-Risk Bureau was under fire in Congress recently Representative SHERLEY said:

"I have personally undertaken, not once, but a great many times, to bring to the attention of the War-Risk Insurance Bureau the need of simplifying and arranging this matter so that there would not be delay. After all, the remedy is in the efficiency of the men at the head of the bureau."

Mr. SHERLEY explained that much of the trouble has been due to a change in the law, which has brought about a conflict in authority between the War-Risk Bureau and the War Department.

Under existing conditions a soldier is required to allot a certain amount of his pay to his dependents. The Government adds an equal amount, the aggregate of which is forwarded to the soldier's family through the War-Risk Bureau.

In addition to the compulsory allotment a soldier is permitted to make a voluntary allotment, and this money is taken from his salary by the Quartermaster Corps of the War Department and forwarded by that department to the beneficiary named.

The result has been that many soldiers making allotments through the War Department went to France believing they had done everything to provide for their dependents, whereas the signing of an entirely distinct set of papers was required.

Mr. SHERLEY has advocated congressional action to remedy this situation, but many Members of Congress see no need for additional legislation, declaring the President has power to coordinate the work under one organization.

Representative MADDEN, Republican, of Illinois, declares that investigation "has convinced him that the War-Risk Bureau is not being operated efficiently."

"The bureau had $3,591,000 appropriated for its maintenance just six months ago," he said, "and that to-day it comes in here for an additional appropriation as a deficiency of $7,580,000. They asked for $10,000,000, and the appropriation is for $7,580,000. That makes a total appropriation within the last six months of $11,171,000 to administer an institution that ought to be capable of functioning with 3,500 people. They have 14,000 people employed there now, and if this is an example of efficient administration of public affairs, I have not much respect for such knowledge of efficiency.

"It is the most inefficient, outrageously extravagant institution that was ever organized under the Government. The average number of hours they put in a week is one good day's work. There are thousands of men and women who are supposed to be employed making no kind of excuse for not performing the duty at all. Some clerks, supposed to be working at night, report for duty at 6 o'clock, immediately after making the report for duty go out to supper, and when the theater is open they go to the theater and never come back."

The Philadelphia Public Ledger, of the same date, says:

APPEAL SENT TO WASHINGTON.

Six days ago the disappointing prospect for Christmas in many soldier homes here actuated Mrs. M. L. Woodruff, in charge of the Personal Service Bureau, to write a letter to C. F. Nesbit, commissioner of the bureau at Washington. She wrote:

"I am inclosing herewith a list containing the names of the allottees who have not received their Government checks, and I take the liberty of asking if you will be so good as to direct that checks be sent to them.

"If the checks can be sent to them forthwith, it will insure a cheerful Christmas in many homes. Personally, I can ask nothing better for my own Christmas enjoyment than to feel that the people who have come to me in their troubles have received their money and will be sure of some of the creature comforts over the holidays."

Mrs. Woodruff said yesterday many reasons could be ascribed for the failure of the allotment checks to arrive in many cases. She said one of the most potent of these was the constant moving of families from one home to another without notifying the War Risk Bureau.

"Real estate," she added, "has been sold and bartered so frequently here and to such an extent that this enters into troubles of the dependents. We have cases where the home of a soldier's family has been sold three times, and in each case the family had to move in order to make room for the owner or somebody else.

"Naturally they forget to notify the bureau they have moved, and this holds up the arrival of the checks. In some instances the postmaster is notified to have the mail carriers see that the check arrives at the proper destination after the dependent has moved from the old address.

"Again, many of the boys overseas fail to fill out the blanks which certify the persons to whom the allotments are to be paid. This means the allotment blank is void and the folks back home receive no checks. It requires time, too, to look into all these things and take care of them."

Stories typical of many that are heard every day at City Hall were told yesterday by the dependents. One of these is the sick mother of Max Garr, who was a clothing cutter and lived at 2660 Napa Street before he went overseas with the Fifty-fourth Pioneer Infantry. Not only has the mother received but one allotment from her son, but she has not even received a word regarding his whereabouts since he arrived in France.

On December 10 the Philadelphia Public Ledger published the following:

WAR-RISK BUREAU DELAYS BRING DISTRESS TO DEPENDENT HOMES—PERSONAL SERVICE BUREAU AND CITY ACTIVITIES DEVOTE EFFORTS TO RELIEVING CASES OF PRIVATION.

Ten days ago the War-Risk Insurance Bureau was 80,000 checks behind on allotments to the dependents of men in the service of the country. This admission was made by officials at Washington in a letter to Mrs. M. L. Woodruff, in charge of the personal-service bureau here.

"At that time," she said, "the officials blamed the arrears on the epidemic of influenza among the clerks, and said as soon as this had abated the work would go right along."

Inquiries here disclosed that hundreds of dependents have failed to receive their allotments in time, and in many instances downright privation has followed this failure to receive Federal money. Fifty-five cases have been reported since December 6, it was said at Mrs. Woodruff's office, but others said that within the last few days checks have again started to come.

Typical cases in which actual want faces some of the dependents were recited yesterday. One of these is the mother of a private at Camp Johnston, Jacksonville, Fla., the quartermaster's training school. No check has been received by his mother, a complaint to Washington says, since last June. Another is a private in the Eleventh Regiment of Field Artillery. His wife, who lives on McKean Street near Fourth, has received no money since August and is in such distress that she has been cared for by Philadelphia Councils' relief committee.

Another soldier at the cooks' and bakers' school was the sole support of his parents before he went into service. They live on Siegel Street near Sixth, and the mother has written a plaintive letter, in which she says she has received no money since September and their situation is that of actual want.

Another woman, the wife of a soldier in Company H, of the Fifty-second Pioneer Infantry, now overseas, lives on Walnut Street near Thirty-seventh. She has received no allotment since early in the summer, and the personal-service bureau is paying her rent until the arrival of the check.

Mrs. Woodruff said similar cases could be cited, showing that unless there is a decided brace in caring for these dependents before the winter comes much suffering and privation will be found among the families of soldiers.

And on last Monday morning the Philadelphia Public Ledger printed the following, which speaks for itself:

SOLDIERS' MONEY FOR DEPENDENTS FAR IN ARREARS—HUNGER AND COLD MENACING MANY MOTHERS, WIVES, AND CHILDREN—INQUIRY BY CONGRESS SOON APPEARS CERTAIN—MCADOO REVEALS SHORTCOMINGS OF WAR-RISK BUREAU, BUT CLERKS ARE BLAMED.

WASHINGTON, December 8.

The Government's bureau for the payment of monthly dependency allotments to the families of soldiers, sailors, and marines is far behind in its work.

Many women and children dependent in a large measure on the Government checks are bordering on actual want as the cold weather looms. Money which might have been available for the expenditures incident to Christmas probably will not reach them until spring.

Despite all official denials it was learned to-day there are thousands of cases where dependents of soldiers have not received their allotment checks for from two to six months. An early congressional inquiry into the alleged inefficiency of the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance appears certain.

The Public Ledger has received definite information from the relatives of soldiers that this situation prevails. Some officials of the bureau deny the condition is quite so bad, but the clerks who mail the checks say privately most of the bureau's work is approximately six months in arrears.

There has been criticism due to the failure of soldiers to receive their pay, but this is a War Department task. There was much ground for such complaints early in the war, but a large majority of the soldiers are receiving their monthly pay on time, and that exceptions are comparatively few is due to the inability to prevent errors in so large a task.

PROMISES FAIL OF FULFILLMENT.

Criticism of the War-Risk Bureau is not a novelty in Washington and numerous attempts have been made to explain its shortcomings, always with assurances that better results would be forthcoming.

The chief argument was that the bureau was required to cover entirely new ground in its work and that it was hampered in a very material way by the unfamiliarity of most persons with their share of the duties necessary to obtain the allotments, and particularly by the failure of soldiers themselves to take the proper steps to insure allotments for their dependents.

It is not doubted there is considerable weight to this argument of the bureau chiefs, but, it is maintained, no such excuse can apply in the large number of cases where the soldiers have been alert in taking the proper steps to have a portion of their salary allotted to their mothers or wives.

The most frequent answer to criticisms of the War-Risk Bureau is that of "inefficient clerical forces" and the inability to obtain an adequate force to handle the work. This argument is advanced in the face of the fact that for many months idle clerks in many branches of the Government have been "stumbling over one another," and in many instances stenographers have not averaged 50 letters a week.

The point is that the bureau is making the same appeal for leniency that it made in the fall of 1917, and that slight progress seems to have been made to bring some order out of the chaos which then existed.

It is contended by many persons that the clerks in the bureau pass entirely too much time looking for "funny" grammatical errors and misstatements in the letters of poorly educated dependents of soldiers and for "spicy scandal" in the correspondence, especially of soldiers seeking to avoid payment to wives from whom they have separated either by divorce proceedings or abandonment.

M'ADOO EXPLAINS BUREAU'S DELAY.

Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo does not attempt to conceal the shortcomings of the bureau, but he has sought to explain them and to hold out a promise for better results in the future.

"The volume of work handled by the War-Risk Insurance Bureau in the first year of the military and naval divisions' existence has been very great," Secretary McAdoo said. "It has involved literally hundreds of millions of transactions. The achievements of the bureau are less likely, however, to attract public attention than are its deficiencies or errors.

"Beneficiaries of the bureau take what comes to them easily as a matter of course, but those whose needs have not received immediate attention are not inclined to consider the gigantic nature of the organization problem with which the officials of the bureau have been struggling as sufficient excuse for the delay in the settlement of their individual cases.

"Once the work of organization is complete, the problem of running the bureau, colossal as is its volume of work, should present no unusual difficulties. The most pressing problems have been in connection with the work of awarding allotments and allowances to the dependents of enlisted men. When men are no longer drafted, new applications for allotments and allowances will cease to come in. Changes in applications already entered may, however, be expected for some time. But when the war is over and the fighting forces have returned to their homes, the work of the section of allotments and allowances will gradually cease.

"Officials realize keenly that failure to act promptly and efficiently in the allotments and allowances section meant suffering for the dependents of men who had been called into the military or naval service.

PITIFUL CASES ARE NUMEROUS.

"Many pitiful cases of need came to the attention of the bureau. Every effort was bent toward the supreme end of getting checks to the dependents of soldiers and sailors as quickly as possible. Virtually the whole section, both officials and clerks, worked voluntarily at their tasks for 24 hours without stopping on several occasions to get the monthly checks out.

"A principal cause of delay in handling allotment cases has been the lack of trained and efficient help. The bureau has suffered very severely from the difficulties of establishing a new organization of the magnitude required under the conditions existing in Washington. At present no less than 4,000 typists are needed for routine work. While the total number of those now enrolled is only a little less than 13,000, the total number of those in training during the year was possibly nearer 20,000.

"Owing to unsatisfactory living conditions in Washington many young women who came here out of patriotic motives to do war work returned to their homes after a very brief experience. During September, indeed, one-twelfth of the clerical force resigned. About 90 per cent of the bureau's employees are women.

"The work of the bureau has been impeded by other causes than the insufficient numbers of the personnel. These include errors in the applications of enlisted men, such as errors in the spelling of names or addresses of allottees and the omission of information which is necessary for making an award; the failure of enlisted men to make allotments to persons dependent upon them for support, this failure being due sometimes to a desire to escape responsibility toward a dependent, sometimes to misunderstanding of the questions asked in the application blank; changes of addresses of allottees without proper notification to the bureau; failure of allottees to give sufficient information to identify the enlisted man referred to when the allottee writes to the bureau; Anglicized spelling of a proper name by enlisted men while the allottee adheres to foreign spelling; and, finally, the impossibility of identifying an enlisted man by name alone because of the great number of identical names in a list of 4,000,000.

"No one single administrative act since the war began has contributed to the simplification of the bureau's work so much as the order to give every soldier a serial number, although it entailed a stupendous task."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD E. ROBBINS,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, January 2, 1919.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include a speech by Hon. WILLIAM S. VARE before the City Business Club at the Adelphia Hotel, Philadelphia, on December 9, 1918.

The speech is as follows:

SPEECH BY HON. WILLIAM S. VARE BEFORE THE CITY BUSINESS CLUB AT THE ADELPHIA HOTEL, PHILADELPHIA, DECEMBER 9, 1918.

Gentlemen, if I had longer time I might discuss my subject with particular profit not only to myself but possibly to some of you gentlemen.

I have been assigned, I understand, to discuss "The Inside History of the Political Game in the City of Philadelphia." Possibly in days gone by, in the olden times, there may have been cause for discussion, but not within the last 12 years, since the introduction of the direct primary system, which, as I recall it, was passed by the General Assembly in 1906.

As you all know, we have the direct primary system. It costs absolutely nothing for a person to file a petition to be nominated for office. It is open to all. It is a system of democracy in its broadest terms.

What is the inside history of the political game as now played in the city of Philadelphia?

It is absolutely founded on the same things that are the basis of every successful man's business; that is, first, truthfulness, and, second, quality of service. Now, those two great principles are naturally augmented by many things. Back of this system of truth and service is unlimited energy, perseverance, activity, and extreme close touch with the citizenship of our city.

For instance, the active party man becomes a candidate for membership of the ward executive committee in his election division, and under the party rules there are two members for each election district, who make a canvass of their respective voters, and if they have had a majority of the votes cast become members of the Republican ward executive committee. No one can contend for a more representative system. These gentlemen elected assemble at a time fixed by law and select a member to represent them in the Republican central campaign committee, who therefore becomes an indirect representative of the people. These men assemble at the party headquarters, one representative from each ward, and on a day fixed by law vote for a president, vice president, treasurer, and secretary of the Republican central campaign committee. Therefore your party organization is formed in accordance with the law under the most representative system of democracy that could be proposed by any body of men.

Now, these men are required to be industrious, truthful, are on the job, as it were. If they carry out the advice given them by men in responsible positions or men in high authority, they are in close touch at all times with the voters of their election district. So it is that before the election days roll around attention is paid to, first, the qualification of the voter; and, second, to seeing that he is assessed; and, third, that he is properly registered; and, this having been done, he is then kept well acquainted with the issues and topics of the day, so far as applies to the oncoming campaign. So it is there is a great compact body of intelligent, active Republicans working for the success of the party.

There are times when the policy of this great party organization may not appeal to the public press and they disagree. Certainly that is their right. But in Philadelphia the Republican Party, at times, has been successful without their support, and this does not apply to many other cities. The political system very often carries with it the ownership of great newspapers. That seems to apply in localities where there is not a well-defined party organization. For instance, we find in the great State of Illinois a recently successful Republican candidate for United States Senator, Mr. MEDILL MCCORMICK, who is the owner of a great Chicago newspaper. That is largely the medium by which he was enabled to have a system of publicity for his very many beneficial acts as a citizen and as an active progressive member of the lower House of Congress. I have the highest regard for him. He is one of the most distinguished Representatives. But I repeat again he did not have a compact political organization throughout the State of Illinois. Yet he had a substitute, as it were, to it in the ownership of a great newspaper.

I can look through that body of Representatives from different sections of the country, and in a great many instances the Members of the lower House of Congress are the owners of important newspapers, and it is their medium of imparting information to their constituents in their different campaigns.

Getting back to the success of the Republican Party in Philadelphia, persons will say, "Why is it that Philadelphia is the only large city in the country which gave Justice Charles E. Hughes such splendid Republican support?" He did not carry Boston, Chicago, or New York City, but he did carry Philadelphia by 100,000 majority. Why was it?

You went to a moving-picture show, which many of you men did in Philadelphia and Atlantic City. There would be President Wilson's portrait on the screen and one of Justice Hughes. On every occasion Mr. Wilson got the greatest applause, but when the votes were counted in Philadelphia, and there was not a single complaint in the city as to unfair or wrong conduct on the part of a single election officer, Mr. Hughes was returned with an overwhelming majority.

In the recent election for governor, notwithstanding that there were printed long articles in which some members of the Democratic Party complained of the method of holding elections in Philadelphia, before the election was held, none were made afterwards. I emphasize the fact that in nearly 1,400 election divisions of the city not a single complaint from any citizen throughout the entire city was received. I submit that is a wonderful record for a party organization in conducting a campaign for the high office of governor, for members of the lower House of Representatives, for members of the Senate of Pennsylvania, and for 41 members of the lower house at Harrisburg, and as the result of that election Philadelphia gave the Republican Party 100,000 majority, notwithstanding there was a great question brought in of "wet" or "dry," which seemed to confuse the voters in other large municipalities. This issue carried in New York City. It carried there by a quarter of a million votes and carried in every other large city. But in Philadelphia it had absolutely no effect on the electorate. The voters chose intelligently and wisely under the dissemination of information, as it were, by the active Republicans of the city through the channels of the Republican Party.

So it is that we find that the election, which resulted in giving the candidate for governor of the State 100,000 majority in round figures, and the election of all Congressmen, the election of an entire Republican delegation to the State Senate, and all of the 41 Republican members to the lower house of the General Assembly. Not a single complaint was made of disorder or a question raised as to the honesty and integrity of those men who made a great sacrifice, staying from their homes continuously for 20 hours to properly look after the election returns, and they only received $5 a day, clerks and inspectors, much less than they would have received for eight or nine hours' labor.

Thus in Philadelphia the party organization is conducted on the highest possible plane of efficiency.

Why is it some say that the Republican Party of Philadelphia retains the confidence of the voters, notwithstanding the opposition of every newspaper in the city? It is a condition not equaled in any city of the civilized world. Why is it? The answer is: The organization is based on truth, on integrity of purpose; its members carry out this policy in dealing with their fellow men. There is no equivocation or mental reservation. Every man who applies to the Republican city committee or any of the higher officials on any question receives a straightforward "yes" or "no." As it is, there is that degree of confidence which must necessarily follow when you are dealing with men frankly, openly, and aboveboard.

When you couple that with the industry of 365 days in the year there is that cohesion, that solidarity of party organization, which has been so extremely successful in the city of Philadelphia.

The people of Philadelphia are no different from the people of Pittsburgh; there is just as much interest in the Republican Party's policy of a protective tariff as in Philadelphia; but what do we find there as a result of unorganized politics—a Democratic Member in Congress is representing one of the greatest industrial districts of any part of this country.

I appeal to you, Does not organization of a correct character mean well for the interest of the business men rather than disorganization?

Then there is this to be said about the local party organization. It is the absolute direct representative form of government. It does not appeal to the owners of newspapers or to a class of men who like to see advertisements of their names from time to time printed in the newspapers, or to the so-called reform body. It does appeal, however, to the common sense of the thinking man of the city who is interested in having his taxes kept at a reasonable rate as they are in the city of Philadelphia.

I recall sometime ago when a large body of real estate men held a meeting at the Manufacturers' Club. I was in Washington at the time. Those gentlemen later came to see my brother, State Senator Edwin H. Vare. He said: "I am in entire sympathy with you. I do not have any vote in the councils of our city, but certainly I shall be glad to advise and cooperate with you and with the thought in mind, that there shall be no increase in taxes next year."

There was nothing particularly wrong about that, but there was not a single newspaper in Philadelphia that would tell that to the public as it happened. They rather made it appear that Senator Vare was sitting there as an autocrat, passing on the duties which belong to members of city councils, when, as a matter of fact, the only thing he agreed to do was to submit the request which this distinguished and representative body of real estate men had submitted, with the assurance that so far as he was able to do it he would consult with those who held the responsibility of fixing the taxes. The taxes have been fixed for our city during the next year, and notwithstanding the increase in the price of commodities there will be no increase of taxes in the city of Philadelphia during the next year. [Applause.]

There are some who would like to abolish the councilmanic representation.

Let me tell you how that would work out. At the present time you have a representative in select council for each ward, making 48 in all. You have also one for each 4,000 voters in each of the wards in common council. Some few well-meaning men would like to change that system and they received quite a lot of newspaper notoriety. The public press printed in great headlines, "What the committee is going to do."

They proposed this same thing two years ago. It was not done. The legislature met and it was not done. Did these distinguished gentlemen present this issue to the voters? Did these newspapers who are giving it such great headlines now present their issue to the people of the city when these senators and members were being elected? No. The election is over and the voters are not being consulted; these gentlemen—high-minded, some might say; others might question their motives—did not present any of these issues. They would have the city give up representative government at this time, in face of the fact that we have been fighting a great world-wide war for this very thing of representative democratic government.

For instance, let me take the gentlemen from Germantown. There now you have five men in the common council and one in select council.

Suppose you wanted some additional electric lights, highways better paved, and numerous things of public development. As it is now, you would go around to the home of your councilman and present your request to him. Under the so-called system of commission government, you would go down to the city hall to see one of the commissioners, and do you think you would find the commissioner? Do you think he would be sitting from 8 o'clock in the morning to 7 at night? You would not find the commissioner, but a clerk. You would probably look in the window and the clerk would take your complaint. No opportunity would be given you to present your views to one familiar with the subject.

I ask you, gentlemen, if this is representative government—whether you would not prefer to go to one of your esteemed neighbors who represent you in council and know your immediate needs? I ask that question of the man who lives in the central and south or western part of the city—if he would not rather go around the corner to your neighbor, who thinks about you, and take up the proposed question of public development with the ward representative directly rather than with a clerk at the city hall? Do you not get better service and more representation?

That is the difference between the present system of representative government, as represented by the ward system in the city, and that which would be under the so-called small council or a commission government.

We very frequently have questions taken up by the public press from time to time, and some that seem to agitate the public greatly.

There are four great questions: First, water; second, lighting; third, street car transportation; and I might add a fourth, the greatest of all, education. Education has been separated, so that it is not now a part of the local life of the so-called political system.

The other day I had occasion to see my attorney over in Camden. I had a lawsuit on sometime ago. I got on the car at Fourth Street in Camden and rode to Market Street Wharf, about four blocks. I got on and had no change. I gave the conductor a dollar bill and he gave me my change. It cost me 7 cents to ride from Fourth Street to the wharf. I was in Wilmington and it cost me 6 cents to ride on the car. I was also in Atlantic City and had to pay 6 cents.

Gentlemen, I have not seen a single line in the Philadelphia newspapers telling the people of Philadelphia that you are getting 5-cent car fare and riding farther for 5 cents in Philadelphia than in any city in the world. I have never seen a single line of this in any newspaper. That is not a complaint on my part. I have absolutely no complaint to make of the Philadelphia newspapers. So far as I am personally concerned they treat me with the greatest respect, and I am on terms of intimacy with virtually all the owners of the papers.

I simply ask the question, Why does the public press of our city not point out to the entire people the many advantages, many virtues, of this splendid city of Philadelphia, in which we are rearing our families? That is simply the question I ask the press, and I ask you, Why do you not use your influence with the newspapers and point out to them the importance and what it means to you in your business life?

Do you suppose for a moment, for instance, that a woman living halfway between here and New York, when she leaves the house to do some shopping, that if she picks up the Philadelphia newspapers and finds great headlines attacking the mayor of the city, the governor of the Commonwealth, or the President of the United States she not only loses respect for these high officials but, when it applies to the mayor of our city, does it not cause the intended purchaser, who is about to do the Christmas shopping, to have a doubt in mind as to the wisdom of visiting Philadelphia and to send that business to New York?

I simply submit that as a query for you gentlemen to give consideration.

Now, Pennsylvania in some parts has a foreign-born people or people of foreign extraction of nearly 50 per cent of its population—in some small centers even greater than 50 per cent and in others not quite as much. I have in mind the southeastern part of our city, where there is a community comprising two wards. In these two wards there are approximately 10,000 voters out of a population of about 75,000 inhabitants. When the vote is counted in that great population (without a single complaint) there are only 200 Socialist votes.

In a similar population in New York City at the recent election, and in a district comprised of the same foreign extraction, there were 4,500 Socialist votes, and to such a great extent socialism existed that in four districts in order to keep Socialists out of Congress it was necessary for the Republican and Democratic parties to combine on the same men, so that in two districts the Republicans joined the Democrats, nominated and elected two Democrats, and in two districts in return two Republicans were nominated and elected. It took both parties together to keep down socialism, which had been making such great strides.

I ask you men if attacking the President of the United States or the governor of the Commonwealth or the mayor of the city does not have a tendency toward creating suspicion of them, thereby destroying confidence in public officials who have relations with the man of foreign birth who comes to our shores?

What system is best qualified and equipped to combat "isms" of that character?

Is it the system where 12 men—as they did a year ago—go into a back room—six of them not being residents of Philadelphia—and assume to select a ticket in opposition to that which had been selected by 157,000 voters at the direct primaries? Would men of the type of W. Freeland Kendrick, Esq., who sits in front of me here, who received the people's indorsement, be better qualified to meet the people on common ground, or would the man who never touches elbows with his fellows be as well qualified to meet the people and allay any suspicions there might be in their minds?

I submit to you whether a representative government represented by 157,000 votes under the direct primary system is after all not of the essence of democracy, rather than 12 men going into a back room, 6 of whom were not qualified and had not registered, and who presented the so-called reform "Town Party" ticket to the citizens of Philadelphia, containing one man who ran for the high office of receiver of taxes, who did not have a vote but who filed an affidavit before the registration commission stating under oath that he had been absent from the city the entire three registration days, but when the time came for him to appear and finish his enrollment he did not go. Why? This gentleman who stood out as an apostle of reform knew that the one affidavit already filed was false, and a second affidavit might have led him to places which were extremely undesirable, where free air and sunshine were not so easily secured as they are on the great highway of the city. [Laughter.]

Not to be too serious, but frank and truthful, the final success of the Republican Party in Philadelphia is, first, truthfulness; second, intelligent, efficient service; third, industry and perpetual activity; and above and beyond these and coupled with them are the anticipation of the needs of the community, anticipating the things which would be beneficial to the community, and the setting about to secure those things for the people.

There are three kinds of Republicanism throughout the country and as many kinds of leaders.

There is the man who has power, and says to his friends: "I am not going to bother with this excitement. That will all blow over. I am not going to pay attention to these things—these new ideas." That man who is "stand pat" absolutely, and would like to have his party run on the same lines that it was run 50 years ago, telling about the stories of the great men of the past.

There is the man who will rush wild every time he sees a great crowd assembling, preaching new doctrines.

But the Republican Party of Philadelphia, first, with its firm belief in the principles of the Republican Party, with its years of experience, coming in close contact with the common people of the city, having an extreme interest in the upbuilding of the public school system, being interested in a well-governed city, with a well-lighted, well-paved system of highways, seeking the best possible methods of transportation for its people, seeking light in every dark alley, seeking and anticipating the needs of all sections of the city, and using the power of the party organization in order that beneficial public development might be placed at the doors of the people, not as a result of an uprising, but in a cool, calm, deliberate manner, and obtaining for them the things that are sane and wise, conducive to make one's life (amid good surroundings) happy, of great prosperity, and contentment of mind. Having these things in mind, so far as I am concerned, as well as those who are associated with me in the conduct of or in the assistance in the party organization of the city, this great organized power shall be kept intact. With the sympathy and cooperation of the great masses of the people of our community this great power will be intelligently used for the advancement and development and best interests of the people of this splendid city in which I was born and in which I intend to spend the rest of my life.

I thank you. [Long applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. ELSTON,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, January 9, 1919.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to proposed amendments of the Dent bill (H. R. 13274) whereby a legislative committee or a new commission shall make the adjustments and settlements authorized by the terms of the bill. I am convinced that the machinery set up by the Secretary of War is far preferable, and I believe it will contribute to the RECORD and to this debate to incorporate here a very able discussion of the subject furnished me by Mr. Max Thelen, at present surveyor of contracts and assistant to the Director of Purchase, Storage and Traffic in the War Department. Up to last summer Mr.

Thelen had been for several years president of the State Railroad Commission of California, and he has also been honored with the presidency of the National Association of State Utility Commissioners. He resigned his position in California to serve the Government, and since June 14, 1918, he has performed unusual service in the supervision of the contract and purchasing policy of the War Department. I may say that he is a Republican in politics. In his memorandum Mr. Thelen says:

1. The adjustment commission is entirely unnecessary.

Adequate and efficient machinery to handle all claims has already been established and is now working in the War Department, and the proposed adjustment commission is entirely unnecessary.

By far the largest number of contracts and orders are outstanding in the Ordnance Department and in the Purchase and Storage Division (formerly the Quartermaster Corps).

The Ordnance Department already has in operation a central claims board in Washington and district claims boards in the following districts: Baltimore, Boston, Bridgeport, Chicago, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Detroit, New York, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Rochester, St. Louis.

The Purchase and Storage Division already has in operation a central board of contract review in Washington and zone boards of review in the following zones or districts: Atlanta, Baltimore, Boston, Chicago, Fort Sam Houston, Jeffersonville, Ind., New Orleans, New York, Omaha, Philadelphia, St. Louis, San Francisco.

The Bureau of Aircraft Production, Chemical Warfare Service, Construction Division, Corps of Engineers, and Signal Corps handle a smaller number of contracts, and each has a board of contract review stationed in Washington.

The decisions of the local boards are transmitted to Washington for final review.

Each of the foregoing boards, together with a large personnel of contracting officers and assistants, are now actively at work on the suspension, termination, and settlement of valid formal contracts and orders, to the end that contractors may receive promptly the payment of moneys which are fairly due to them.

These settlements are all made in accordance with principles promulgated by the War Department in Washington, and the action of the local boards is subject to careful supervision from Washington.

If agreement is reached as to the money due to the contractor, payment is promptly made on approval by the reviewing authority. If an agreement can not be reached, then under an arrangement approved by the Comptroller of the Treasury by letter dated November 25, 1918, the contractor may forthwith be paid up to 75 per cent of the amount conceded by the contracting officer to be due to him, and may then file with the Secretary of War his petition for a determination of the balance due to him.

For the purpose of handling such petitions, the Secretary of War, by General Order No. 103, established the board of contract adjustment, charged with the duty of hearing and deciding such cases, and consisting of the following three members: Lieut. Col. Christopher B. Garnett, formerly chairman of the Corporation Commission of Virginia; Lieut. Col. Herbert H. Lehman, member of the firm of Lehman Bros., bankers, of New York; Lieut. Col. Edward S. Malone, formerly assistant corporation counsel for the Borough of Queens, New York.

This board hears only such cases in which the contractors and officers of the Government have been unable to agree as to the amount due to the contractor.

The foregoing boards and officers, now at work on the suspension, termination, and settlement of valid contracts and orders, are ready, on the enactment of the legislation which the War Department has requested, to begin work immediately on the cases in which contracts were not made or signed as provided by law.

The War Department having already in operation a sufficient number of qualified boards and officers with ramifications all over the country well able to dispose promptly of the immense number of settlements with which the War Department is now confronted, it follows that the adjustment commission proposed by S. 5261 is entirely unnecessary.

2. The adjustment commission would cause great and serious delays.

Before the proposed adjustment commission could start work the following steps would be necessary:

(1) The bill must be enacted.
(2) The President must appoint the members.
(3) The Senate must confirm the members.
(4) The board must organize and gather together its office force.
(5) If regional boards of examiners are appointed, their membership must be selected and their machinery started.

When these steps have all been accomplished, the board will find itself confronted with an impossible task. There are over 6,000 instances of informal agreements which have not been followed by the necessary formal contracts. If to this number are added the cases in which formal contracts were executed but not properly signed in behalf of the Government and the further cases in which it is now necessary to terminate valid contracts which were legally made and signed, there will be a minimum of 20,000 to 25,000 contracts which will come before the proposed board and which under the bill must be decided by its three members within one year. The mere statement of this proposition shows the utter impossibility of its accomplishment.

On the other hand, the War Department, working through its 8 central boards of review in Washington, its 24 local or zone boards in the various sections of the country, and its thousands of contracting officers and assistants, all familiar with the work and already in operation, can make these settlements promptly and will do so if permitted so to do.

If contractors must wait until the proposed adjustment commission is organized and gets into its stride and reaches their particular cases among the more than 20,000 which are to be decided by this board, thousands of contractors will suffer undeserved loss and large numbers of them will be forced into bankruptcy.

It is most earnestly urged, in the name of the honor and good faith of the Government and fair play to the contractors that no such plan be adopted, but rather that the existing adequate and efficient machinery already established by the War Department be permitted to continue and complete its work.

As bearing on the personnel and the expenditures necessary in the determination of large numbers of cases, by prompt and informal methods, attention is invited to the following illustrations:

(1) The Interstate Commerce Commission consists of nine members. During the year ending October 31, 1917, the commission decided approximately 1,000 formal proceedings and 10,000 informal proceedings, with an organization of approximately 700 employees and an expenditure of $1,060,000 chargeable to this work. The Hitchcock bill proposes to have three men decide in one year at least twice as many cases on an appropriation less than one-twentieth as large.

(2) The Public Service Commission of New York, second district, a typical State public service commission, decided in 1917 approximately 450 formal proceedings and 1,350 informal proceedings, a total of 1,800 proceedings on an appropriation of approximately $400,000. The Hitchcock bill proposes to have the adjustment commission decide approximately twenty times as many cases with one-eighth the appropriation and personnel.

River and Harbor Appropriation Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM W. GRIEST,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, January 11, 1919.

Mr. GRIEST. Mr. Speaker, that the Susquehanna River should be made navigable, if feasible, is so manifest that argument is not needed to convince those who have knowledge of the fact that it drains a larger area of territory and carries to the sea a greater volume of water than any other North American river that empties into the Atlantic Ocean, the St. Lawrence alone excepted. It traverses an agricultural region whose fertility is unsurpassed anywhere, more than one-half of its length from Harrisburg to Chesapeake Bay being embraced within the limits of Lancaster County, Pa., which is admitted to be the first agricultural county in the Union. It also touches at Harrisburg and elsewhere in the county of Dauphin, Pa., as well as in the counties of Lancaster and York, veritable beehives of industrial activity. It goes without saying that to open up this waterway is to cause many blades of grass to grow where but one grew before, and multiplying the productivity of the regions affected will increase and cheapen food and other supplies essential to the Nation's well-being.

The item relating to the Susquehanna River, on page 29 of the pending rivers and harbors appropriation bill, will, if enacted, make effective the measure—H. R. 13180—which I introduced in this session of the Congress. My bill provides for a survey, under direction of the Secretary of War, of the river between its mouth, in Maryland, and the city of Harrisburg, in Pennsylvania, in order to determine the feasibility of making the river navigable and to report to the Congress the cost thereof.

There can be no conceivable reason why the feasibility of this project should not now be ascertained. The Susquehanna is now a navigable stream for perhaps 5 miles of this distance—from Havre de Grace, at its mouth, to Port Deposit. Thence northward to Harrisburg is a distance of about 60 miles. So that the entire distance to be covered in the survey authorized in this bill is only 65 miles, approximately.

Whilst the Susquehanna River is rated by the War Department as "navigable" in the State of Maryland and "nonnavigable" in the State of Pennsylvania, yet I am glad to be able to state, on the authority of a former Secretary of War, Hon. Lindley M. Garrison, that there "is nothing in the ruling of the department" that can possibly interfere with the right of Congress "to pass legislation authorizing the improvement of the Susquehanna River over any greater portion of its length than is now navigable."

My correspondence with the War Department is as follows:

LETTER OF INQUIRY TO WAR DEPARTMENT.

MARCH 27, 1914.

Hon. LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: About the year 1904 an Executive order was issued declaring the Susquehanna River nonnavigable in the State of Pennsylvania. A Member of the House during the recent debate on the rivers and harbors appropriation bill stated that the action of the Government was "a very unusual proceeding," and that the people had been "denied the rights of navigation and supervision by the Government of the United States on their river and its tributaries."

Would you kindly cause me to be furnished with a copy of the Executive order and with such statement as the department can make concerning the reasons for the Government's action?

Appreciating such detailed information as can be supplied me, I have the honor to remain,

Yours, very truly,

W. W. GRIEST.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 7, 1914.

Hon. W. W. GRIEST,
United States House of Representatives.

SIR: Replying further to your letter of the 27th ultimo, regarding the Executive order which declared the Susquehanna River nonnavigable in the State of Pennsylvania, I have the honor to inclose herewith copy of a decision by the Hon. William H. Taft, Secretary of War, under date of March 9, 1904, which it is believed is the decision to which reference is made.

Section 9 of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1899, provides that it shall not be lawful to construct any bridge over any navigable river or other navigable water of the United States until the consent of Congress shall have been obtained and until the plans shall have been approved by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of War: Provided, That such structures may be built under authority of the legislature of a State across rivers and other waterways the navigable portions of which lie wholly within the limits of a single State, provided the location and plans thereof are submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of War before construction is commenced.

The decision which was rendered was in connection with the application of the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co. for approval of plans for the construction of a bridge across the Susquehanna River at Havre de Grace, Md., and simply related to the question as to whether it would be necessary for the company to obtain authority from Congress or not for the construction of the bridge. The Secretary of War, as you will see from the decision, decided that there was no interstate navigation such as was in the mind of Congress in making the distinction as to bridges for which authority was required by Congress and those for which it was not, and for this reason considered that the consent of the Secretary of War was sufficient and that the construction of the bridge could be allowed in accordance with the plans to be approved by the department. Such decisions are not at all uncommon, having been made in the case of the French Broad, the Allegheny, and the Cheat, among others.

Should Congress at any time desire to pass legislation authorizing the improvement of the Susquehanna River over any greater portion of its length than is now navigable, there is nothing in the ruling of the department that has been made that will have the least effect upon such action of Congress; and should the improvement be extended upstream into Pennsylvania, the practice which has heretofore been followed in the department of permitting bridges to be built across the river without the special authority from Congress in each case would, of course, be changed so as to correspond with the new conditions.

Very respectfully,

LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War.

COPY OF SECRETARY TAFT'S DECISION.

Copy of decision of Hon. William H. Taft, Secretary of War, March 9, 1904, defining the extent (geographically) of the navigability of the Susquehanna River. The decision was rendered in connection with application of the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co. for approval of plans for the construction of a bridge across the Susquehanna River at Havre de Grace, Md. (Copied from War Department record 6148.)

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington.

In the absence of Assistant Secretary Oliver, I have reexamined the question as to whether the Susquehanna River can be said to be a navigable river within the provisions of the act of Congress requiring that navigable rivers in two States shall not be crossed by bridges, except by authority of Congress, or should be considered as a navigable river within on(e) State, consent to cross which may be given by the legislature of the State with the approval of the Secretary of War.

My own judgment is that in the present condition of the Susquehanna River it is navigable only within one State. There is no interstate navigation such as was in the mind of Congress in making the distinction. For this reason the consent of the Secretary of War will be regarded as sufficient and the construction of the bridge allowed in accordance with plans to be approved by this department. This conclusion is reached on the assumption that the State of Maryland has already consented to the erection of the bridge.

WM. H. TAFT, Secretary of War.

The attitude of the War Department, which, as the dates of the above letters show, was made plain some years ago, is, I am given to understand, its attitude now, and removes all question of the propriety of enacting the legislation proposed in H. R. 13180 and favorably reported by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors on page 29 of the pending appropriation bill.

The House will do an injustice to the great States of Pennsylvania and Maryland and to the Nation at large should it fail to ascertain at an early date whether or not the navigability of this great river can be extended northward at least as far as the capital city of the Keystone State.

Eulogy of Theodore Roosevelt.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP P. CAMPBELL,

OF KANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 7, 1919.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend remarks in the RECORD, I insert the following article from this morning's Washington Post:

[By William Howard Taft.]

A great man has gone from among us. A full decade of usefulness was before him had he survived the Psalmist's period. He leaves us in the full vigor of his intellect and with no visible failure of that bodily strength that was in full harmony with his mind. He found opportunity to develop his sympathetic interest in all sports which he retained through life. It was characteristic of him that he took no interest in golf, preferring the intenser contest of boxing and tennis and the greater consumption of energy in tree chopping.

After graduation at Harvard in the class of 1880 and a course of law in Columbia he at once entered politics. He served in the legislative chambers of New York as a youth. He was delegate at large to the national convention of 1884 and a prominent figure in it, though only four years out of college. Then followed his service as a national civil-service commissioner, police commissioner of New York, and Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

OVERCAME EVERY ORSTACLE.

When the Spanish War came on over every obstacle he rushed to a lieutenant colonel's command of the Rough Riders, and a conspicuous part of the war. He became governor of New York, Vice President of the United States, and, on the death of President McKinley, succeeded him and was elected to a second term.

From the close of his college days until the declination to run again in 1908 for the Presidency he was constantly in public service and most active in it. He impressed himself on every task and gave it the color of his personality.

He was original, he was progressive, he was courageous, he was practical. He could challenge public interest and summon public sympathy to his aid.

In spite of all this labor in the public vineyard, he found time to read and write much. History he studied with a love of heroes who struggled and did things. Whatever he wrote was interesting. His opinions were his own. His descriptions of historical characters were graphic and often pungent.

OPPONENTS EMBARRASSED.

When he did not like a man or a people or a faction, he said so. He hit hard. His political enemies found much with which they thought to prejudice the descendants of those he attacked. But, as he said himself, he had written so much that his political opponents were embarrassed by their riches that they never made successful use of them.

The greatest work of Theodore Roosevelt was in his successful fight against the corporate control of politics. There was a real danger from this when he took office. When he left the Presidency he had set the current which carried corporations out of political power and rid our body politic of a growing disease. He was the victorious crusader in this fight.

LEADERSHIP OF PROGRESSIVES.

In respect of Col. Roosevelt's organization and leadership of the Progressive Party, there have been much difference and discussion which it would not be appropriate now, if ever, to review. But certainly it may properly be referred to, to show the strength of his hold on the American people, that he could, on whatever ground, break up the great Republican Party and win over to the party of his sole creation a larger vote than that given the regular Republican nominee.

Circumstances doubtless aided him, but without his wonderful personality and leadership the result could not have been achieved.

Theodore Roosevelt, with his brilliant, quick, and intense nature, made mistakes. Who does not? It would be characteristic of him in the calm of a long subsequent period freely to admit them. Those whose training makes them regard the proper administration of justice as the highest function of the State, regarded his attack upon the courts and his proposed change in the finality of their judgments as one of those mistakes. Whether he changed his views or not, he ceased to press the subject.

Great leaders of men must have confidence in themselves and their powers. Such confidence leads to egoism if it is not itself that quality. Theodore Roosevelt was a leader of men, and had that quality. But it did not hide his good fellowship and redbloodedness, his teamwork loyalty to those who were helping the cause he was fighting.

He was a most delightful chief to serve under. He was not a great administrator in the sense of knowing how to organize and conduct any great department, but he had the executive talent to select the men who could do this, and to inspire his appointees to devotion to his official purposes that made for his great success. He hunted for the biggest men he could find to do the tasks to be allotted; he was too broad to be jealous of them. He appreciated their work. Indeed, he overpraised it. He was most amenable to reason and correction by any one of them whose loyalty he knew and whose ability and judgment he had tried.

NO FALSE PRIDE OF OPINION.

He had no false pride of opinion and would reverse himself and embarrass himself in so doing when a trusted adviser pointed out his error. Mr. Roosevelt loved to fight. Controversy he enjoyed. Courage was his strongest trait; confidence in victory was constant with him to the end. He summoned all his energy and all his available weapons for the battle.

He said he liked to get close up to a man when he fought him. This absorption in a contest gave his every controversy a personal tone and aspect that commanded public attention but did not really add to the argumentative force of what he said.

It stimulated the enthusiasm and sympathies of his earnest and devoted followers but did not, perhaps, win over doubters. His tendency to the personal in controversy led him in the heat of the issue at times to criticisms of his adversaries which in after days he would sometimes qualify.

A REFORMER BY NATURE.

Mr. Roosevelt was a reformer and progressive by nature, but he was looking for real results. He was willing to compromise with conditions if he could make real headway. He had no patience with the reformer who was not willing to take a practical view and who, in his insistent demand for all he sought, would sacrifice real but less ambitious results.

He did much to further the cause of civil-service reform by enforcing the law as commissioner against the reluctance of national administrations. He tried to make things better by good appointments to office. He enlarged the classified service, but when he was in a political fight he was a most formidable antagonist.

MASTER IN CAMPAIGN.

He knew politics and politicians well, and he was a master in conducting a practical campaign. He knew the American voters. He could challenge their attention and win their support as few have done in the history of American politics.

He could invent a slogan which in a word or a phrase gave a full argument to his supporters that would win victory. He bound his followers to him with hooks of steel.

Neither Clay nor Blaine inspired more personal devotion. No one who ever came into personal contact with Theodore Roosevelt could ever forget the charm of his nature, responsive in the most sensitive degree to every advance of good will and good fellowship. He delighted in conversations, which he illuminated with flashes of wit and humor directed against himself or any other whom the topic suggested.

ENRICHED ASSOCIATIONS.

His wide reading, his strong literary taste, his world-wide experience with men and things enriched associations with him and left epigrammatic phrases and unique illustrations in the memory of those fortunate enough to enjoy it. Wit he had and enjoyed. He would characterize men and things with a humor which, by its fantastic color, would fix itself in the minds of those who heard it forever. He thus made words over, giving them a new meaning which the world accepted.

WAS A MAN'S MAN.

He was sweet, tender, and kind in his relations to women, but he was a man's man. He was a manly man. His sincere Christianity was masculine and affirmative. He feared the weakening effect upon men of an absence of the sacrifice, the physical courage, and the effort which war requires and stimulates.

He looked askance at any proposals for permanent peace which might involve national surrender of principle or self-respect. Ultra pacificism he condemned with almost the same emphasis which he visited upon treason, because he thought the results were the same. He made an inspiring hero for young men, and he has done much to help them to high ambitions and manly, courageous lives. He taught them the strenuous life and the need for effort and sacrifice in achievement for good for the world and happiness for self.

NEVER WITHOUT A BOOK.

Few men have had minds and bodies as intensely active. In all his work he was never without a book of literary merits which he would read in any interval of time which he might snatch in his busy office. He was a most voluminous correspondent.

A freedom of diction often tempted him into a statement of his views at length in many letters to his intimates. He was prompt in preparation. No sooner was an article or a speech to be prepared than he was at it. He would, if his time allowed, revise it, submit it to his friends for suggestions, and accept them. He loved strong and affirmative statements. He had little patience with indirection in style or thought.

RESEMBLANCE TO NAPOLEON.

Theodore Roosevelt was a genius in mental quality, something resembling Napoleon. His "2 o'clock" courage, his capacity for enormous labor, his lightning quickness of perception in complicated legal and technical matters, his promptness in action, his eye for what would strike the popular imagination, his facility in coining a stirring appeal in a word or a sentence, his power of attaching men to his cause, all suggest the great French leader.

Mr. Roosevelt earlier than any other public man saw the real issues in this war, and with characteristic courage demanded what the majority thought unwise, intervention by our Government. He urged with a prophetic vision adequate preparation for the struggle he saw about to be forced upon us. He suffered much in mind and soul as he saw things left undone by our Government which he deemed essential to national safety and the performance of national duty. For over or above everything, Theodore Roosevelt was a deeply patriotic American. He had so intensified his passionate love of his country that it was natural in him. By acquiring an intimate knowledge and a profound appreciation of the great sacrificial struggle needed to make her great, he left no doubt of his willingness himself to render the ultimate sacrifice in her behalf. His spirit of patriotic devotion was web and woof of his character.

DEEP PRIDE IN HIS SONS.

He sent his four boys forth to war with the pride of a Roman tribune. Through his father's tears for Quentin's death there shone the stern joy that a son of his had been given to die the death he would himself have sought on the field of battle in his country's cause.

Theodore Roosevelt's example of real sacrifice was of inestimable value to our country in this war. The Nation has lost the most commanding, the most original, the most interesting, and the most brilliant personality in American public life since Lincoln.

Theodore Roosevelt.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ISAAC SIEGEL,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, January 8, 1919.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, to-day the whole world is paying homage to Theodore Roosevelt, the greatest American that this country has had in its midst since the passing away of Abraham Lincoln. He typified real Americanism in every word he uttered and in every deed he performed. Early in life he fought to live and as he grew older he fought for those things which he believed would better the world and those who are living in it. He was a New Yorker in every sense of the term. Born and bred in it, he knew its cosmopolitan population, not from mere observation or study of its people, but from actually sleeping and eating with them.

Few men will forget how he visited at night its sweatshops, first as police commissioner and later as governor and President. His courage at all times won for him a host of admirers, who will cherish his memory for all time. "Fear God and not man" was his advice to some young men who were just actively engaging in politics. He frequently expressed himself on every known subject before the country, and because he only expressed what he conscientiously believed was right, that his opponents were unable to find anything in his writings or speeches with which to confound him.

He never feared to take up the cudgels for the oppressed or the persecuted of the world. His emphatic protests against the pogroms in Russia and his bitter denunciation of the cruel treatment accorded to the Armenians demonstrated beyond words that he was a firm believer in justice for all men.

No American pictured the woes of Belgium or France with greater effect than he. Firm in the belief that we would have to go to war, he wielded his pen in favor of preparedness, and mainly through his efforts the Nation awoke from its lethargy.

He did not merely preach. He acted. He desired to fight as well as to talk. Prevented from going to Europe to help wage the war in person, he sent his sons. The supreme sacrifice made by Quentin Roosevelt undoubtedly hastened his end, but not a single word of grief escaped his lips in public, because he knew that others, too, were grieving.

When we were about to declare war against Germany in April, 1917, I ran across some of his sentiments, which greatly strengthened my views at the time. They are as follows:

We are the citizens of a mighty Republic consecrated to the service of God above, through the service of man on this earth. We are the heirs of a great heritage bequeathed to us by statesmen who saw with the eyes of the seer and the prophet. We must not prove false to the memories of the Nation's past. We must not prove false to the fathers from whose loins we sprang, and to their fathers, the stern men who dared greatly and risked all things that freedom should hold aloft an undimmed torch in this wide land. They held their worldly well-being as dust in the balance when weighted against their sense of high duty, their fealty to lofty ideals. Let us show ourselves worthy to be their sons. Let us care, as is right, for the things of the body; but let us show that we care even more for the things of the soul. Stout of heart and pledged to the valor of righteousness, let us stand four-square to the winds of destiny, from whatever corner of the world they blow. Let us keep untarnished, unstained, the honor of the flag our fathers bore aloft in the teeth of the wildest storm, the flag that shall float above the solid files of a united people, a people sworn to the great cause of liberty and of justice, for themselves, and for all the sons and daughters of men.

No greater tribute can we pay to Theodore Roosevelt than to ponder over his last plea in behalf of America, made on the eve of his passing away to the far beyond. Its words should act as an inspiration to every real American and make him realize that he must do his full duty by the Republic, both in times of peace and in war. It should be read by every citizen and would-be citizen. It should be explained and commented upon in every school and college in the United States. This is the message:

There must be no sagging back in the fight for Americanism, merely because the war is over. There are plenty of persons who have already made the assertion that they believe the American people have a short memory and that they intend to revive all the foreign associations which most directly interfere with the complete Americanization of our people.

Our principle in this matter should be absolutely simple. In the first place, we should insist that if the immigrant who comes here in good faith becomes an American and assimilates himself to us, he shall be treated on an exact equality with every one else, for it is an outrage to discriminate against any such man because of creed or birthplace or origin.

But this is predicated upon the man's becoming in fact an American and nothing but an American. If he tries to keep segregated with men of his own origin and separated from the rest of America, then he isn't doing his part as an American.

There can be no divided allegiance here. Any man who says he is an American, but something else also, isn't an American at all. We have room for but one flag—the American flag—and this excludes the red flag, which symbolizes all wars against liberty and civilization, just as much as it excludes any foreign flag of a nation to which we are hostile.

We have room for but one language here, and that is the English language, for we intend to see that the crucible turns our people out as Americans, of American nationality, and not as dwellers in a polyglot boarding house; and we have room for but one soul loyalty, and that is loyalty to the American people.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER P. SNYDER,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, January 9, 1919.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert the following correspondence:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., October 15, 1918.

Mr. FRANCIS H. SISSON,
Vice President, Guaranty Trust Co., New York, N. Y.

MY DEAR MR. SISSON: A few days ago I received by mail a copy of your address, on September 24, 1918, before the Savings Bank Section of The American Bankers' Association in convention at Chicago, Ill. I assume that the copy was sent me at your direction.

I have read your address with care. I quote the concluding paragraph:

"It is sincerely to be hoped that there may come a larger degree of appreciation of the meaning of transportation in the life of our people, and of the high importance of its fair and constructive treatment. The ambitions of politicians seeking an issue, the selfishness of shippers fighting to save dimes and losing dollars, the prejudices of theorists—the mistakes of the past, and the animosities of the present should not be allowed to interfere with the solution of the problem in the public interest. The public stake in this situation is greater even than that of the investor, and unless railroad investments are protected by the public the public itself will be the greatest sufferer. The need of the hour is sympathetic understanding. Upon that basis alone can a sound future be built for our railways and upon a sound transportaion system alone can we build a sound and prosperous economic life."

In this brief and succinct statement you have epitomized the situation as I see it. Men who, amidst the stress of business and professional cares stop now and then to look ahead, foresee problems of surpassing importance that will confront this Nation when millions of soldiers ground their arms and seek civil employment; and when other millions of workers now engaged in producing the necessities of war turn their attention to the production of the things needed in time of peace. The problem must be solved with as little jar as possible to the active operation of our economic and industrial forces. On the one hand we might have bolshevikism, which is no government, and on the other we might have autocratic power, which is all government. Neither extreme is conceivable as a possible solution of the matter. There is a middle ground where the just rights of the capitalist, the laborer, and the public may be preserved. It is of more importance to the capitalist just at this time to recognize his obligations to the workman and the public than at any other period in the world's history. In order to save to himself his just share of the prosperity that is to flow from the new conditions which the war will bring about he must stand shoulder to shoulder with his fellow man in a concerted effort to put an end to old abuses and wrongs. I think you realize this. You apparently are given to clear thinking, and for that reason I take this opportunity of calling your attention to unjust criticism of the Interstate Commerce Commission which you make in the address before me and which you have made in other addresses.

I can but think that you have adopted statements of others, and have made strictures upon a governmental agency which has for more than 30 years endeavored to consider transportation systems submitted to its regulatory authority with a view to the best interests of the whole public, which of course includes the railroads, the shippers and receivers, and the investors, without that careful consideration of the facts that is generally characteristic of your public utterances.

For example, you stated in your address on September 24 of this year the following:

"It may be flatly stated that the decline in the value of railway securities in the past has been chiefly due to the refusal of the Interstate Commerce Commission and other regulating bodies to permit the railways to charge adequate rates, and under private management of the roads the value of railway securities can not be maintained in the future unless the commission will allow the companies to charge adequate rates."

In April, 1918, you delivered another address in Chicago, in which you said:

"The railroads had not kept pace with the growth of the country and could not bear the added burdens of war. Lack of credit, born of governmental regulation, had wrought this finish. The decline of railroad credit followed the enactment of the Hepburn Act, and the amendment giving the Interstate Commerce Commission power to suspend rates was continued with deadly certainty. Rates moved ever downward, expenses piled ever upward, uneconomic laws and multiplied regulations consumed revenues. Banks and investors looked elsewhere, and the unremitting conflict of the public wrought its own undoing. * * * A lack of understanding and vision on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission and a too ready yielding to political sentiment have rendered it not the constructive friend of transportation which it should be, but transportation's fearful, hectoring keeper."

In this connection I invite your attention to statements made by Mr. Julius Kruttschnitt, the chairman of the executive committee of the board of directors of the Southern Pacific System, while under cross-examination in a congressional hearing in the city of Washington in March, 1917:

"Q. Another thing that you have mentioned several times is the fact that the legislation has hampered the operation of the railroads and thereby affected their credit. Do you believe that the interstate-commerce law, even with its amendments, as a whole has been detrimental to the railroads of the country?—A. No; I do not.

"Q. It has been highly beneficial, has it not?—A. I think so. It has substituted regulation for freedom of action in a great many directions, but there has been compensation, and more than compensation, by the elimination of abuses."

Thus spoke a practical railroad man who has been in railroad service all the years since regulations by the Interstate Commerce Commission began in April, 1887.

From 1891 to date the operating revenue of the carriers has exhibited a marked increase for each three-year period. The figures are shown by the following table:

From 1891 to 1893, inclusive	$3,488,920,612
From 1894 to 1896, inclusive	3,298,902,635
From 1897 to 1899, inclusive	3,683,625,512
From 1900 to 1902, inclusive	4,801,951,118
From 1903 to 1905, inclusive	5,958,503,404
From 1906 to 1908, inclusive	7,355,509,577
From 1909 to 1911, inclusive	8,138,201,597
From 1912 to 1914, inclusive	9,210,930,125
From 1915 to 1917, inclusive	10,253,254,882

The results to carriers from operations are shown by their gross and net earnings. Previous to the year 1910 carriers originated their rates and filed schedules containing them with the commission. The latter had no power to reject or suspend such schedules except for matters of form. In July, 1910, Congress gave the commission authority to suspend the operation of tariffs for a period not exceeding 10 months.

The following table gives the average rate of dividends declared on dividend-yielding stock of the railroads of the country from June 30, 1892, to June 30, 1916, and for the calendar year 1917, the net operating income per mile of road, per cent of property investment as shown by the books of the railroads, per mile for the same period, and the corporate surplus accumulations for each year from 1910:

It will be noted from the figures that at no time were earnings, either gross or net, as great as from July 30, 1910, to July 30, 1917. Considered from the viewpoint of dividend payments, net income to asserted cost, or surplus accumulations, the railroads were never in so prosperous a condition.

In addition to this, the record is that the commission granted increased rates on so-called blanket applications by carriers from July 1, 1910, to July 1, 1917, that augmented their annual revenues by more than $350,000,000. Increased rates were also granted on individual applications in a great majority of instances, the amount of which can not be estimated. Increased passenger fares were also granted by the commission on application by carriers.

I submit to you that there is not to be found from these figures any reason, considering net revenues and accumulations, why the well-located and well-managed railroads of the country should have suffered a decline of credit in recent years.

After the leading transportation systems of the country were taken over by the Government as a war-emergency measure on December 28, 1917, increased passenger and freight rates were put into effect in June, 1918, by the Director General of Railroads, under authority conferred by an act of Congress for the purpose, as stated by him at the time, of insuring their efficient operation under the "high cost conditions that the war has imposed." He referred to enormous increases in the cost of coal and supplies consumed by the railroads, the estimated $300,000,000 increase in wages recommended by the Wage Commission, and additional increases that would have to be granted to other classes of employees. He further stated that—

"On account of these extraordinary increases in operating costs, which have come about as a consequence of the war, it is estimated that for the same aggregate business as last year, and under the same conditions, except as to prices and wages, the operation expenses for the calendar year 1918 will be from $830,000,000 to $860,000,000 more than for the calendar year 1917."

The purpose of the increased rates granted was thus stated to be to meet the exigencies of increases in railroad operation due to war conditions and not on account of anything done by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The fact was that at the time the carriers were taken over they were in receipt of the largest income ever known. The burdens of war conditions called for Federal operation. Nothing that had been done by the commission was responsible for the condition in which the railroads then found themselves.

You refer to the fact that the power to suspend rates given to the commission in 1910 was continued with deadly certainty. The facts are a complete refutation of such a statement. During the year ended December 1, 1917, there passed to the files of the commission 131,810 tariff publications, a large number of them including increases in rates or changes in regulations that produced increased charges; and comparable numbers have passed to the files each year since 1910. From the date of the passage of the act in 1910, giving the commission power to suspend schedules, to November 30, 1917, 2,578 protests against proposed increased rates were considered by the commission. Of this number (1,424 cases) the rates were allowed to go into effect as proposed. Up to said date 1,154 cases were docketed for formal hearing, of which 234 were dismissed because the railroads voluntarily withdrew the proposed schedules; in 283 cases the proposed rates were allowed after hearing; in 188 cases the increases were allowed in part; and in 300 cases the increases were disallowed. Of the total number, 29 protests were withdrawn by protestants, and the rates became effective, and 118 were undisposed of. Practically all the latter have resulted in the proposed increased rates becoming effective in other proceedings.

I note you refer in your address to the decline of ton-mile earnings of the carriers in this country during certain periods. Without entering into any lengthy discussion upon this point I merely suggest for your consideration the following:

Ton-mile earnings are but one indication of the volume of receipts of a carrier, and by no means a controlling one. Ton-mile earnings are affected directly by the quantity and grade of traffic handled and the distance of the haul. In some sections of this country to-day the average ton-mile earnings exceed 1 cent. This average amount of earnings by all carriers, however, is reduced by the earnings on what we may term "low-grade traffic," such as iron ore, iron and steel, lumber, coal, lime, cement, brick, and the like.

In recent years there has been a marked increase in the loading and in the size of cars. Much of these low-grade commodities move in trainloads, both loaded and empty, thus securing to the carrier the largest economies in operation. If you will make your computations base on car-mile or train-mile bases you will reach the conclusion, I think, that the decrease in ton-mile earnings to which you refer is not a true indication of receipts to carriers from business handled.

I invite your careful consideration of the facts here presented. The figures as to gross and net earnings are those supplied by the railroads and the others are taken from the records of the commission. Any institution is properly to be judged by the results of its operations and activities, and the Interstate Commerce Commission is not an exception. The only aim and purpose of the commission has been to carry out the law. In doing so it has, so far as lay in its power, fostered and promoted the free movement of commerce throughout the country and has always considered the interests of the railroads as well as the shipping and consuming public.

I trust you will consider this communication in the spirit in which I write it. I do not occupy the position of a captious critic of your public utterances. My aim is to give you the facts with respect to certain statements you have made, in the belief that they must have been inadvertent. All of this is done in that spirit so well stated in the last utterance of your address, in which you say: "The need of the hour is sympathetic understanding. Upon that basis alone can a sound future be built for our railways, and upon a sound transportation system alone can we build a sound and prosperous economic life."

Very truly, yours,

C. C. McCHORD.

Mr. CHARLES C. McCHORD,
Commissioner Interstate Commerce Commission,

MY DEAR MR. McCHORD: Your letter of the 15th reached me right in the midst of our liberty-loan drive here, which has been the all-engrossing interest and occupation of us bankers, as you may imagine. As a result, I have not had time to carefully read or digest your thoughtful letter, but I want to acknowledge its receipt and assure you that I shall study it with the greatest interest, and I believe open-mindedness.

In approaching this railroad question I have no thought but to see and develop the truth as the proper basis for solving the problem of the future, which we face in it.

Thanking you for writing so fully, I will hope to be able to write you further in the near future. I am,

Yours, sincerely,

F. H. SISSON,
Vice President.

GUARANTY TRUST CO. OF NEW YORK,

Mr. CHARLES C. McCHORD,
Commissioner, Interstate Commerce Commission,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. McCHORD: Since writing acknowledging its receipt I have found opportunity to read carefully your letter of October 15, in which you take exception to the statement made in my recent address in Chicago that the decline in the value of railway securities in the past has been chiefly due to the refusal of the Interstate Commerce Commission and other regulating bodies to permit the railways to charge adequate rates.

I have studied your presentation of statistics as to the earnings of the railways, all of which finally sift down to the return upon property investment. Your argument necesesarily is that this return has been adequate. On this point, which is the crux of the whole question, we differ.

I do not wish to reopen the general argument for higher rates presented by the carriers to the commission in the rate cases of 1910, 1914, and 1917. It appears that the validity of the repeated pleas of the carriers for living rates has been fully substantiated in the action of the Government in advancing freight rates 25 per cent within a short time after the commission had advanced eastern rates by 15 per cent.

From the table on the sixth page of your letter I have taken the figures of net operating income from 1906 to 1917 and have had them shown on the accompanying chart. The rise in interest rates on capital is also shown, and note is made of the 5½ per cent average income of eastern carriers in the three years 1911–1913, which the commission in the Five Per Cent case characterized as below what was demanded in the public interest.

A study of this chart shows that in the decade before the war boom interest rates were steadily rising, but the tendency of railway income was unmistakably downward. During the same period, as was so well stated by Commissioner Daniels in the Five Per Cent case, commodity prices were rising. The railways were being driven into an economic impasse.

In these 10 years (1906–1915) the yield on the investment never reached 6 per cent, and after the 1906–7 boom it reached 5½ per cent in only one year (1910). In the last five years of the decade the average income was only 4.58 per cent, a figure certainly far below what was demanded in the public interest. Commissioner Harlan, in the Fifteen Per Cent case, said:

"So long as we look to private interests to furnish a transportation service for the country we must see to it that the rewards are sufficient to attract capital for its further development.

"Under present conditions this appears not to be the case."

In the last six years, before the Government took over the operation of the railroads, the total amount of new capital for American railroads raised by the sale of stock to the public was only $164,000,000, or an average of less than $28,000,000 a year, when the capital expenditures were averaging $400,000,000 a year.

The public market for new railroad stock vanished because of the alarming decline in net earnings, and the public put its savings into industries showing a larger margin of profit and a more certain future. A great deal of the capital invested in transportation in recent years failed to earn its cost, and this in spite of the fact that American railroad operation led the world in efficiency and economy.

The commission in 1910 very wisely said:

"It is not only a matter of justice, but in the truest public interest, that an adequate return should be allowed upon railway capital."

But the record of net operating income since that time shows (and it seems to me beyond argument) that the commission, while recognizing the necessity of an adequate return to attract new capital, failed to grant the rates needed to earn it. It was because of this that railway credit declined.

I certainly do not wish to criticize unjustly the course of the commission. I believe I have some realization of the complexity of the problems it has had to deal with and some appreciation of the earnest efforts it has made to adjust nicely the balance between the various interests involved; but, nevertheless, I would be concealing my honest convictions if I did not assert, as I have in public addresses, that the serious check to railroad development in the years preceding the war was largely due to the failure of the commission to deal boldly and courageously with this great economic question.

I know that the task of the commission has been greatly complicated by conflicting State regulation and inadequate legislation. Any form of regulation which simply gets on top of the railroads without getting under them also is so manifestly ill-balanced and unfair that it could not be expected to be adequate to the situation.

I have on numerous occasions had the opportunity to defend the Interstate Commerce Commission against unfair attacks, because of my sympathy with and, perhaps, greater understanding of the difficulties of their position. Nevertheless I feel that they, in common with the bankers, the railway executives, the shippers, politicians, and the general public have failed to grasp the factors in the equation with which they were dealing and must in some measure share the blame with the rest of us for permitting the railroad situation to drift on to the rocks of insufficient revenues, insufficient credit, and insufficient efficiency.

I very much appreciate your writing me so fully in regard to the matter, and hope that thoughtful men like yourself may be disposed to address themselves strictly to the working out of this transportation problem in the best interests of 100,000 000 people who are so dependent upon it, for, in the final analysis, that only will be in the interest of others which is in the common interest.

Yours, sincerely,

(Signed) F. H. SISSON.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., November 18, 1918.

Mr. FRANCIS H. SISSON,
Vice President Guaranty Trust Co. of New York,
New York, N. Y.

MY DEAR MR. SISSON: I am in receipt of your letter of November 13 in further response to my letter of October 15.

You say that you have studied my presentation of statistics as to the earnings of the railways, "all of which finally sift down to the return upon property investment." You state that my argument necessarily is that this return has been adequate, and then you say, "On this point, which is the crux of the whole question, we differ."

In the first place, whatever may be my views with respect to this, I did not say, nor do I think that it necessarily follows from anything I did say, that returns to all the railways of the country were adequate. What I endeavored to establish was that under regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission there had been practically a steady, long-continued, upward tendency in the gross and net earnings of railways; that there was the same general upward trend in dividend rates on dividend-paying stock; and that the same was true of surplus accumulations. The figures I presented were not questioned by you, and could not well be questioned by anyone, because they were furnished by the railways.

I invite your attention to the following table, which gives the total railway capital stock outstanding, 1908–1916, excluding only switching and terminal companies, giving also the percentage ratio of net income to stock:

Year ended—	Stock.	Net income.	Ratio of net income to stock.
			Per cent.
June 30, 1908	$7,300,739,273	$443,986,915	6.08

June 30, 1911	8,363,275,892	547,280,771	6.54
June 30, 1912	8,552,447,276	453,125,324	5.30
June 30, 1913	8,599,992,854	544,201,074	6.33

Dec. 31, 1916	8,755,403,517	735,341,165	8.40

The following table gives the relation between the balance of net income, after the deduction of all dividends and sinking-fund charges charged to income of class 1 steam railroads, 1912–1917:

Year ended—	Net income above fixed charges.	Dividends and income applied to sinking and other reserve funds.	Balance.	Per cent.

Dec. 31, 1917	589,044,923	332,811,967	256,232,956	43.5

You will note that, except for the subnormal year 1914, there is the same tendency of increase in the percentages. These two tables, supplementing those given in my letter, further support my contention that regulation by the commission has not had a tendency, as stated by you, to reduce earnings.

If return on property investment is the crux of the whole question, as you suggest, I am inclined to think that with respect to that we do not occupy common ground. The actual investment of the railroads of the country is not known. What we have is the investment as shown by the books of the railroads. That showing, as you must know, is the maximum. Investigation has demonstrated that the actual investment is very much less than is shown by the books. As will appear later in this letter, the book investment of a number of railroads in this country is by no means a reliable basis from which to determine returns. If the book investment is to be decreased by material amounts, of course the returns will be likewise materially increased.

The following table gives the railway operating income compared with total railway capital and investment as shown by the books of class 1 railroads, 1908–1916:

Year ended—	Total railway capital.	Investment.	Railway operating income.	Return on investment.	Ratio of operating income to railway capital.
June 30, 1908	$16,198,731,489	$13,213,766,540	$645,681,895	4.89	3.99

June 30, 1912	18,989,345,476	16,004,744,966	751,266,806	4.69	3.96
June 30, 1913	19,028,535,973	16,588,603,109	831,343,282	5.01	4.37
June 30, 1914	19,401,083,881	17,153,785,568	705,883,489	4.12	3.64
June 30, 1915	19,719,893,944	17,437,666,690	728,212,079	4.18	3.69
June 30, 1916	19,681,193,092	17,684,736,585	1,043,839,822	5.90	5.38
Dec. 31, 1916	19,630,610,082	17,837,624,883	1,100,545,422	6.17	5.63

You will note the marked difference between capital and investment. Of course, it would be unprofitable for you and me to engage in a controversy, in which many good men have taken part, over the right of railroads to earn a return upon outstanding capital, as compared with investment. I wish, however, to again direct your attention to the continued upward tendency of the percentage of returns to support my contention that regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission has not been productive of declining returns, as stated by you. I insist that figures furnished by the railroads themselves show exactly the opposite of your contention.

You further state in your letter:

"It appears that the validity of the repeated pleas of the carriers for living rates has been fully substantiated in the action by the Government in advancing freight rates 25 per cent, within a short time after the commission had advanced eastern rates by 15 per cent."

If you will refer to page 7 of my former letter you will note that the Director General gave reasons why it was necessary to increase freight rates, passenger fares, and baggage charges. Those reasons had not the remotest relation to anything the commission had failed to do. Conditions growing out of the war necessities were the mainspring of the action taken. I invite your attention to another statement made by the Director General when the notice of the proposed increase in rates was given to the public. It is as follows:

"In this connection it is important to make clear that no part of the increase in rates now initiated is on account of the making of additions and betterments or the purchase of new equipment or other expenditures chargeable to investment account. The increases initiated are solely on account of increased burdens tending to diminish railway operating income."

Is it not a significant fact that the leading railroads of the country are apparently perfectly willing to accept as compensation to them for their use during control by the Federal Government the average net operating income they had received under rates in effect for three years previous to July 1, 1917? Am I not fully justified if I take an appeal from your statements and deductions to the railroads themselves?

In your letter you make the following statement:

"In the last six years before the Government took over the operation of the railroads the total amount of new capital for American railroads raised by the sale of stock was only $164,000,000, or an average of about $28,000,000 a year, when capital expenditures were averaging $400,000,000 a year."

The authority for the figures you give is not stated. From reports to the commission by the carriers it is estimated that approximately $392,000,000 of new stock was issued for the five and one-half years from June 30, 1911, or about $71,000,000 a year. Our records show that approximately $400,000,000 a year was expended on capital account during the period. Of this amount approximately $190,000,000 a year was expended from earnings. A comparable amount has been expended from earnings for a great many years.

Turning now to property investment as the basis for returns, we face a very important controversy, about which I express no opinion, as to whether capital investment from earnings should be included when a return is to be calculated on the operation of a public utility. I leave the matter at this point with the suggestion that a determination of that controversy may have an important bearing on the question of the adequacy of the net returns to the carriers of the country.

You further state that:

"I would be concealing my honest convictions if I did not assert, as I have in public addresses, that the serious check to railroad development in the years preceding the war was largely due to the failure of the commission to deal boldly and courageously with this great economic question."

From this I understand that you still adhere to the severe condemnation of the commission you made in the public addresses to which I referred in my previous letter. You do state that on numerous occasions you had the opportunity to defend the Interstate Commerce Commission against unfair attacks, because of your "sympathy with and, perhaps, greater understanding of the difficulties of their position." It has never been my good fortune until now to hear of any such defense. What I do know is that you publicly held the commission largely responsible for the failure of the transportation systems of the country to stand the strain of war conditions, and that in your letter to me you attempt to substantiate statements you have made, and reannounce conviction of their truth.

I have a conviction that the decline of railroad credit in this country and abroad is due to other causes than regulation of freight rates, passenger fares, and other charges by the commission. While it may make this letter somewhat long, I feel I am fully justified in referring to certain other facts which, to my mind, had a controlling influence on the decline of railway credit.

The figures I have given establish that if anything was the matter with the railroads from 1910 to 1917, so far as their credit was concerned, it is to be found from other causes than earnings.

I first call your attention to the situation in 1911, when the first rate-advance cases were decided by the commission. In Advances in Rates—Eastern Case (20 I. C. C., 243, 251), the commission said:

"We are told this increase in rates is necessary to maintain the credit of our railroads, and this claim has been made by high authority and with much insistence. It is said that our railroads owe at the present time large sums, which are being carried upon short-time paper, and which should be converted into funded indebtedness; that other large sums must be had in the immediate future for necessary extensions and improvements; that the money for these purposes should come largely from foreign investors, since the rate of interest in England and upon the Continent is lower than with us, but that at the present time there is, owing to the treatment of our railroads by the Nation and by the various States, a feeling of distrust which has impaired the selling qualities of their securities, and which should be removed by a decision of this case in their favor. * * * It must be conceded, therefore, that railway rates and the treatment of our railways should be such as will make the long-time railway bond, which bears a proper relation to the value of the security, a favorite with the investing public. This record does not disclose that railway credit has been impaired. * * * Comparisons that have been introduced between the selling price of the railroad bonds and municipal bonds would seem to demonstrate that the price of the railroad bond is better to-day, as measured by the price of the municipal bond, than it was 10 years ago, and this would indicate that in the last decade the credit of our railways had gained, not lost. * * *

"As to conditions abroad, no reliable information is before us. Whatever unfavorable impression prevails is due largely to the activities of the railroads themselves. Never before have the net earnings of the railroads equaled those for 1910, estimated on any basis. Never before has the gross amount paid in dividends been so large, nor the average dividend rate as high, as in the year 1910; and yet, in the face of this unparalleled prosperity, the press both at home and abroad has been filled, through railroad influences, with dire forebodings of coming disaster. If the credit of American railways is still sound, either here or in foreign money markets, it is not because of but in spite of declarations of railroad operators."

At that time there was no decline of railway earnings, nor was there any decline in prospect. It may have been a fact that there was somewhat of a decline in the demand for railway securities at home and abroad. Such decline, however, was caused by certain matters that had no relation whatever to earnings.

In 1906 the Congress passed an amendment to the act to regulate commerce which greatly enlarged the powers of the commission and increased penalties for disobedience of its orders. Soon after the passage of the act many of the leading railroads of the country came voluntarily to the commission and asked that the slate upon which was written their sins of omission and commission be washed clean, and they stated in that connection that in the future they would endeavor to obey the law in good faith.

In that year the commission instituted an investigation entitled "In the matter of consolidations and combinations of carriers, relations between such carriers, and community of interests therein, their rates, facilities, and practices." The first report was made July 11, 1907 (12 I. C. C., 277). The investigation conducted to that time related mainly to certain transactions of the Union Pacific Railroad Co., including the acquisition of control of the Southern Pacific Co., the purchase of large amounts of stock of various railroad companies, and other matters of kindred import. In the report a most astounding situation with respect to stock purchases and manipulation was disclosed. It is sufficient here to refer only to the Chicago & Alton Railway Co. In the report, at page 296, is the following in regard to that company:

"In about seven years, to June 30, 1906, the outstanding capital indebtedness of this company was expanded from $33,951,407 to $114,610,937, or an increase of about $80,660,000, and there was expended in actual improvements and additions to the property out of this capitalization only about $18,000,000, leaving an increase of its stock and liabilities, without one dollar of consideration, of about $62,660,000, or $66,190 per mile on the 946.66 miles of road owned by the company on June 30, 1906."

On May 6, 1912, an investigation of New England railroads was undertaken, and a report was made on June 20, 1912 (27 I. C. C., 560). The report refers largely to the New York, New Haven & Hartford and the Boston & Maine. It is not necessary here to refer to but one paragraph in the report, at page 578:

"June 30, 1903, the total capitalization of the New Haven Co. was approximately $93,000,000, of which $79,000,000 was stock and $14,000,000 bonds. The mileage then operated was 2,040 miles. On June 30, 1912, the capitalization, excluding stock premiums, was $417,000,000, an increase of $324,000,000, while the operated mileage was 2,090, an increase of 50 miles.

"The bonds and stock of the New Haven Co. had been during this period ordinarily issued at not less than par; the stock was sold at considerably above par. About $21,000,000 of the stock reported by the New Haven Co. as outstanding had been, in fact, issued to the New England Navigation Co., one of its subsidiary companies, by which it was held, so that this stock is still virtually in the treasury of the parent company. Disregarding this stock, treating its notes and bonds as issued at par, and including the premiums upon the capital stock which has actually gone into the hands of the public, the New Haven received during the nine years under consideration from the issue of stocks and securities about $340,000,000. While the New Haven operated 2,040 miles in 1903, it only owned of this operated mileage 438 miles. During the nine years this owned mileage was increased by about 800 miles, and the New Haven Co. expended approximately $40,000,000 in acquiring this additional-owned mileage. It expended during the nine years something over $96,000,000 upon its railroad for betterments and equipment, making a total of $136,000,000 devoted to its railroad property proper. This would leave the sum of $204,000,000 which in nine years had been expended outside its railroad sphere."

In response to a resolution of the Senate of the United States dated February 7, 1914, the commission entered upon a further investigation into the financial transactions of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co. (Financial investigation of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., 31 I. C. C., 34.) In the report the commission gave in detail the disastrous results to the railroad from shameless financial operations.

Reports were made by the commission in the St. Louis & San Francisco investigation (29 I. C. C., 139), Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific (36 I. C. C., 43), Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton and Pere Marquette (44 I. C. C., 1), and Wabash Pittsburgh Terminal (48 I. C. C., 96).

In other proceedings such matters as the purchase of an interest in the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton Railroad by the Baltimore & Ohio, and the distribution to stockholders of $20,000,000 by the Louisville & Nashville, as examples of many others of like character, were brought to public notice.

These reports disclosed indefensible financiering which resulted in the serious embarrassment of some fine railroad properties. It was shown that certain financial interests, when so minded, freely used carrier organizations for exploitation to any extent necessary to accomplish desired ends. Many of these matters were found by the commission when its accountants came to examine carriers' books under the power conferred by the amendment to the act of 1906.

Shortly after the passage of that amendment the commission recommended to Congress that its jurisdiction be extended to control over and supervision of railway capitalization. This recommendation has been repeated year after year, but Congress has not granted the extension of power.

The increased rates carriers asked for in 1910, 1915, and 1916 would not have had the effect of restoring public confidence in the financial management of the railroads of the country. Conservatively and honestly managed roads suffered with those that had been financially mismanaged. Those who had money to invest lost confidence in the railroad financial management. It came to be generally known that the men nominally in control of many of the roads, and who were capable of handling the properties so as to render the best service to enlarge terminals and to secure facilities for a rapidly growing business, could not act in a free-handed manner. Those who owned or controlled large blocks of stock or other securities were really running the roads. Surplus earnings were largely expended in accordance with their dictation. They knew nothing about, or at least were not specially interested in, transportation requirements of the public. When the time came, as it was bound to come, that the operation of the roads under such conditions failed to meet the demands of the expanding commerce of the country, they found it necessary to lay the blame somewhere, and singled out the Interstate Commerce Commission. As has been shown, that body was not even remotely responsible for any of the financial difficulties in which the transportation systems found themselves.

During the years when their earnings were at the highest point carriers' representatives were informing shippers who desired better service and more facilities that it was impossible for railroads to buy more engines and cars or to enlarge their terminal facilities because the commission refused to allow them to increase their rates. Newspapers took the matter up; magazine articles were inspired; speeches were made at business men's associations; and the propaganda was so general that many people came to believe what was said.

For example, the president of one of the leading banks of the country said in a speech in 1914:

"The most important entry we would make on the debit side of the business outlook would be in connection with the operation and financing of the railroads. In spite of an easy money market, many railroads find it impossible to refund their short-time obligations and continue to keep going—like a juggler playing with balls—by rapidly and dexterously throwing a new short-term obligation into the market to take the place of another short-term obligation maturing. Higher expenses, increased wages, taxes that have doubled in a decade, the burden of new terminals, and the demand for improved service have all had to be met by the railroads, while there has been withheld from them permission to increase their income. The investor now hesitates to consider a long-term railroad security as the safest form of investment for his fund."

On November 18, 1917, he also said:

"We have already conscripted the railroads and are paying them a rate they can not live on. The inevitable result is already apparent—they are inefficient, rendering unsatisfactory service to both Government and the public."

In many addresses made by yourself you took the same position, and you made the statements in 1918, to which I referred in my letter.

The president of one of the leading railroads said, in February, 1917: "* * * But here the heavy hand of regulation has been laid upon the railroads, and the utter lack of elasticity in rates makes it impossible for them to do as other business institutions do."

On January 9, 1912, the president of a great western railroad, in speaking of the decision of the commission in 1911, said:

"The hardest part of the ruling was not so much in what the advance in rates asked for meant to the railroads, as it was in the intimation the decision conveyed that the railroads were getting as high rates as they would be allowed to charge, and that it would be useless to ask for an advance in any line."

Another prominent railroad president in a hearing before the commission declared that he would not advise a friend of his to purchase railroad securities of any kind. Still another prominent railroad president in a like hearing stated that the railroads and railroad securities "had all gone to the d——l."

Other quotations from statements of bankers, brokers, financiers, and railroad officials, from editorials appearing in daily papers and magazines, of which our records are full, might be made to any length. The quotations made are sufficient to show the general trend of public announcement by those best circumstanced to know the facts.

The most discouraging statements as to the waning credit of the railroads from 1911 to the spring of 1917 have been made by their officials and those interested in them financially. Nothing the commission has ever said or done warranted such view of the situation. Is it any wonder the credit of the railroads was impaired? Under such circumstances the result could not have been otherwise.

It seems to me that in consideration of what you think the commission ought to have done you have lost sight of what that body could have done under the limitations prescribed in the regulatory statute. No member of the commission has ever taken the position that the railroads of the country are not entitled to adequate returns for service performed. The commission has endeavored to be just to all interests involved in the movement of traffic throughout the country. My object in writing you was to show you, if I could, that when you held the commission largely responsible for all the ills to which the railroads are now subject you were not justified under the facts.

The Nation faces stupendous problems of reconstruction in the immediate future. A burden of responsibility rests upon us all to see to it that as a result of the world war there shall come a greater Nation and a happier people. Neither consummation can be attained unless all thoughtful men shall accept truth and justice as guides for action. I agree with you that recriminations of old mistakes and abuses, in such connection, can avail naught of good.

It is only with a long pull and a strong pull and a pull all together by men devoted to the country's best interests that a sound future can be assured. This includes as one of the main considerations the fair and just treatment of our transportation systems.

Very truly, yours,

C. C. McCHORD.

How Shall We Operate Our Merchant Marine and Railways?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SIMEON D. FESS,

OF OHIO.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, January 11, 1919.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an address I delivered before the Republican Club of New York City, January 4, 1919, on the railroad problem.

The address is as follows:

"Mr. President and gentlemen of the Republican Club, you have honored me by your invitation to participate in the discussion of a reconstruction program. In what I shall say it must be understood as my individual opinion and not as a party decision.

"There has been running through the press of the country criticism of the Republican Party for not announcing a reconstruction program. It will not be out of order for me to remind the members of this club that the Sixty-sixth Congress is not yet in existence. It has of itself no constitutional power of convention. The President can call it in session at any time after the 4th of March next. If he decides not to do so, it will be nonexistent until December, 1919. Until it can come together and organize, no official announcement, nor any step can be taken on a program of reconstruction. I have no way of knowing whether the President regards reconstruction as an executive or legislative function, or both executive and legislative.

"If, like Andrew Johnson, he regards it as executive, he will proceed on the one-man policy to solve the reconstruction questions, and of course we will be left to wait the constitutional date of meeting.

"Whatever be his views on this matter, I am quite clear in my own mind that the Legislature must be considered in the solution, and it should be in session at work on such as the merchant marine and railway problems, both of which are imminent.

"The present Congress has but two months left to provide for the stupendous appropriations which last year were not passed until late in August. It is simply impossible to do any creative constructive work, such as railway legislation, this session before the Democratic Congress dies. Of course, if we are to pass a mere resolution continuing Government operation for five years, in line with Mr. McAdoo's recommendation, it might be done. I give it to you as my sincere opinion that such a resolution can not be passed, even by this Democratic Congress. If the President wishes an early solution of this rail problem, the one thing that would seem necessary is to call the Sixty-sixth Congress in session, and the solution will be worked out without undue delay.

"Mr. Chairman, our first duty, as I see it, is to unshackle business enterprise by removing all unnecessary governmental hindrances inaugurated in the stress of war. Let the Government encourage rather than retard profitable employment of labor in established industries and in the development of new enterprises. Instead of the Government entering into competition with private enterprise by becoming the chief employer of labor, let it open wide the door of opportunity for profitable business in the investment of capital so as to insure the steady employment of labor on an American wage scale. Such a policy looks to both a domestic and a foreign field of commerce.

"It demands our position on the sea as a merchant-marine power. Heretofore we have neglected this vastly important national arm.

"The necessities of war compelled the construction of sea-carrying facilities to carry to Europe our ability to win the war, and which will serve as the basis for a great merchant marine. It is asserted we have available over 8,000,000 tonnage already. The one great question now is, How shall we operate this agency of commerce? All the world knows the problems of competition on the high seas with Governments which employ the pinnacle of subsidy and low scale of wages. I can not become enthusiastic over the claim that we can by our more efficient methods compete with Japan and other countries of low wages. Will we meet this competition by lowering our conditions of labor and scale of wages to theirs? I think not. The fundamental contention of the Republican Party with the Democratic Party is the protection of American labor against European and Asiatic labor.

"Can we induce them to come to our standards? Hardly. It is their method employed to insure the trade in foreign bottoms which will not be modified in the interest of American bottoms and at the expense of their own shipping.

"Can we compete with them by maintaining our higher costs of operation? I fear not. In the matter of operating ships mere skill can not make up the difference of standards of labor.

"I take it that the first thing for the Government to do is to decide upon a policy which will leave no doubt of our determination to stay on the sea and thus become an increasingly important factor in the carrying of our sea-borne trade. We will certainly refuse to return to the policy of employing our competitors to carry our goods.

"There are three ways open and, as I see it, only three: First, the Government may continue to own and operate the merchant marine as a Government institution. It could establish competitive rates so as to insure the trade carried in American bottoms and at the same time permit the cost of operation necessitated by the higher scale of wages, and charge up the difference in cost which would go to labor to the Treasury. Of course, this is a subsidy, although not so named. It becomes a direct charge on the Federal Treasury to maintain an American wage scale.

"Second, we can lease the ships to steam companies—not foreign, but American—on such terms as to permit if not require the maintenance of the higher standards of labor, such requirements guaranteed by the Government by an obligation to pay out of the Treasury the difference in cost of operation. This is also a subsidy, which, instead of going directly to labor from the Government as labor's employer, goes indirectly to labor through the ship companies, the Government's lessees operating the ships under Government contract.

"Third, we can sell the ships outright to American citizens or American companies upon such terms as can be agreed upon to be run under Government regulation providing for the maintenance of American standards, the difference in the cost of operation here as in the two former cases to be fixed and paid out of the National Treasury.

"The word 'subsidy' has an unsavory sound. It has become identified in the public mind with special and unnecessary favoritism on behalf of capital, and has not infrequently been looked upon as unfair to labor. This is an error. There would be no necessity for subsidy were it not to permit the maintenance of a higher scale of wages.

"We believe in American standards which argue for reasonable hours, sanitary conditions, good pay, and steady employment. To insure these labor advantages in competition with countries which do not employ them we must provide for this difference in cost—subsidize the industry.

"The first method mentioned is neither economical nor efficient. If the Government operates the ships, the cost will always be indefinite and the waste will be inexcusable, as is demonstrated upon every hand.

"The second method, that of the Government operating as the lessor, we still make the Government the responsible body as the title holder, and on whom the appeals will be made. However, I think the second plan is to be preferred to the first.

"But the third, where the Government places the responsibility upon the owner, who will have incentives to successfully operate his properties under such regulation of the Government as to insure the maintenance of American standards, is the most feasible plan. The sum to be paid as a subsidy will be fixed rather than indeterminate, as in the former case, and the real status of the outlay will always be known.

"Whether we choose first, second, or third plan it will be a subsidy. In the first place, it will be very much greater than in the last.

"Subsidies are unpopular, but we must face the alternative of providing this method or see our American bottoms driven from the seas. There is no surer result than this alternative. Believing it to be assured that we will stay on the sea, it remains to be decided which plan we shall adopt. In the interest of economy and efficiency, both of which the public will be willing to pay for, I hope we will adopt the latter.

"I will not now speak of a general program of reconstruction, but at this moment will deal with but one other of the great and imminent problems the war has brought, the railway problem.

"When the war came, notwithstanding the fact we had the finest railway system of all the world, operated on the least expense, giving the most efficient service, it was quite apparent the maximum utility of the rail facilities could not be realized. The one demand was the most complete mobilization of all our energy for a speedy winning of the war. Here was the greatest mileage of roads on the globe, so splendidly located as to answer the needs of transportation. The only item wanting was the authority to utilize the full capacity of the roads. This was lacking owing to the limitations of law best known under the Sherman Act and the interstate-commerce rulings.

"During the period of rail development prior to the nineties the railway management had been guilty of many practices growing out of competition, and later attempted to combine, and in many cases did combine, in their own interests and against public policy. The companies simply demonstrated the well-known industrial axiom, 'Where combination is possible competition is impossible.' On the one hand, combination in restraint of trade as was charged called forth the Sherman anti-trust law. On the other, competition which invited the rebate system called out the power of fixing rates and regulating securities by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

"The Sherman law designed to protect the public clearly prevents the maximum utilization of the roads, which can only be realized by regarding them as one system. When the war came and the most complete use of these facilities was necessary, the one thing demanded was forbidden by the law. To repeal the laws of limitation was impossible under the stress of public opinion, which was pronounced and against combination. The only thing we could do was to ignore the laws by taking over the roads to be operated by the Government. In other words, the Government in order to correct results of its own decrees had to become the operator so as to ignore the decrees.

"There is no doubt that had the Government repealed the law of limitation and permitted the owners to do what the Government had to do, much more successful results all around would have been realized; but since this could not have been done, it is useless speculation to urge that fact, and the contention adds nothing to the solution of the problem.

"So much in explanation of the action of the Government in taking over the roads.

"It will be recalled that Congress after a very heated debate fixed the time beyond which this ownership can not go, viz, 21 months after the signing of the treaty of peace. However, the President can, if he chooses, turn the roads back to the owners at any time. It will be noted the legal limitation is not in turning the roads back, but rather in continuing Government operation beyond a certain time. If Director General McAdoo's recommendation should be adopted, to continue Government operation five years, it will mean new legislation.

"Were it not for the statement of the President in his address to Congress before he left for Europe that he had no solution of the railway problem and would welcome counsel with Congress to reach one, the country would doubtless take the Director General's recommendation to be the President's; first, because it is given out that the recommendation meets the approval of the President, and, second, the President indicated in specific terms that unless Congress did find a solution he would exercise his authority to turn the roads back to their owners without undue delay, which must be interpreted that he would not await the 21 months' limitation, but would act soon.

"This situation immediately presents a serious phase. It is one thing to express an opinion but an entirely different thing to embody that opinion into law. The former is comparatively harmless, the latter is vitally important. As a legislator I am not so much concerned about the former, but deeply in earnest over the latter.

"What should be done with the roads? This question the legislator must answer by his vote.

"The two extremes are, first, absolute private ownership and operation, and, secondly, absolute Government ownership and operation.

"My own judgment fearlessly expressed is, the former is now impossible and the latter is unwise.

"The roads can not be turned back to their owners and operated successfully under the limitations of law as it now stands. The owners know that as well or better than anyone else. The Sherman law compels competition when every consideration of economy and efficiency argues concentration. This law prevents not only maximum service but entails such limitations as to forbid maximum economy as well as efficiency. In addition, laws like the Adamson bill of August, 1916, deny the owners the right of contract to fix the scale of wages they must pay for operation by passing over to Congress, a political body, that power without regard to the contract existing between employer and employee. This virtually takes from the responsible party to the contract the right to determine the cost of operation of his property. While this law was passed to prevent a strike, it was held to be constitutional, which in effect took from the contracting party the right to fix the amount of his obligation; in other words, the cost of operation.

"On the other hand, the Interstate Commerce Commission, exercising its power, denies the obligor to the contract the right to fix the rate of transportation, which is the only source of income out of which must be paid the expense of operation.

"In this way one governmental body, and a political body at that, fixes the outlay and another governmental body, quite readily responsive to political influence, fixes the income, and the owners are left to pay the bills as best they can. The properties must inevitably deteriorate under such handicap and securities must inevitably depreciate. Needed improvements must be necessarily deferred and repairs neglected. Hence, instead of the world's greatest railway system growing with the needs of the rapidly growing country we see depleted roadbeds, deteriorated rolling stock, disintegrated morale, indifferent service, and some phases of disorganization of transportation of such character as best expressed in a breakdown of a service which was once pronounced the most efficient in the world.

"The public mind can not be brought to a repeal of these restrictive laws unless some other safeguards are thrown about the operation on behalf of the public.

"I take it that the laws, hurtful as they are, must stand until superseded by others; hence it is folly to talk about turning the roads back to the owners, as before the war.

"Since they have been taken over the operating expenses have been increased amazingly, partly because the treasury which supplies the money is looked upon as inexhaustible, being the National Treasury, and partly to attempt to rectify inequalities of the Adamson law. Some of these expenses will most likely remain. They will probably be readjusted. The country witnesses the business spectacle of seeing the largest freight and passenger traffic in the history of transportation; the highest rates paid by the public for that traffic; in a word, the greatest income of the business, because of the increased cost to the public and the increased volume of business, with a deficit of at least $200,000,000 to be cared for out of the National Treasury.

"With these facts in plain view, it is absolutely nonsense to talk of private ownership under the existing legal limitations successfully operating the roads.

"What about Government ownership and operation? I am very frank to say I am not satisfied with this proposed remedy, and I will indicate my reasons. I do not oppose it on the ground that the Government has no right in the premises.

"The public has an interest in transportation, for which the roads exist. They can no longer be looked upon as property privately owned, to be operated purely for the profit of the owners without regard to the rights of the public. Hence the public has an inherent right to demand service. Its chief interest is service economically and efficiently rendered. By the first I mean freedom from waste or exorbitant charge through extravagance or other forms of waste. By the latter I mean accommodation, convenience of travel, courtesy in dealing, expedition in execution, accuracy, and security of service against losses, so as to become reliable to the extent that all transportation business can safely be dependable. These items are what the public pays for and has a right to demand. They serve as the basis for the right of public regulation or control, or both.

"As to economy, of course, no man of judgment will say the Government is ever economical. It is the most wasteful and slovenly extravagant in its business operations known to the business world.

"While Government work is usually done on a contract basis, no one pretends to hold the Government to the terms of its contracts, either in time of completion of the work or in the amount to be paid for it. If more time is needed, it is granted. If more money is required, Congress is appealed to and votes the increase without batting an eye.

"A private contract usually fixes the time with a forfeiture penalty, and always fixes the amount to be paid. But a Government contract may name the sum as a matter of form, and when it is exhausted and Congress is asked for an additional appropriation it is granted as a matter of course upon the ground that it is the Government doing its own work and should not be exacting in its demands.

"We hear it on every hand: 'Why not grant it; who will be hurt? Uncle Sam is paying the bills; he won't feel it.'

"This sense of an easy responsibility is displayed upon every hand, where the Government is a party to the contract. Just now, Members of Congress and the public are exercised over the report of the Hog Island investigation, which shows that the contract price, at first fixed at $21,000,000, then raised to $27,000,000, will reach $61,000,000. Here is a discrepancy of $34,000,000 or, expressed in per cent, an outlay which is 300 per cent over the contract price.

"The enormity is not in the fact of this discrepancy but in the ease with which the public will at once dismiss it with the excuse that it is for the Government and why complain. If the outlay was made, it put the money in circulation, we are told. This lack of the sense of economy which naturally and inevitably excuses wastefulness which under private contract would lead to immediate prosecution, is the one outstanding indictment against Government ownership and operation where it can be done through private enterprise. The present rail deficit, in spite of the unusual increase in freight and passenger rates, is only an item to be expected and, of course, repeated so long as the Government operates these utilities. Only recently the Postmaster General recommended $2,185,000 appropriation to purchase aeroplanes for mail service, at the time the country had numerous planes in its possession with no particular use for them. The only explanation forthcoming was: First, the planes already built were not so adaptable for mail purposes, and, secondly, it would cause some confusion between the War Department and the Post Office Department if the planes ordered by the Government for the War Department were used by the Post Office Department. While the House refused the appropriation, after Maj. LAGUARDIA refuted the first ground, it shows the ease with which departments ask for public funds, upon the basis our Treasury is inexhaustible. The significance lies not in the needs and possibilities of the air mail service but the lack of a sense of economy in Government work which would permit a department head to ask for over $2,000,000 for aeroplanes when the Government had hundreds of them already without other use for them and, according to a practical flier, well adapted for mail use. It is a suggestion of the economy we may expect in the various new utilities of telegraph, cable, and phone lines taken over by this department, which, bad as it is, doubtless is no worse than many other Government departments.

"Now, as to the efficiency of Government operation. It may be unfair, I am free to admit, to judge future efficiency by what the traveling and shipping public have had to experience since Government operation has been in vogue. It will not be disputed that the traveling public has never been so shabbily treated. Such qualities of service as accommodation, courteous treatment, expedition in sale of tickets, handling of baggage, and care of travel are lost arts. The present system is intolerable, with little hope of correction so long as Government operation continues. Whose fault it is is not the question. No one feels responsible. The absence of any personal responsibility is best displayed by the general attitude on all sides apparent and expressed in the statement, 'It is the Government that runs the roads, and we are the Government.' If a shipment is lost or articles are stolen, who is it that feels responsible for the loss and who will trace the goods? To inquiries the invariable answer comes, 'We do not know,' with an air that 'We do not care.' If the case is reported, to whom will the report be made, and what greater interest will be found when report is made?

"The air of 'the Government is doing it and we are the Government' is displayed on all hands. The readiness with which our Government avoids responsibility by shunting it to the employers increases this air of popular ownership and 'if you do not like it make the most of it' spirit so prevalent to-day.

"The servility of the Government in the railway brotherhood demand for 20 per cent increase in 1916 has not only increased this spirit of public disregard but has induced a pronounced sentiment for Government ownership among labor circles.

"That event clearly convinced labor leaders that politicians can be more easily dealt with than employers.

"This item introduces the greatest objection to Government ownership and operation. When applied to the railway business it makes possible a political influence the power of which can not be fully understood.

"The 2,000,000 employees represent at least 5,000,000 people; if we include all the people affiliated with the roads, they will reach at least 20,000,000 people, or about one-fifth of our total population. Such interests, if concentrated, could determine any policy they might set out to make. This danger is too apparent to need any comment.

"Take it all in all, I am hopeful we may find a way to retain the private initiative in industry, not only for the basis of rational progress but also for the public good through economy and efficiency, the real basis of prosperity.

"There is now and then heard a proposal of public ownership and private operation; that is, let the Government own the roads, but operate them through companies to whom the roads are leased upon contract. I am not able to indorse this plan as workable.

"My own opinion is that neither complete private ownership nor Government ownership is the wise way. Both of these methods have some virtues. We must find a way which will include the good of the two but avoid the dangers of both. This is the problem. Under Government operation the single-system idea, with common terminals, union ticket offices, employment of short hauls, no matter over which line the traffic goes, are all valuable changes inaugurated by Government operation, which in the interest of the public should be retained. These changes might have been made under private ownership had the laws permitted them.

"Consequently our legislation should permit the roads to pool their properties. This would necessitate amendment, if not repeal, of the Sherman law so far as it applies to the right of the railways to combine into one system under governmental control. The growing demands upon transportation with the tremendous growth of the country will demand new developments of rail facilities, which will entail great outlay of money. It is stated that these betterments demand billions of dollars. This will demand ready market for rail securities. This market will depend upon the prospect of the railway enterprise as a successful business. On the one hand, the properties must be secure for the sake of security holders, and, on the other hand, the public must be secured against fictitious values in watered stock. Hence the Government must be allowed to regulate the issuance of securities and at the same time permit such profit to security holders as to secure a ready market for the bonds. These are simple business principles. It has been suggested that under regulation the holder might be guaranteed a fixed profit of, say, 5 to 7 per cent on his securities. The regulatory feature necessitates Government supervision of some sort to guarantee needed improvements to meet the needs of transportation, without injury to the public either by fictitious values in watered stock or undue charges on the public in the rates of traffic.

"To do this there must be recognized a governmental regulatory function, but it must not reach strangulation, as in the case of some of the rulings of the Interstate Commerce Commission prior to the war. One principle is clear.

"There must be guaranteed by law that the power which fixes the expense of operation must also have authority to fix the income to insure that the two will have a definite business relation. Congress can not fix the outgo by determining the cost of operation and the Interstate Commerce Commission the income from rates. These matters must be left to the business administration, not to political bodies such as Congress or even a commission too responsive to the whims of politicians.

"The roads must not be made the football of politics. Where the roads broke down before was not because of private ownerships so much as through mistakes in Government regulation. On behalf of the public the matter of operating expenses became a political issue, in which contractual relations were not regarded. This must be avoided.

"The most feasible way to secure the importance of private ownership and also Government operation without embracing the dangers incident to both would be private ownership under Government control. This is the order of the day in the industrial world. It is frequently worded 'concentration and control.' The business trend is concentration, and it should be permitted if under proper control.

"This will permit the roads to be returned to the owners, to be operated under rigid governmental control.

"It would necessitate the right of combination of the systems into one or into regional systems, to be operated as a single system. This would demand the virtual repeal of the Sherman law so far as it refers to railways.

"It would also necessitate a national railway administration board, appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to have supervision over transportation in manner like the Federal Reserve Board has over the banking enterprise. The great extent of the American railway field and the wide diversity of interests will necessitate local or regional boards. These regional boards should be articulated with the national board, so as to insure the maximum service demanded by localities. The salary should be enough to invite the country's best talents in the railway world. The tenure should prevent the possibility of the board becoming a partisan body.

"These regional divisions need not be geographical, but rather industrial, to follow the lines of traffic, which would be fairly well marked by the great trunk systems, which were built up on routes connecting great centers of industry.

"The function of the national administration board would supersede the Interstate Commerce Commission, which in that case can be abolished or absorbed without loss to the country of the body of information built up by this commission.

"This scheme would preserve to the system the assurance of economic and efficient service by the stimulus of a profitable enterprise conducted by the owner of the property whose every inducement would be the best and cheapest service and at the same time insure the public against a predatory interest by permitting Government control on behalf of the public against any undue advantage for private gain. It would also guarantee needed improvements and betterments by a ready market for securities of a system permitted under the law to operate on a safe profit. Security holders would have the best guaranty of safe investment of their earnings. The cost to the public would be determined by the cost of operation, both items of which are in the same authority under regulation of the Government. It would at once remove the business from partisan politics as far as a public utility can be divorced from its pernicious intermeddling.

"To make the scheme workable, the most specific way would be to require the roads to incorporate under the authority of the Nation. This would exempt them from State control in the degree that they were interstate in character. While this will provoke some opposition, there should be a way to meet the State objection. If the railway business is to be national, as it surely long ago became, the larger and general interests must prevail over the local and State interests.

"The owners must relinquish the claims that the roads are private property and as such will be run for the profit of the owner. That stage is long past.

"The brotherhoods, and those connected with them, must also relinquish the claim that the roads are run chiefly to employ men at good wages. Both of these parties must concede. Their interests must not be antagonistic; they must be cooperative.

"The roads, although privately owned, with profit as the chief incentive of the ownership from the employer's standpoint, and run by union labor with high wages as the chief incentive from the employee's standpoint, are and must be considered in the light of public interest. The public or third party in the deal must not only be considered, but will in the end become the chief factor in the determination of the policy. This feature alone gives Congress the right to pass rail legislation.

"This feature also justifies the Government in finding a way to adjust the differences between the employer and employee when they can not agree among themselves.

"While the Government may not wish to become a party to either side of the dispute, it must see to it that the roads shall continue to render service. Lockouts and strikes should be obviated. Compulsory arbitration is not a popular remedy; however, it is urged as a last resort rather than permit injury to the public.

"The conciliation method by a governmental board is growing in favor. If this is resorted to it should be made legal, and great care must be exercised in the composition of the board so as to insure the square deal for all parties.

"While the Government is concerned in maintaining the rights of property and should see to it that these rights are inviolable, and also concerned in the welfare of the man who toils and should see to it that his rights are inviolable, yet its larger function is to see to it that the rights of the public are respected. This is the real function of government. It should not engage as a competitor of business when it can be done by the citizens. It should have its chief concern in its ability to keep open to the citizen of the Republic an equal opportunity to make the most out of his talents, be he employer or employee.

"Open the way to the citizen. That means individual initiative, which spells progress. Avoid interference except where it is necessary to do so in order to keep open the door of opportunity or on behalf of the public. Regulation becomes necessary, but it must not be tantamount to strangulation.

"These conditions are based upon the assumption that we will continue our present system of representative democracy—a Republic.

"It is perfectly apparent that Government ownership of railroads is quite consistent with an autocracy like the former German system, where the State counts for everything and the people for nothing. Even in the case of German Government-owned roads, the service could not match in efficiency our system.

"On the other hand, if we are ready to accept the socialist program and thus eliminate private ownership and individual initiative in order to socialize all industry, Government ownership and operation of the roads is the normal thing to do. This policy is consistent with both autocracy and socialism.

"But if we mean to maintain our system of government we will respect the element of private ownership, individual initiative, and personal responsibility in the interest of progress and economic efficiency by permitting concentration, over which in the interest of the public at large we must exercise a rigid Government control. It seems to me the solution of the railway problem lies in this direction."

The $100,000,000 Food Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM J. GRAHAM,
OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 13, 1919.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me I desire to briefly state my views on House bill 13708, the bill to appropriate $100,000,000 to be expended for food for certain populations in Europe. I was ill and confined in a hospital at the time this bill was under consideration and was passed, and hence was not able to state my views upon the measure upon the floor or cast a vote upon the bill, as I had hoped to do.

The bill proposes to give to the President $100,000,000, which he may expend, as he sees fit, for the "transportation, distribution, and administration" of foodstuffs and other urgent supplies to such populations, outside of Germany, as he may select. It further provides that the Governments of the peoples to whom these funds are contributed shall reimburse it "so far as possible."

I have read the hearings and the arguments made in the House on this bill. Practically the only reason for the introduction of this measure and the only reason given for its passage is the communication of the President of the United States, sent by cablegram January 2, and incorporated into the hearings. In this message the President says, in effect, that investigation of the food situations in certain parts of Europe shows that starvation will occur there during the coming winter; he says that there are areas through Austria, Turkey, Poland, and Russia and elsewhere where the people must be fed and will require "our every assistance." He further states that the situation is one of extreme urgency and that he must have an appropriation of $100,000,000 within the next 15 or 30 days to relieve it, to be expended by him where he thinks it necessary.

There is no other reason given for this appropriation except the additional reason given by Mr. W. A. Glasgow, of the United States Food Administration, who stated, at the hearing:

> We also at this time, because of the stimulation of the production of hogs throughout the hog-producing sections of the country have accumulated in the hands of the packers, by reason of the run on hogs at this particular time of the year, a large surplus that we must work off as we can to Europe, and one of the purposes of Mr. Hoover has been, if possible, to provide a safe and regular drain of such edibles as fats, oils, and cereals that we have a surplus of to Europe, with due regard to protecting our own population, by holding control over the export of them.

In the debate on the bill the chairman of the committee was repeatedly asked whether any other nation was to contribute to this fund. It was stated that the other principal nations would do so and were doing so. However, no one knew—not even the chairman of the committee—how much or to what extent any other nation was to bear this burden, or any part of it. The President has not taken anyone into his confidence as to that matter. An amendment to make this contribution contingent on other nations bearing their part of the burden was rejected by the proponents and those favoring this bill, the argument being that the President could be safely trusted to expend the money judiciously. But the question in my mind is whether Congress is justified in delegating to the Chief Executive the duty of expending the funds in the Treasury of the country. If I am not mistaken that is the function of the legislative branch of the Government. The President, of course, will not expend the fund personally—that will be done by Mr. Hoover. Where he will spend it or how, the President does not inform us. Whether we shall pay more than our just proportion, or what our just proportion is, the President does not tell us. He tells us nothing except that he thinks it is necessary. This is not sufficient to satisfy me that I should put my hand into the Treasury of the people and give this money to the President or to anyone else. It must be raised by taxation upon the people, and the people have a right to know, through their representatives, something more of the nature of its expenditure than we know here.

I have voted with the President on every measure he has advanced to make war and to carry it to a successful conclusion. I did not do it because I believed everything he did was right, but I did it because I was unwilling to leave undone any word or act of mine that might help the country in its struggle.

But now an armistice has been signed between the contesting powers and peace is practically at hand. The extraordinary methods of legislation of war times are not longer needed. As we turn to liquidate our debts and pay our bills we ought to scrutinize with care our expenditures. It is not only my right but my duty to know something about how and where the appropriations I vote for are to be expended.

So far as I now can learn, these funds may be expended in Russia, where the rule of the Bolsheviki obtains and chaos and disorder are everywhere; they may be spent, and probably will be, in Turkey and Bulgaria and Austria-Hungary, lately in arms against us and our allies; they may be expended in territories that will hereafter be colonial possessions of England or France or Greece or Italy. The point is, no one knows where they are to be spent except Mr. Hoover, and he does not tell. It evidently is not necessary for Congress to know this. It has been said that Congress has on many other occasions appropriated large sums for relief of suffering. Very true, but in all such cases there was a specific object for such charity. Whether we are to bear the greater part of this burden I do not know. I only know that it is said the other nations are also going to contribute. It is also evidently not necessary that Congress have this information. It also seems to me that it is not necessary to expend this vast sum of money in order to make a "safe and regular drain" for the products of the packers, as Mr. Glasgow says is so essential.

Surely the prices of packers' products are high enough in our country, so high, indeed, that meat has well-nigh vanished from the tables of the medium wage earner of the country. We have a wonderfully rich country, it is true. But let us not forget that in our country there is want and suffering, and that we should not be so lavish in our expenditures as to bring privation upon our own people.

Because I have not sufficient information upon which I might justify my conscience in voting for this measure and for my other reasons above assigned, I can not favor this bill in its present form.

Philadelphia—Second Port.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. HAMPTON MOORE,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, January 10, 1919.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, in view of the pleasantries introduced into the debate on the rivers and harbors bill by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM], who very naturally takes pride in the progress of the city of Baltimore, and because of his editorial friend who challenged the statement that Philadelphia held second place in the United States as a port, I take advantage of the privilege granted me to extend by remarks by inserting the annual report to the Secretary of the Treasury of the surveyor of customs of the port of Philadelphia, in which report the figures and returns speak for themselves.

I am sure the gentleman from Maryland will rejoice with me in the declaration that the contributions which the Government makes toward the development of such ports as Philadelphia and Baltimore assist in making these excellent financial returns possible. It is one of the features of waterway development which some of the opponents of river and harbor bills do not seem to understand, that the Government derives a splendid return upon the investment it makes in cases of this kind.

Before the war the port of Philadelphia turned over to the Treasury of the United States as high as $21,000,000 a year in customs duties. Last year, due to war and other conditions, there was a falling off of $14,000,000, which would seem to be a very good return upon the comparatively small amount appropriated for channel improvement. In order to make commerce productive we must keep the means of transportation available.

PHILADELPHIA'S SPLENDID SHOWING.

The report of the surveyor to which I have referred is as follows:

"OFFICE OF THE SURVEYOR OF CUSTOMS,
"PORT OF PHILADELPHIA.

"The Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, was issued under date of December 2, 1918. From this report and that of the previous year, 1917, the following comparative statement of revenues collected by principal customs districts has been compiled:

Customs district.	Receipts.	Expenses.	Cost of collecting $1.	Number of employees.
New York:
1917	$156,411,447	$4,208,815	$0.0269	2,961
1918	116,963,221	4,494,918	.0384	2,944
Increase (+) or decrease (−), 1918	−39,448,226	+286,103	+.0115	−17

New Orleans:
1917	9,166,214	312,807	.0340	220
1918	9,698,665	330,280	.0340	219

Baltimore:
1917	1,856,923	262,456	.1410	185
1918	1,258,252	268,418	.2130	176
Increase (+) or decrease (−), 1918	−598,671	+5,962	+.0720	−9
Total, all ports:
1918	184,851,356	9,848,388	0.0560	6,582
1917	228,147,659	9,253,980	.0428	6,622
Increase (+) or decrease (−), 1918	−43,296,303	+594,408	+.0132	−40

"The following is the value of exports for the above-mentioned districts for the fiscal year 1918 requiring customs supervision:

New York	$2,616,850,680
Boston	205,189,419
San Francisco	211,874,817
Philadelphia	446,612,168
New Orleans	381,428,110
Baltimore	336,356,608

"These totals show that Philadelphia handled one-sixth as much export trade as New York, which largely exceeds the exports of any of the other districts.

"New York district, where there is a great volume of imports in large units, collected 63 per cent of the $184,000,000 of revenue. While New York collects nearly eight times as much revenue as Philadelphia, nevertheless the cost of collecting $1 at Philadelphia is $0.0044 (almost one-half cent) less than at New York.

"Customs administration at Philadelphia was less expensive than in similar districts. To collect $1 the cost was: Philadelphia, $0.034; New York, $0.0384; Boston, $0.121; San Francisco, $0.121; Baltimore, $0.213; New Orleans, $0.034, same as Philadelphia.

"Philadelphia during the last fiscal year—1918—collected $7,661,253 more revenue than Boston and did it with 247 less employees and at $371,178 less expense. The cost of collection at San Francisco is almost four times greater than at Philadelphia, while Baltimore is over six times that of Philadelphia, and Philadelphia handled $110,000,000 more exports.

"Owing to few imports there was a decrease in the total customs receipts of $43,296,303. Various customs districts show following decreases: New York, $39,448,226; Philadelphia, $455,454; Boston, $1,277,312; San Francisco, $881,587; Baltimore, $598,671, which shows that Philadelphia had the smallest loss in revenue.

	Collected.	Expense.	Employees.
During 1918—
Boston	$7,370,974	$895,880	611
San Francisco	4,201,805	510,230	343
Baltimore	1,258,252	268,418	176
Total	12,831,031	1,674,528	1,130
Philadelphia	15,032,227	524,702	364
	2,201,196	1,149,826	766

"These totals show that Philadelphia collected $2,201,196 more revenue during the last fiscal year than Boston, San Francisco, and Baltimore combined, and at $1,149,826 less expense, also with only one-third as many employees.

PHILADELPHIA'S PREEMINENCE IN DWELLINGS.

Another phase of port development roundabout Philadelphia is the preeminence of the city as a home-owning center. Statistics forwarded to me by the city statistician, before the Government began to erect houses for shipyard workers, are evidences of the substantial growth of the city.

Total number of dwellings in Philadelphia, 365,461.
Two-story brick houses, 217,589.
Three-story brick houses, 114,338.
Four-story brick houses, 4,434.
Two-story stone houses, 2,631.
Three-story stone houses, 8,606.
Four-story stone houses, 309.
Two-story frame houses, 7,954.
Three-story frame houses, 3,606.
Balance of total is made up of houses of various construction.

These homes are largely owned by the mechanic and workingman, who have acquired title to the ownership by years of toil and saving, either in building associations or saving funds.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MILTON H. WELLING,
OF UTAH,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, January 15, 1919.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration, H. R. 13708, is a bill providing for the relief of such populations in Europe, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President of the United States.

It provides for an appropriation of $100,000,000 to be used as a revolving fund to be expended as directed by the President. It is well known that the President has designated Mr. Hoover to act as his agent in administering the law.

I am in favor of the passage of the bill. No satisfactory reason has been assigned by those who oppose the measure why it should not pass. If passed at all, it should be passed now. Time is of the very essence of the matter.

Those opposed to the bill base their opposition upon two grounds chiefly, namely: First, it is contended that Congress is not in possession of the facts which will enable it to act intelligently in the matter; and, second, it is urged that we should do nothing until positive assurance is given that our allies will do their share.

The Congress is in possession of the facts. I call attention to the message already read by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] from the President upon this subject. He states:

[Cablegram from the President, received Jan. 2, 1919.]

Extended investigation and consideration of the food situation in certain parts of Europe disclose that especially the urban populations in certain areas are not only faced with absolute starvation during the coming winter, but that many of these populations are unable to find immediate resources with which to purchase their food. These regions have been so subjected to destruction by war, not only of their foodstuffs but of their financial resources and their power of production and export, that they are utterly incapable of finding any resources that can be converted into international exchange for food purchases. While the Secretary of the Treasury can accept obligations of certain Governments and through these measures their situations can be cared for temporarily, there are still other areas through eastern and southern Europe where such arrangements can not be made. This applies more particularly to the liberated peoples of Austria, Turkey, Poland, and western Russia. In these countries freedom and government will slowly emerge from chaos and require our every assistance. The total shipments of foodstuffs from the United States to all parts of Europe during the next seven months will be likely to exceed one and one-half billion dollars, and from our abundance we can surely afford to offer succor to these countries destitute of resources or credit. The minimum sum upon which this work can be carried on for the next six months in the countries above mentioned will amount to at least $100,000,000 for such services and supplies as we can render, and even this sum contemplates the finding of resources by so much of the populations as can do so and much assistance as can be given by the allied Governments. The high mission of the American people to find a remedy for starvation and absolute anarchy renders it necessary that we should undertake the most liberal assistance to these destitute regions.

The situation is one of extreme urgency, for foodstuffs must be placed in certain localities within the next 15 to 30 days if human life and order are to be preserved. I therefore request that you should ask Congress to make available to me an immediate appropriation of $100,000,000 for the broad purpose of providing foodstuffs and other urgent supplies, for the transportation, distribution, and administration thereof to such populations in Europe, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by me from time to time as necessary. I wish to appeal to the great sense of charity and good will of the American people toward the suffering and to place this act upon a primarily humanitarian basis of the first magnitude. While the sum of money is in itself large, it is so small compared to the expenditures we have undertaken in the hope of bettering the world that it becomes a mere pittance compared to the results that will be obtained from it and the lasting effect that will remain in the United States through an act of such broad humanity and statesmanlike influence.

Mr. Henry White, one of our peace commissioners, in a message addressed to a Member of the Senate, says:

I consider it, therefore, of utmost importance that President's request for one hundred million appropriation for relief be granted at once. Impossible to inaugurate peace conference under proper auspices without previous adequate provision to cope with situation.

Mr. Hoover, in presenting the matter, says:

I need not repeat that strong liberal relief is to-day the only hope of stemming the tide of bolshevism without the expenditure of lives and vast sums on military action. While it is urgently necessary to dispose of our surplus foods in order to relieve congestion and protect the producers from disaster and the consequent chaotic results, it is most fortunate for the saving of human lives that we have this surplus, and our country can not afford to fail to meet both emergencies.

Mr. Lansing, the Secretary of State, a member of our peace commission to Europe, also strongly indorses the appropriation. In doing so he transmits to Congress an estimate of the food products needed by these starving people during the next eight months, as follows:

In view of the famine in Lithuania, Silesia, and Lwow, in order to satisfy the minimum needs of the indigent population of all Poland, with Lithuania, Silesia, 60,000 tons of flour are needed immediately.

There is a need of 45,000 tons of flour per month in January and February and 30,000 tons of flour per month in March, April, May, June, and July, a total need of 300,000 tons of flour. The below-given indicated quantities must be comprised in the monthly needs. The duration of these monthly needs comprises eight months; that is, beginning with January until month of August, inclusively. Six thousand seven hundred and fifty tons of peas, kidney beans, and oatmeal; 5,625 tons of sugar; 1,875 tons of rice; 8,400 tons of preserved meat, above all, lard; 2,250 tons of fish and herring; 600 tons of condensed milk; 15 tons of cheese; 180 tons of butter; 600 tons of vegetable and animal fats; 375 tons of tea; 90 tons of cocoa; 30 tons of pepper; 15 tons of saltpeter. In view of complete exhaustion of all storage, there is a need of clothing, shoes, and underwear for 10,000 inhabitants, counting per person a pair of shoes, 3 meters of material for clothing, and 6 meters of linen. There is a need of medicines and bandages. We will communicate to you on occasion the great necessary quantity of same. For the transport of the above-mentioned cargoes of the ports of Gdansk, Krolewiec, and Libawa, 3,300 covered wagons and 110 locomotives are necessary.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it would be difficult to conceive of a situation where these representatives of the Government would make this unusual request unless the need was conclusive and imperative.

It is inconceivable to me that these gentlemen should have made such a request without having full details before them. It is entirely in keeping also with the peculiar circumstances of the present situation in Europe that it may be unwise at this time to give a fuller statement of the reason which impelled these distinguished gentlemen to ask for this relief.

When the armistice was signed, on the 11th of November, the American people were expending on the war a total sum of $40,000,000 each day. This appropriation represents, therefore, the cost of the war to America for two and one-half days. That is not an accurate statement. Two and one-half days of warfare costs us $100,000,000 in money, but it costs us much more than that. There were the precious lives of American soldiers being lost upon every battle field in France.

It is not difficult for us to realize how the war could have been prolonged. As a matter of fact it stopped with such startling suddenness that we could hardly believe the end had come. This appropriation lengthens the war in point of cost two and one-half days, but the money so expended is intended to save and not to destroy. We have for years watched with horror the god of war stalking like a mad specter through western Europe. I am glad the time has come, largely through the efforts of the President of this Republic, when we can hold out to our exhausted and suffering allies this evidence of our appreciation and support.

It is beyond controversy that the statesmanship of President Wilson shortened the war by many days and without doubt saved thousands of American lives. His action conserved the wealth of the Nation and saved the lives of our soldiers upon the battle fields. He has every right to-day, it seems to me, without question, to come to the Congress and ask that this $100,000,000, the price of less than three days of war, should be expended in the interests of peace.

I have absolutely no patience with gentlemen who pretend that this country is in a condition of want and starvation in any way comparable with the conditions that exist in the stricken regions of southern Europe and the Balkan Peninsula.

America was never more prosperous in the world than it is to-day. Four years ago we owed in Europe $4,000,000,000. To-day the nations of Europe owe America $8,500,000,000. We have in four years largely as a result of the war achieved a trade balance of $12,500,000,000 in favor of the United States of America.

There are no idle men. There are no idle workshops. Labor was never paid so liberally as it is paid to-day.

In view of these conditions, it seems to me to be particularly absurd to compare the conditions of America with the conditions that exist in these stricken countries in Europe.

Besides, Mr. Chairman, we are furnishing this money to buy food for wives and children of men who have died fighting side by side with American boys upon the battle field. These heroic people have contributed as much as any other human beings could contribute to the victory which has been achieved. In most cases their contribution in money and in men has exceeded our own.

It is true that the Government has provided an agency through which we may loan money to Italy and France and England and Belgium, but this money can only be loaned to those governments in Europe who can furnish security for its repayment into the Treasury of the United States.

This money is intended to aid those countries in southeastern Europe who can not be relieved by a loan to the government of the country direct. In Austria-Hungary and in southern Russia and in Roumania new governments have been established, which have broken away from the tyranny of the governments under which they have lived during the war.

These new governments are our allies, but they can not be recognized by the Secretary of the Treasury in advancing funds to European countries for the reason that they have no securities to offer in return. It is to assist these struggling people that the President is asking for this fund to-day.

Without this assistance, we are assured by those who have made a careful study of the situation upon the grounds, there will be anarchy and disorder in place of the orderly development of their national life.

We are told by the President and his advisers now on the ground that bolshevism is spreading westward from Russia through these countries. Bolshevism thrives upon starvation and famine. It seems to me that any thoughtful man will conclude that the very best way to conquer this menace is to turn over to these starving allies food to satisfy the temporary needs of these new nations until such time as they can organize themselves for their own protection and defense.

Gentlemen, there is another reason why this money should be appropriated freely and without question upon the request of the President of the United States. The President to-day stands in a most critical position before the world. Men at home have not hesitated to attack the propriety of his going abroad. His enemies have felt that it was an appropriate time to denounce him and the peace plan which he offers to the world.

Men have with great satisfaction, apparently to themselves, suddenly arrayed themselves against the peace program of the President. They have placed the most powerful weapon their ingenuity can forge in the hands of the reactionaries of Europe by insinuating that Wilson has not the respect and support of the American Congress.

To withhold from the President at this time the full measure of support which he asks would, it seems to me, indicate a lack of confidence in his entire mission abroad. Any political organization which is willing to assume the responsibility of discrediting the President in this crisis can not choose a more favorable opportunity than the present moment nor the present measure in which to bring it about.

I can not believe, Mr. Chairman, that any man would feel jstified in taking such a course. The President of the United States to-day represents America, not a political party. He represents all the people of this Republic, not one-half of them; and the American people, in my judgment, would not approve a partisan assault which threatened the success of his mission abroad and the proper support that should be given to his work for all the people of this Republic.

There should be no delay in making this appropriation. You can not argue with hunger and cold, and these elements added together demand that the millions who suffer should be fed at once. To delay would mean to defeat the very purposes for which the appropriation is to be made.

The bill should pass now. There is still time, in the judgment of the men who represent us in Europe, to assist in establishing peace and to relieve hunger among those who in many instances have offered their lives and the lives of their loved ones to assist us in winning the war.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD E. ROBBINS,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 13, 1919,

On the bill (H. R. 13708) providing for the relief of such populations in Europe, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker, I was unable to obtain time to express my views on the floor on this bill when under consideration, and I avail myself of the privilege of extending my remarks, in order that I may give my personal reasons for voting against this appropriation of $100,000,000.

On the 2d of January the President cabled from Europe making this request:

I therefore request that you should ask Congress to make available to me immediate appropriation of $100,000,000 for the broad purpose of providing foodstuffs and other urgent supplies for transportation, distribution, and administration thereof to such population in Europe, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by me from time to time as necessary.

This is an appropriation to place in the hands of the President $100,000,000 to spend as he chooses, with such population as he chooses, outside of Germany, in Europe. No other information is given us.

While the war lasted I voted consistently for every appropriation of money asked by the President or the administration to prosecute the war. Up to this time the Government has not requested the appropriation of money for any purpose except the prosecution of the war, and although the American people on many occasions have liberally contributed for charity, especially on two occasions—once for one hundred million, and again one hundred and seventy million—both of which were freely given, to the Red Cross in the first instance and the Red Cross and allied charities in the second, we are now asked, for the first time, to embark the Federal Government in charitable contributions.

On the 2d of December the President, in a message to Congress, stated that "the war had come to an end on the 11th of November." Hence, this can not be regarded as a war measure. Nor are we furnished with any plan or scheme that indicates that this expenditure is to be made in conjunction with the other nations who are our allies in the war. I do not deny that there is want and misery in Europe, and especially in Asia Minor among the Armenians, which this bill does not reach, and in Siberia, where our troops are and where want and suffering are apparent on every hand; but I do contend that Congress has no right to appropriate money out of the Federal Treasury to be expended by the President wherever he may desire, or by any other individual, for the purpose of attempting to alleviate these conditions. There is no warrant of law for such action by Congress.

The American Red Cross is the greatest charitable organization in the world. It has only as yet expended a portion of the last $170,000,000 contributed for charitable purposes to relieve the suffering in Europe and Asia and Asia Minor. It should be placed in the entire control of this charitable relief work. This organization has agencies established all over the world. It is familiar with conditions. This organization is in existence and active. If further money is to be sent to Europe—and I would think there should be further aid—I think it ought to be distributed there through this organization. The President has quite enough to do to attend to the peace conference. He has now been in Europe since the 13th of December, and until the 12th of January the peace conference has held no meetings. The greatest service that the peace conference could perform is to promptly settle the matters that are dependent upon it for action and get the people of Europe back into normal conditions and allow them to establish stable governments of their own choosing. Long delay in the peace conference is bad. I can not see how the President can administer this great fund in a way that will contribute to the benefit of the peace conference or to the immediate relief of the peoples alleged to be in want.

It is impossible to send food supplies into Russia, because the Bolshevik and disorderly element generally are in control, and they would seize and confiscate these supplies. It is not the purpose to send any of it into Germany. We have under present conditions been able to take care of Belgium through the Red Cross and other charitable organizations. This is a charitable movement purely, and should be conducted upon a charitable basis by funds contributed for that purpose and distributed through the Red Cross, Knights of Columbus, Jewish Relief Society, the War Welfare Board, and the Salvation Army. These several charitable organizations not only understand the methods, but have the machinery and can distribute funds of this kind fairly and without any expense. They are the proper organizatons to handle all charitable contributions, whether of money or supplies.

I want the President to be relieved of any work or responsibility except that which belongs to the peace commission. It appears to be quite enough to occupy him and his fellow commissioners, and if successfully carried out will be of the greatest possible value to our country and to the world.

I do not believe that free food and free supplies given to the disorderly element of Europe and high-priced food sold to our own people would be conducive to either good order at home or the establishment of stable government abroad. Seventy-five cent bacon to our workmen in our home cities and free bacon to the Bolshevik in Russia or the disorderly peoples in Europe would not accomplish the ends suggested in the cablegram and would not be conducive to peace or quiet either at home or in Europe.

There is one phase of this discussion that has been overlooked, in my judgment. Recently the people of the entire United States have been afflicted with the scourge of influenza. The State of Pennsylvania has ordered a survey at the instance of the Council of National Defense to ascertain the number of orphan children of school age that must be cared for. This survey has been made in part in Westmoreland County, Pa., one of the counties I have the honor to represent on the floor of this House, and over 1,000 orphan children have been found of schoolable age whose parents have died and who must be supported by charity. These are dependent orphans, and must have immediate relief at the expense of the county. Dr. McClintock Hamill, of Philadelphia, who is conducting this survey with the aid of the county superintendent of schools and the teachers in the public schools, has already discovered this number in Westmoreland County, and half the work is not yet done. This will mean heavier taxes upon the taxpayers, and they must bear it, because these are the future citizens of our own country, and to neglect them would be an unheard-of act of cruelty fraught with far-reaching disaster to the Republic.

Recently I read that in New York City children were fainting from lack of food in the schools and that the teachers were giving breakfasts to the little ones under their care in order that they might have bodily strength to remain in school. In yesterday's papers the secretary of the Federation of Labor predicts bread lines before April in the United States. With these conditions at home, I believe that the money in the Federal Treasury should be devoted strictly to the support of the Government and that charities should be carried on, as all charities ought to be, by voluntary gifts of our citizens.

If the President wants $100,000,000 for Europe and gives the facts, I believe the people of the United States will contribute the money and it will be sent abroad as a charitable fund stamped with the love of human kindness and will bear the fruits and carry with it the blessings of all charity that is willingly bestowed.

Therefore, believing it to be our first duty to take care of our own poor and because we have a disorderly element now appearing in the United States which may require attention, I shall vote against this bill in its present form. It would be a different proposition if this fund were to be turned over to the Red Cross and commingled with other charitable funds and by it distributed, but we are without information either as to the facts or as to the purpose for which this money is to be expended or the people who are to be benefited by it or the method or means of its distribution. To vote to take this vast sum of money out of the Treasury of the United States when we have a deficiency in the Treasury at this time—and increasing daily—of over $10,000,000,000 and a liberty loan of six billion to be raised from the people on the 6th of April and a tax bill to collect $8,000,000,000 now in the conference committee, to be enacted by the present Congress, is placing an excessive burden on our people, when economy and care should be exercised, now that the war is over, in the expenditure of every dollar that is taken from the Public Treasury. I believe that the scriptural injunction should be followed in this instance:

But if any provide not for his own, and specially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY A. CLARK,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 13, 1919,

On the bill (H. R. 13708) providing for the relief of such populations in Europe, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary.

Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, an opportunity to speak upon this bill was given to me. I intended to do this, but yielded my time to another. Subsequently, upon request, I received permission to extend my remarks, and I now avail myself of this privilege.

In the discussions it was stated that the enactment of this bill would check the growth of bolshevism; that this could only be done by bullets or bread.

Bolshevism has deluged Russia with the blood of her people; it is rampant in Germany; it is trying to spread its baleful influences into other countries; it has been encouraged by German propaganda, financed by German money. The proof is convincing that Trotsky and Lenine were the paid agents of the Imperial German Government, notably so in the treaty of Brest-Litovsk.

The Bolsheviki have been destroying the very foundations on which law and order rest; have looted without restriction; pillaged, burned, and killed without cause or justification; have committed all the offenses in the calendar of crimes. In their atrocious deeds the fangs and claws of the jungle are disclosed; a dangerous species of rabies possesses them, and its origin does not have any racial limitation; it is not confined to the people of one nation, but flourishes in some of the nations with whom we were recently at war; it especially thrives in Germany and Russia.

The Bolsheviki in their sinister work beget destruction and breed anarchy.

How can they best be stopped, by bread or bullets?

I am not convinced that bread alone is the cure; the hand that feeds strengthens, and by so doing I fear that, figuratively speaking, we are warming the chilled snake that will turn and sting us.

Bolshevism will consume itself by its own excesses. It is already in large measure barred out from the smaller nations, and especially from those now seeking their independence, like the Czecho-Slovaks.

It is also urged that we now send food to countries on the eastern littoral of the Adriatic, and yet we read that at least two of these nations in this section are fighting each other; that one of them had a force of 20,000 armed men engaged in battle against the other. They must have had some subsistence to enable them to do this. Shall we encourage them by giving them food? It has been said that some of the entente nations have been sending supplies to these people. Shall we also contribute? Will it not aid them to strengthen their military activities and to cause a sacrifice of men instead of saving them? From the meager knowledge which each Member has he must decide which is the better under existing circumstances—to give or not to give—to save human life; which will produce numerically the greater result. Fighting among themselves should cease before aid is extended.

This clash of arms in these countries is not helpful to the deliberations at Versailles, to the solving of perplexing problems, to the establishment of a league of nations to enforce peace.

Somewhat similar conditions may be found in other sections for whose relief it is asserted this money is to be expended. It seems to some of us that by so doing we but add fuel to a flame.

There are other matters which demand consideration—our national finances, obligations incurred, and expenditures of the future.

A deficit of $10,000,000,000 presents itself to be raised by bonds and taxation.

The War Department estimates that there is due on orders or agreements lacking some contractual technicalities to companies in this country $1,750,000,000 and to foreign countries $1,883,000,000.

I am in receipt of complaints about unpaid allotments to dependent wives and parents, unpaid insurance risks to beneficiaries, unpaid wages due for months to sound men in service and maimed soldiers in the hospitals.

Of this latter class in one case the facts are that the soldier has been in the service more than a year, was overseas, was wounded in seven different places and had one rib taken away, and up to the last I heard of him, during the present month, had not received any pay since April. A hospital in New York City contains many wounded men who did not have a cent with which to pay postage on letters to their families at home, and have not had any for some time. Almost within the shadow of the Treasury Building are wounded men who have not received their small pay.

Could we not more profitably and patriotically spend our time in devising and putting into law some system by which all this could be quickly remedied, and also for the adjustment and settlement of our own obligations, rather than to wrangle over the proposed relief of the atrocious Bolsheviki?

Our national resources have been drawn on as never before, and we are rapidly approaching the limit of exhaustion.

There was one other feature which appears in the correspondence and discussions not very much referred to, and that was the stabilizing and maintaining of the high prices of food. For this I have little sympathy.

Why $55,000,000 worth of food should be upon the high seas in ships, which can not be used for purposes of relief unless this bill becomes an act, is beyond my understanding. Did this food leave this country without any contracts being made for where it was going and by whom it was to be used? There must have been some agreement or contract made in relation to the purchase of this food. Were these contracts canceled? Who did it? The information obtainable does not give much enlightenment.

An individual having trust funds in his possession is held to a strict accountability by his cestui que trust and by the courts; if he is to invest he must acquaint himself thoroughly with all the information he can obtain; if he is careless or negligent and loses either, he is personally liable or his bondsmen must answer in money.

We are trustees and it is our bounden duty to fully understand what we are doing in the appropriation of the people's money. True, we may not have that pecuniary personal liability that the individual has, but we are answerable to our consciences, our constituents, and the whole country.

The informaton as to how and for whom and the full purpose for which and whether in combination with the entente nations this money is to be used was too meager and not sufficient to bring it up to the standard which governs and is established for individual investment. I therefore did not feel that I could favor the bill and vote by proxy, as it were, for its passage.

I do not wish to be understood as opposed to aiding stricken Belgium or devastated France or some races like the Czecho-Slovaks and others who, though for generations have been subjugated and ground down under the heel of tyranny, have nevertheless held to their own ideals and are now seeking to regain their freedom, establish their own governments, that they may live in accordance with their own national and racial aspirations.

I do not know whither this money is going; I do know from whence it comes. The passage of this bill means in a sense that each Member asks every man, woman, and child in his district to contribute $1. The requests in the past have been urgent and numerous and have met with generous and patriotic response. Additional demands are to follow for the raising of more money. Is it not now a proper time to retrench and stop the contemplated expenditure for purposes of doubtful benefit? It seems so to many of us who are just as desirous for helpful legislation as those who favor this measure.

There are less than a billion and a half minutes from the present moment backward to the hour of the Nativity. It will probably be His second coming if we keep on appropriating billions before the taxpayers can pay the debt.

The Zone Postal Law.

By giving a flat postal rate to advertising matter the Government is assisting the publication of wide circulation to invade the field of the local newspaper and secure advertisements that would otherwise be given to the local paper. It is purely a commercial business transaction in which the public has no interest, and I maintain that it is wrong to tax the people for such purpose. In other fields of commercial enterprise the Government, by its antitrust law, seeks to protect the weak from the mighty. I am willing for all publications to have an equal opportunity in every zone when it is upon the basis of literary merit, but not so when it is upon a business or commercial basis.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH J. MANSFIELD,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, January 15, 1919.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that a preconcerted movement is now on foot by a combination of big publishers to stifle and destroy a most wholesome and salutary law recently put into operation for regulating the postal charges on second-class mail matter; and in view of the further fact that a great deal of propaganda is being circulated throughout the country with a view to deceiving the people and decoying them into a campaign for the perpetuation of the more than seventy million dollar annual subsidy those publishers have been receiving at the hands of the people, I desire to submit a few observations with respect thereto, for which I invite careful consideration.

Many tons of printed propaganda, consisting of editorials and copyrighted articles, as well as in circular and pamphlet form, all misrepresenting the facts, have been sent out to the people through the mails at a rate of postage averaging less than one-sixth the actual cost to the Government in handling such matter. In other words, propaganda for the purpose of deceiving the people into doing themselves an injury has actually been conveyed to them at their own expense, and the law compelled them to bear this burden. We have one notable parallel in sacred history. The Savior of mankind was compelled to bear the cross upon which he was to be crucified.

That thousands of people have been deceived by this propaganda can doubtless be verified by the files in the office of each Member of Congress. I have in my possession more than 100 copies of resolutions purporting to have been and doubtless were adopted by societies and organizations throughout the country condemning the "zone" postal rates. These resolutions were from every section of the country, from Maine to Texas and from Cape Hatteras to the Golden Gate. Upon comparison it will be found that the language employed is identical in every instance, even to the crossing of a "t" and the dotting of an "i," although they may have been adopted and mailed at points 2,000 miles apart. A strange coincidence is that one came from a civic society in the State of Missouri and by the same mail I received copy of resolutions adopted by the press association of that State highly indorsing the "zone" charges.

I have seen many propagandist statements to the effect that the "zone" law was hurriedly enacted and without giving it thorough consideration. I will say in reply that perhaps no other feature of the Postal Service has received as much consideration the past few years. Some six commissions have made the most exhaustive investigations and reports; four Postmasters General have called attention to the heavy losses to the Government on account of the second-class rates; three congressional committees have repeatedly held hearings upon it; the bill was duly considered by Congress; debate thereon was general and covered the whole field. I will simply close this feature of the case with a request to all Christian Americans to remember in their prayer these propagandists, or, rather, "propagan-ders," who stand so much in need of prayer.

I have also received many dozens of letters and petitions signed by hundreds of people asking for a repeal of the law, and deploring the fact that it will be "more burdensome for those far away from the place of publication, while near-by readers escape." The letters almost invariably ask why it is "that in Canada, with only 6,000,000 people, second-class postal rates are just one-quarter of what they are in the United States, and yet the Canadian post office department operates at a profit?" They also ask the question, "Is it not true that the Postal Department shows a surplus, even with the present rates on second-class matter?" The letters also invariably deplore the fact that the law was tacked onto a revenue bill instead of being adopted in a separate bill, and this is designated as an "unjust imposition." These questions having been asked I shall endeavor to answer them.

As to the "zone" postal law being discriminatory against the far-away subscriber, I will say that those who had apprehensions along these lines need have no further alarm. Magazines published in New York and Philadelphia sell at the same prices in Texas that they are sold for in Washington and Baltimore. To make sure of this statement a few days ago I wired to a responsible legal firm in Houston for verification on a few popular publications. I insert my telegram and reply received, which are as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 9, 1919.

GREEN & BOYD,
Chronicle Building, Houston, Tex.:

It is claimed zone postal charges on second-class mail are discriminatory against those far away from place of publication. For purpose of ascertaining the facts, I desire to know price at which a few leading publications are sold in Houston. Wire promptly, my expense, selling price of following: Review of Reviews, Outlook, Munsey's, Leslie's, Collier's, Cosmopolitan, Saturday Evening Post, and Ladies' Home Journal.

The following reply was received:

HOUSTON, TEX., January 11, 1919.

Congressman J. J. MANSFIELD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Review of Reviews, 25 cents; Outlook, 10 cents; Munsey's, 20 cents; Leslie's, 10 cents; Collier's, 5 cents; Cosmopolitan, 25 cents; Saturday Evening Post, 5 cents; Ladies' Home Journal, 15 cents.

GREEN & BOYD.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I will state that on the day that telegram was received the publications therein mentioned sold at the news stands in the city of Washington at the same prices at which they were sold in Houston, although one place was within the first zone and the other the seventh zone under this law. I will further say that the postal charges on reading matter to readers is still under a flat rate in the same manner as under the old law. The "zone" charges do not apply to the reading matter of any publication. Nothing but commercial advertisements have been placed under the "zone" system, and the price of advertising space in the magazines has already been raised to the advertisers sufficiently to cover this additional cost in postal charges, "and then some."

As to the Canadian postal system, it bears few points of similarity to ours in relation to second-class matter. In 1916 Canada handled but little more than 80,000,000 pounds of this class, while we handled more than 1,200,000,000 pounds. As we lost over $70,000,000 on ours, Canada at the same ratio would have lost less than $5,000,000 on her second class. We recouped our losses by an exorbitant charge of 2 cents on letters, when it cost the Government but 1 cent to handle those letters. Canada also recouped a portion of her losses by excessive charges on first-class mail; but still, having faced a deficit in 1915 of nearly $3,000,000, she levied a war-stamp tax which restored her postal system to a paying basis for that year.

The official report of the postmaster general of Canada for the year ending March 31, 1916, shows that the net revenue amounted to $18,858,409.93, while the expenditures were $16,009,138.77, leaving a surplus for the year of $2,849,271.16. The report also shows that for the year 1915 the department was operated at a loss of $2,914,541.90, the receipts for that year being $13,046,649.57 and the expenditures $15,961,191.47. The surplus for 1916 is explained on page 15 of the report, in which it is shown that the great increase in revenue in the department was due to a war-stamp tax which became effective April 15, 1915, and which increased the receipts to the extent of $6,672,127.62.

A tabular statement published in the report shows that the department was operated at a loss from 1869 to 1901, inclusive, a period of 33 years; and from 1902 to 1914 (the first year of the war) the receipts slighty exceeded the expenditures; but in 1915 the deficit was approximately $3,000,000, and was only restored by the heavy war-stamp tax put into effect on April 15, 1915, as stated.

On June 18 of last year Hon. John C. Koons, First Assistant Postmaster General, at my request, wired the postmaster general of Canada for a statement as to the volume of second-class mail handled in the Dominion the previous year. Some time later I received a letter from Mr. Koons, transmitting the reply, as follows:

JULY 5, 1918.

Hon. J. J. MANSFIELD,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MANSFIELD: I am handing you herewith for your information copy of a letter recently received from the deputy postmaster general of Canada, in which he gives the amount of newspaper and other publications handled by their department during the year 1917.

Sincerely, yours,

J. C. KOONS,
First Assistant Postmaster General.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, CANADA,
Ottawa, June 26, 1918.

SIR: With reference to your wire of the 18th instant, in which you ask to be advised as to the number of pounds of newspaper and other publications handled by this department as second-class matter during the year 1917, I have the honor to inform you that the approximate weight of newspapers and other periodicals transmitted by post in Canada during the year above mentioned is as follows:

	Pounds.
Daily papers	55,108,890
Weekly papers (free area)	5,400,000
Weekly papers (outside free area)	21,847,050
Monthly papers, etc	1,976,400
Total	84,332,340

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,

R. M. COULTER,
Deputy Postmaster General.

FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., U. S. A.

It will be observed from this statement that very few, if any, magazines are admitted to the second-class rates in Canada. The statement mentions "daily papers," "weekly papers (free area)," "weekly papers (outside free area)," and "monthly papers, etc." The "etc." in the last item contains the only possible magazines, and this item amounts to less than 2,000,000 pounds. If the entire item had consisted of magazines, and if the Canadian Government had carried them through the mails free of any postal charge whatever, its loss on account thereof would have amounted to but little more than $150,000. It bears no comparison whatever to our magazine mail, we having carried nearly 700,000,000 pounds an average distance of more than 1,000 miles and at a loss to the Government of approximately $40,000,000. In this connection it should be borne in mind that more than 50 per cent of the weight of these magazines consisted of advertising matter on which the publishers received a profit, and would have received a profit even though they had paid the entire cost of their transportation through the mails.

The Canadian Government exercises a rigid censorship over the mails by which her losses on second class are materially curtailed. We have no such censorship, nor would it be acceptable to the people of this country. On account of this censorship it is practically impossible to get magazines admitted to the second class in Canada, and totally impossible to do so in England, as the publishers have testified. The Curtis Co. has tried repeatedly to have the Ladies' Home Journal admitted to the second class in Canada, but without success. The same company, after much difficulty, finally succeeded in getting the Saturday Evening Post admitted, but as the Canadian law forbids publications that carry double-page advertisements the Saturday Evening Post must of necessity pay a higher rate of postage on those issues containing advertisements of that size.

Canada also through her censorship, and under authority of law, places a heavier postal charge upon advertising than upon reading matter. For instance, newspaper supplements are not permitted to carry advertisements at all; in the United States supplements usually consist almost entirely of advertisements. In Canada a newspaper or periodical must "consist wholly or in great part of political, or other news or of articles relating thereto, or to other current topics." In the United States the average of advertisements is shown to be more than 50 per cent, and in many instances runs as high as 92 per cent. Such publications in Canada are placed in the third class and under a rate of 1 cent for every 2 ounces or fraction thereof.

Under the Canadian law subscriptions obtained by offering premiums or those obtained at a nominal price are not permitted to the second class, but pay at the rate of 1 cent for every 2 ounces or fraction thereof. In this country millions of pounds of literature are sent through the mails for a mere nominal subscription price, the big publishers using their large subscription lists as a leverage for obtaining advertisements at enormously profitable figures, and using our postal system as a means for distributing those advertisements for their individual profit. By this means they can place their publications in competition for advertising within the zone of circulation of every country newspaper, and keep the country editors' "nose to the grindstone." The country editor can not compete with the big publisher because his field of operation is necessarily within a limited zone.

I desire to insert in the RECORD a letter written by me to Charles Johnson Post, director of the Publishers' Advisory Board, from which it will appear from the evidence there quoted that the big publishers desire the flat-rate system so as to enable them to invade, at Government expense, the zone of every country newspaper. I desire to call attention, in this connection, to the testimony taken before the Ways and Means Committee on June 28, 1918, where the same design is disclosed. Also, to the letter of the Sanders Publishing Co. to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY], where this language is used:

> We do object, however, to this zone proposition, which discriminates all the time in favor of the local sheet as against papers of broad national character.

Mr. Speaker, the noble work done by the country newspapers during the great war certainly entitles them to our best consideration. While some of the publications "of broad national character" were whining about the war-revenue bill, the "local sheet" was publishing whole pages for the cause of the Red Cross, the sale of war savings stamps, and liberty bonds, as well as assisting the councils of national defense in helping to win the war, all of which was done patriotically and without charge. It is their cause, sir, that I would rise to advocate instead of cringing to that element of the press that during the war undertook to make the Nation's cause subservient to its own interests.

Mr. Speaker, Canada is beginning to realize the great imposition that has been heaped upon her by the nominal rate on her second-class mail, notwithstanding the fact she is protected from its effects largely by her censorship. Her burdens, though light as compared to ours, are, nevertheless, being felt. Mr. A. D. Smith, who was for many years undersecretary for the post-office department of Great Britain, in the work published by him in 1917, which is regarded, as I am informed, as the greatest authority on postal matters in Great Britain and Canada, in speaking of the Canadian newspaper rate, says:

> In well-informed quarters it is held that, in general, the leniency shown to newspapers is not due solely to the acceptance by Parliament of the arguments usually advanced in their favor, plausible and convincing as they are to many minds, but has also been dictated by fear of the political power wielded by them, or, what is the same thing, as a result of direct pressure at Ottawa by the newspaper proprietors, based on their influence with the electors, or the chiefs of parties, and exercised in their own interests.

From this it will be seen that the postal concession to the publishers in Canada was granted to them mainly on account of their political influence.

Mr. Speaker, because we have levied an exorbitant rate on letters in order to cover the losses to the Government on second-class mail, the publishers are taking advantage of it to show to the country that the department is now self-sustaining. I, for one, am opposed to taxing one branch of the Postal Service to pull another branch "out of the hole." Each branch should be as nearly self-sustaining as circumstances will reasonably permit, but no branch of the service should be required to pay more than is sufficient to cover its own cost. "Each tub should stand on its own bottom." I realize that some branches of the Postal Service can not be made self-sustaining, but the deficit in such cases should be raised in some other form of taxation and not by taxing one branch of the Postal Service for the benefit of another branch.

I was to-day informed from the Post Office Department that about one-third the volume of our mail consists of the second class, but that it produces only one-thirtieth of the revenue received. During the 10-year period ending with 1917 first-class mail in the United States produced revenue to the extent of $1,350,000,000 and cost only $750,000,000, leaving a clear profit to its credit of $600,000,000. During the same period second-class mail produced revenue to the extent of $85,000,000 and cost $800,000,000, leaving a clear loss to the Government of over $700,000,000. Even our great and growing parcel post, the volume of which was nearly 2,000,000,000 pounds the past year, produced a revenue of nearly $74,000,000, an amount sufficient to cover the cost to the Government of this most valuable branch of the service.

I respectfully submit, Mr. Speaker, that a postal rate on any class of mail that exceeds the cost of handling that class is contrary to the theory of postal service and can not be defended upon any ground other than as a necessary war measure. Under our postal rates from 1885 to 1918 a double rate was charged upon letters in order to obtain money to pay the cost of transporting and handling magazines for the big publishing companies, whose business would generally have been profitable even if they had been required to pay their own expenses.

I am inserting here a letter received a few days ago which is self-explanatory and to the point. It is as follows:

SHERMAN, TEX., January 1, 1919.

Hon. J. J. MANSFIELD, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Will you pardon the intrusion of a thought of a Texas taxpayer? We are not referring to the taxes levied by the county assessors nor the taxes collected by the Internal Revenue Department or any of the usual forms of proper taxes.

We refer to the discriminating tax of approximately a thousand dollars annually which I and my associates pay merely because we are free users of first-class postage.

We are not objecting, and do not regard the actual cost of handling these letters by the Post Office Department as a tax, but we are thoroughly convinced from the figures compiled and given out by the Post Office Department itself that the 3 cents on the envelope is approximately apportioned as follows:

1. One cent to cover cost of handling, which we gladly pay.
2. One cent for war tax, which we gladly pay, because the money has been spent for the benefit of humanity. We presume, however, that with the closing of the final peace treaties that this war tax via postage stamps will be reduced or removed.
3. One cent which we pay as a subsidy to publishers of second-class matter. They do not pay sufficient postage to cover cost of the service rendered by the Post Office Department to them. We object to this. It is no more right that my special business be taxed for the benefit of another's special business than that he should be taxed for my benefit. This brings me to the point: We hope in the pending legislature that at least the zone rates on advertising sections of second-class matter will be increased sufficient to cover the cost of the service.

Very truly, yours,

FERGUSON SEED FARMS.
By A. M. FERGUSON.

In 1885, when second-class mail was given the flat rate of 1 cent per pound, we handled but 60,000,000 pounds and only 5 per cent of it was advertising matter. Now we handle approximately twelve hundred and thirty million pounds, over 50 per cent of which is advertising matter. The volume has increased in compound proportion, and the cost to the Government has kept pace with it. The people have been paying the expense of handling thousands of tons of the most trashy literature imaginable, much of which ought never to have been printed.

It has been shown that on account of our flat postal rates on literature, a large majority of which is of a trashy character, we have descended to the bottom of the scale among civilized nations in the publication of good and useful books. Switzerland, Japan, Germany, France, England, and other countries have gone far ahead of us in this respect, Spain alone of the European nations being in our class.

As to the exception taken to the law because it was a part of the revenue bill instead of being a separate measure, I would like for the intelligent gentleman who embraced this in his propaganda to explain to the public wherein it makes any difference to them as to who introduced the bill or which committee reported it. Both the Ways and Means Committee and the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads acquiesced in it. To the public it is immaterial; to the publisher it is simply a question as to whom he would prefer to have the privilege of "cussing," the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] or the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON.]

The publishers in their opposition to a legitimate raise in postal charges on second-class matter have not been consistent. In 1914, when the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was investigating the matter under the recommendation of the Hughes commission for an increase of 1 cent per pound flat rate, the publishers protested against this increase and advocated a zone system. Now, since the zone system has been enacted, they are protesting against that and claiming that the flat rate should be applied. Again, when Maj. Stahlman, of the Nashville Banner, was before the Senate committee, he claimed that the charges provided in the zone law were excessive in the near-by zones, while in the remote zones they covered but a very small percentage of the cost of transportation. The magazine publishers claimed that the law did not affect the local newspapers, the charges being so slight in the near-by zones, while in the remote zones they were prohibitive. In my judgment, all were mistaken, the charges are not excessive or prohibitive in any zone, and one of the publishers was candid enough to admit that the raise was so small that the additional revenue derived therefrom would not be worth the trouble.

Again, Mr. Speaker, there has been much camouflaging about this matter, a notable example of which was exposed before the Ways and Means Committee last June by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY], a distinguished member of that committee. A paper known as the Woman's Farm Journal, published in St. Louis, for which it was claimed that it had a circulation of 100,000, had just ceased publication, claiming that the zone charges then about to be applied would be prohibitive. It published its farewell editorial, or "swan song," as follows:

This is the last edition of the Woman's Farm Journal. It has had a short life, and under ordinary circumstances would continue as a useful, educational, patriotic publication. But conditions are not ordinary. We are at war, and nearly every unavoidable condition operates against us. We could overcome all difficulties except one. That is a law which goes into effect July 1. The law is made up of provisions that we do not intend to attempt to comply with, and we could not comply with them if we earnestly tried to do so. In this particular instance we will not say what we think. We are at peace with all the world except the enemies of the country. We believe the law which we refer to will be found unworkable and that it will be modified. For the Woman's Farm Journal that will be too late. We prefer a sudden death to a lingering one. Therefore, we will simply say that the Woman's Farm Journal has been put out of business by act of Congress.

The gentleman from Illinois was ready for the occasion with a sample copy of the paper in his pocket, and with a full statement concerning it. From this statement it appeared that the paper was established after the zone law was enacted and went out of business before it went into effect. Only 620 pounds of the paper went through the mails in three months, the postal charges upon which, at the rate of 1 cent per pound, could not have exceeded $6.20 during that time even if every copy had gone beyond the limits of St. Louis County. The paper contained but one advertisement—that of the Conroy Piano Co.—for which it claimed to have received $40. As the zone law does not apply to any paper or magazine unless more than 5 per cent of it is devoted to advertising, this paper would not have been subject to this law at all. On account of this exposition made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] the "propaganders" have doubtless been deprived of making further use of this case. Doubtless a booklet would have been issued upon it but for his timely interference.

A copyrighted article published a few weeks ago makes the claim that, because of the campaign made by the publishers, 59 Members of the Sixty-fifth Congress who voted for the zone law failed of reelection. If this claim be true, it is but another reason why the tremendous political power of the recipients of this great subsidy should be curbed. Each State or district should have the right to select its own Representatives, who should not be required to submit their candidacies to a combine of persons perhaps 2,000 miles away who are interested in a share of a nearly $100,000,000 annual subsidy paid by the people.

Mr. Speaker, some of the great publishers have been proceeding upon the theory that with their "big stick" they can force Congress to do their bidding. Those who have stood out for the interests of the people have been maligned and misrepresented in every way possible. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], "the latchet of whose shoes" his calumniators are "unworthy to stoop down and unloose," has been the especial object of their spite. Failing in their purpose, they have given the assurance that he should no longer suffer at their hands if he would only give his consent to a repeal or even postponement of the zone law. In fact, they were willing not only to quit maligning him but to boost him as no other man has ever been boosted, even to the extent of "making him the biggest man in America."

Although they set him upon a pinnacle and tempted him as, with one exception, perhaps, none other has ever been tempted, following an illustrious example he was callous to their blandishments, evidently "choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season."

Mr. Speaker, we see much in the papers to the effect that the pending revenue bill as amended is an abandonment of the "zone" system. Such is not the case. It reduces the charges, but the "zone" feature is not only retained in the bill as it now stands but it is even extended to include reading matter as well as advertising matter. The "propaganders" who have written so many theses in opposition to the "zone" feature on advertising, claiming that a great principle was involved in it, are now giving their approval of the pending bill with the "zone" feature not only retained upon advertising matter but also extending to the literary portion. This simply shows their inconsistency. If the zone feature is wrong on advertising matter, it is doubly wrong if it is also applied to the reading matter.

As an illustration of the workings of the low flat rate on second-class mail under the act of 1885 I will call attention to the enormous growth of this class and the corresponding increase in the loss to the Government. When the flat rate went into effect we handled about 60,000,000 pounds.

In 1890 it was, in round numbers, 200,000,000 pounds; in 1900, 450,000,000 pounds; in 1910, 873,000,000 pounds; in 1917, 1,200,000,000 pounds; in 1918, 1,229,709,355 pounds.

The estimated loss to the Government in 1885 was $4,000,000; in 1890, $12,000,000; in 1900, $27,000,000; in 1910, $52,000,000; in 1917, $72,000,000; in 1918, $85,879,654.

The department estimates the total loss of the last six years at $500,438,224. Is it not time to begin to consider this question seriously? It is already a tax of nearly $1 per capita on every man, woman, and child in the country. But, Mr. Speaker, this tax is paid by those who send letters through the mails and is not levied as a per capita tax. Every time a letter has been mailed 1 cent of the cost of the postage stamp went to the publishers, and but for this letters would long ago have been subject to a charge of only 1 cent in postage.

LETTER TO CHARLES JOHNSON POST.

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 17, 1918.

Mr. CHARLES JOHNSON POST,
Director Publishers' Advisory Board, New York City.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of August 29 is before me and gives me my first information that my recent letter to Mrs. N. Goettmann, of Byers, Tex., had, at my request, been forwarded to you for reply.

I wrote Mrs. Goettmann in reply to a communication received from her in regard to the postal "zone" charges on second-class mail. I suggested in the letter that she had been made the innocent victim of a most "pernicious propaganda," sent out by a combination of big publishers, and requested that in the event she should desire to submit my letter to those who had sent her the propaganda that caused her to write me I would be pleased to be furnished with their reply. As you, without being accused, acknowledge to being the one so referred to, I will not take issue with you on that score.

I must admit that I was somewhat surprised at your letter, not only on account of this admission but also on account of other statements made, as well as from your manner and tone of expression. Having referred to the copy of my letter, I find nothing in it calculated to offend anyone. Then why you should have used two pages of vituperative and opprobrious language in reply can not be accounted for upon any other theory than that of a self-consciousness that your contention was not sustained by reason.

I stated in my letter to Mrs. Goettmann that Congress had not increased the postage on second-class mail from 50 to 900 per cent as stated in the printed "propaganda" sent her (and of which you now confess you were the author). A 900 per cent raise would be an increase of the postal receipts on that class of mail from $11,383,000 to $113,830,000, or a clear raise of more than $100,000,000 per annum. In speaking of it on the first page of your printed "propaganda" you said:

"This terrific increase means that in thousands of homes hundreds of readers will have to give up reading national periodicals owing to the enormous increase in cost."

You now modify your language in regard to this feature of the bill, which as expressed in your letter is as follows: "The postal 'zone' law does make increases in postage on periodicals of from 50 to 900 per cent." This language conveys a meaning entirely different from that used in your "propaganda." A bill that raises the postage on publications 900 per cent means a raise of more than $100,000,000, while a bill that makes raises of 900 per cent may provide a very small sum of money.

The experts of the Post Office Department estimate that the entire raises provided in the bill for the present year will amount to only $4,900,000, which is less than one-twentieth of a 900 per cent raise. No publisher has disputed these figures, but all have acquiesced and agreed to them. The bill provides for annual increases on advertising matter for a period of four years, but no expert of the department has estimated the ultimate raise to exceed $16,000,000, and the highest raise possible under this law will be less than one-sixth of a 900 per cent raise. You have never attempted to dispute these figures.

When you appeared before the Ways and Means Committee last June you were requested to name a publication that would have its postage raised from 50 to 900 per cent, but you were unable to do so. You did finally admit that the figures used in your propaganda applied to advertisements only. When questioned specifically as to the Ladies' Home Journal, your answer as recorded on page 1415 of the hearings is as follows:

"Nine hundred per cent does not apply to the Ladies' Home Journal, but I represent the trades publications as well, and they are publications that carry an enormous amount of advertising. That is their function, and those publications do carry such rates."

In this connection I will remind you that Iron Age, one of the trade journals embraced in the list which you claim to represent, and which is listed on the reverse side of the paper on which your letter was written, sold a few years ago for a bonus of $1,000,000, as shown in the evidence taken before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads in 1914. Another one, the Motor Age, which was capitalized at $30,000, made a net profit in one year of $40,000, and then sold out for $1,000,000, as disclosed by the hearings before the same committee.

The advertisements in the two trades journals above referred to were carried in the mails at a loss of thousands of dollars to the people, while the publishers made millions out of those advertisements in a very short time. The publications consisted of approximately 80 per cent advertisements camouflaged with 20 per cent reading matter, and you now ask that such bundles of business advertisements be permitted to be carried through the mails at the rate of 1 cent per pound, when it costs the Government 9 cents per pound to handle them, and this special privilege is asked on the theory of their educational value.

You quote from my letter as follows: "The publishers testified here that it (the Saturday Evening Post) averages in weight a fraction less than one-half pound." Then, in commenting upon that you say: "This also is a misstatement, for nowhere have the publishers or publishers' representatives testified to any such thing, and your statement is out of whole cloth." You then further say: "As a matter of fact, the Saturday Evening Post averages slightly less than 1 pound per copy."

You are very positive as to the testimony of the publishers of the Saturday Evening Post, and evidently intentionally disrespectful. After reading the evidence possibly you may not be quite so certain. I quote from page 59 of the hearings before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads in the month of February, 1914, the following:

"Mr. SMITH. For instance, we pay 5 cents a copy for the Saturday Evening Post. Now, if we increase the rate 2 cents a pound, what would be the rate?

"Mr. CURTIS. I do not know—probably 6 cents. That is a very awkward and a very inconvenient sum.

"Mr. ROUSE. About what is the average weight?

"Mr. CURTIS. I think a half a pound.

"Mr. COLLINS. It is a trifle less than a half a pound."

Mr. Curtis mentioned in this record is president of the Curtis Publishing Co. and Mr. Collins is its circulating manager. The Saturday Evening Post is published by that company. If your statement is true and they are mistaken as to the weight of the Saturday Evening Post, then it is very evident that the Curtis Co. owes the Government a very large amount of back postage, as it appears that they have been paying on the basis of less than half a pound in weight.

The Curtis Co. publishes the Saturday Evening Post, Ladies' Home Journal, and Country Gentleman, as you as their representative well know. The same publishers testified that they paid the Government $600,000 a year as postage upon these three publications. They also stated that the Saturday Evening Post had a circulation of 2,125,000 and the Ladies' Home Journal of 1,670,000. You stated in your testimony before the Ways and Means Committee that the Ladies' Home Journal averaged 1 pound and 4 ounces in weight, and you state in your letter that the Saturday Evening Post "weighs slightly less than a pound." The weight and circulation of the Country Gentleman is not given.

According to the figures given by you, each monthly issue of the Ladies' Home Journal will weigh 2,087,500 pounds and each weekly issue of the Saturday Evening Post "slightly less" than 2,125,000 pounds. This will give us a total weight for the year of more than 25,000,000 pounds for the Ladies' Home Journal and approximately 110,000,000 pounds for the Saturday Evening Post, or a total of about 135,000,000 pounds a year for the two publications.

The postage at 1 cent per pound would have amounted to approximately $1,350,000 a year. As the Curtis Co. paid less than one-half that amount on all three of the publications—the Country Gentleman in this calculation being simply thrown in for good measure—it is very evident that if your statements are correct the company owes the Government many millions of dollars.

Under the old rate of 1 cent per pound it was in the interest of the Curtis Co. to have their publications admitted to the mails at as light an estimated weight as possible. For the purposes of your "propaganda" it serves your purpose better to have them appear as heavy as possible in order to make it appear that an enormous burden will be heaped upon them by the new law. This conflict in interest possibly accounts for the discrepancy in your statements.

Still, both of you may possibly be correct. Messrs. Curtis and Collins were speaking of the Saturday Evening Post in 1914, while you were speaking of it in 1918. It has doubtless grown considerably since 1914; but if it has, it is on account of increased advertising matter and not increased reading matter. No number, however, contains less than 50 per cent advertising matter. Mr. Curtis also testified that the standard for reading matter was 32 pages, and that when it ran up to 60, 80, or 90 pages it was due to increased advertising. I quote from his testimony on page 51 of the hearings in 1914 the following:

"And here is another thing about advertising—the amount of advertising. This has been brought out several times. Of course, you see it in the trade papers more than in our publications. We have a standard. The Saturday Evening Post standard is 32 pages for a nickel. We can not afford to give more than that, and you will find most of your numbers, you who buy the publication, that they are running from sixty to eighty-odd—84 and sometimes 90 pages. The way that is done, the advertising comes in that we can not accommodate in 32 pages; every 4 pages costs so much, and if there is advertising enough to cover the cost of 4 pages, we add 4 pages; and if there is enough to cover 8, we add 8, 16, and so on; so that we pass that on to the subscriber, who gets so much more for a nickel. But there is also given so much more reading matter. These people complain so much about the reading matter, and they are under the impression that a certain amount of reading matter has been taken away to make space for advertising, whereas, as a matter of fact, the advertising is simply added."

I merely used the Saturday Evening Post as an illustration. So far as my purpose was concerned, the weight was immaterial so long as the ratio of reading and advertising matter was the same. To consider it a pound would serve my purpose equally well.

The purpose of my illustration was to show that the literary portion of a magazine is now actually delivered to the reader at a less cost in postage than it was under the old law. Magazines average 50 per cent reading and 50 per cent advertising matter. Assuming that the Saturday Evening Post weighed half a pound and that the reading and advertising matter was 50–50, then the subscriber received but one-fourth of a pound of reading matter each week, but it required one-half cent to pay the postage on it, for the reason that there was attached to it and inseparably delivered with it one-fourth pound of advertising matter upon which there was no segregation of the postal charges, and in order to get the one he was required to pay the postage on both, assuming your statement to be correct that he pays the charges on it "from cover to cover."

Under the new law the rates on reading and advertising matter have been separated. The magazine publishers have already raised on the price of advertising space sufficiently to cover the increased postage on the advertising matter. Consequently the reader (or the public for him) has only to pay the postage on the reading matter. While the ultimate rate on the reading matter will be 50 per cent higher than it was under the old law, the volume he pays upon will be reduced 100 per cent, which, in effect, is equivalent to a 50 per cent reduction on the postage rates to each subscriber or reader of a magazine. Therefore, no magazine should increase its subscription price on account of the new postal rates; rather, it should be reduced.

You say that I am very bitter against advertising. You have misunderstood me. I am the friend of the advertiser, and believe that you should perform the service for which he pays you. It is for you to say whether or not you have been loyal to him. You admit that the 282 publications you represented before the Ways and Means Committee last summer were dependent almost exclusively upon advertising, yet you recommended that a heavy flat tax be placed upon advertising, in lieu of the lighter tax placed upon it by the "zone" postal rates.

It was not to the interest of advertisers for such a tax to be laid, and with a little thought it is not difficult to determine your purpose. The kind of a tax you recommended could not have been paid by the local newspapers and would have resulted in giving the publications with a national circulation a complete monopoly in the advertising field, although this monopoly would have been paid for by the advertisers and by the public.

The lowest rate for advertisements in the Saturday Evening Post before the recent raises was $4,500 per page for each issue, or $234,000 a year. A local paper would not get over $200 a year for running such an advertisement. The tax you recommended was to be applied alike upon all publications. A tax of $10 a week upon such an advertisement would be nothing to the Saturday Evening Post, but no local paper could afford to pay it. Then, with the cheap flat postal rate you recommended, the publication of a national circulation could be delivered in every community as cheaply as the local paper.

You insistently contended that the "zone" charges on advertising was a discrimination against your publications, which were of national circulation, and in favor of the papers of local circulation. I will give a few excerpts from your testimony. On page 1348 of the hearings for June 28, 1918, you are reported saying as follows:

"This postal 'zone' law is a slightly disguised discriminatory tax upon advertising. It discriminates against national periodicals and their advertising pages through postal charges and in favor of publications of local circulation, upon whom is laid not one penny of postal charge or advertising tax.

"The periodical publishers do not oppose an advertising tax, but they do demand that under the constitutional right of equal treatment through legislative enactment that if a tax upon advertising is laid it shall be laid equally upon all publications carrying advertising, and not single out, solely for advertising taxation, those periodicals of national circulation and favor those of local circulation by complete exemption."

Then, on page 1352 is the following:

"Mr. MOORE. I did understand you to suggest a tax on advertising?

"Mr. POST. We did suggest a tax on advertising—an equal tax on all advertising, bearing equally on all forms of advertising, and not discriminate against certain publishers.

"Mr. TREADWAY. Be a little more explicit.

"Mr. POST. I shall be glad to if I know what you have in mind.

"Mr. TREADWAY. You say bear equally on all. Do you mean large and small or the big publications of wide circulation?

"Mr. POST. The publications that carry advertising. All advertising carried in publications should be taxed evenly on the amount of advertising they carry—that is, according to the unit. And billboard advertising should be taxed.

"Mr. TREADWAY. Before you touch the billboard. On space or the wideness of the circulation?

"Mr. POST. On space. Well, I tell you it is absolutely immaterial, because the terms are interchangeable. If you lay it on space, I suppose it is more valuable in one way.

"Mr. HAWLEY. Why not gross receipts on advertising?

"Mr. POST. That is one way.

"Mr. TREADWAY. I want to understand what you mean by equal distribution to all.

"Mr. POST. That is what I want. Equal distribution is simply to have it paid equally by all.

"Mr. GARNER. You favor a flat rate instead of the zone rate?

"Mr. POST. Absolutely."

On page 1424 of the hearings for June 29, 1918, appears the following:

"The CHAIRMAN. You think that is a good answer from your standpoint?

"Mr. POST. It is not complete. Now, then, this law puts a tax, or whatever you choose to call it, on periodicals of national circulation and exempts periodicals of local or comparatively small circulation from any impost whatsoever on their advertising pages, and a discrimination comes in in this law in favor of the periodical having a local circulation. If it is attempted to raise the price on advertising, he can offer a given unit of circulation cheaper, and impost free, to advertisers in his publication than can a publication of general circulation if he attempts to pass that advertising charge on to his advertisers. That is the reason that it can not be done."

Near the bottom of the same page in reply to a question of the chairman you are reported as saying:

"Mr. POST. They can if you will tax all classes of advertising, all classes of publications, on the same basis, and not put a discriminatory tax on papers of large circulation in favor of papers of small circulation."

On pages 1897 and 1898 of the hearings of July 12, 1918, the record shows the following:

"Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Post, I do not know whether I got the statement correctly. I have just come in. Did you say that the New York Tribune was the only newspaper that advocated the zone system?

"Mr. POST. No; my recollection is that I said it was the only newspaper in New York. That was my statement.

"Mr. LONGWORTH. I did not know how broad your statement was.

"Mr. POST. Oh, no; because I can tell you that there are 15,000 papers of very local circulation which think that the postal-zone law is a grand thing, because it is going to give them discrimination for their own advertisements as against periodicals, and who state that with perfect, absolute frankness. I would like to read that, because it is perfectly naïve.

"Mr. GARNER. Just to be perfectly fair, all of these papers advocating the zone system do not advocate it on that ground.

"Mr. POST. I think that is a fair statement.

"Mr. GARNER. Many of them advocate it on the ground that in fair dealing and justice and equity with the American people no business in this country ought to be subsidized; that no business ought to lean on the entire people for its prosperity; and you, by your argument, and these gentlemen this morning, have shown that you are leaning on the Government and the people, because if the Government should collect from you what it costs the Government to furnish these facilities for the transportaion of your publications, you would not be quite so prosperous as you are now."

Practically the whole of page 1899 is along this line, and then on page 1900 is the following:

"Mr. CRISP. I unfortunately did not hear all your former testimony, and you may have answered this question: Assuming that Congress feels like there should be some increase made in second-class postage rates, which would you prefer, a flat rate with a tax on all advertising, or a zone rate, as is now the law?

"Mr. POST. A flat tax of any kind. The objection to the zone rate is that it is a discriminatory rate against periodicals of national circulation, and their advertising pages or columns, in favor of periodicals, weeklies, or dailies of comparatively local circulation who, as this paper from which I have read very plainly indicates, will be able to make a less charge for their advertising or subscriptions for the periodicals they name."

Mr. Neal, the treasurer of your propaganda fund, and who was placed upon the witness stand by you on July 12, even opposed the free-in-county circulation given to the local papers. His language as recorded on page 1860 of the hearings of July 12, 1918, is as follows:

"Mr. NEAL. Of course, you know the Government does carry free county mail at the present time. I do not know the principles upon which that action is based. I assume that it is considered that the country newspapers are of sufficient value to the county residents to make it easy for him to get it in the county. But I have never favored that absolutely free rate, personally. I speak now only in my individual capacity. I believe that a nominal charge should be made, but I believe, also—and in this I am stating the position of my organization—that whatever charge is made should be on a flat-rate basis."

Mr. Neal follows this up on page 1861, and also on page 1871 of the hearings. Mr. Collins, of the Curtis Co., represented by you, also opposed giving the local papers free-in-county mailing privileges. I quote from his testimony before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads in February, 1914, on page 63, the following:

"The CHAIRMAN. Right there, while you are on that county-paper business. Do you think that ought not to be free?

"Mr. COLLINS. I think not; no, sir. Mr. Hughes, the chairman of the House committee, stated he did not think it ought to be free, and I think that is quite generally the opinion of the people who have looked into it.

"The CHAIRMAN. That it ought not to be free?

"Mr. COLLINS. That it ought not to be free."

Mr. Collins further criticized the free-in-county to the local papers in his testimony on pages 64 and 65 of the hearings.

This testimony proves conclusively that your real purpose is to put the local papers out of competition with yours in the advertising field, in order that you might fall heir to the whole of it. The periodicals you represent are carried through the mails an average distance of 1,200 miles, while newspapers are carried an average of 255 miles. As this average includes all the big dailies, the average of the country paper would probably be less than 100 miles. Still you demand the right to transport your advertisements from New York to Texas at Government expense for the same flat rate the local Texas papers would pay, in order that you might compete for business that of right should belong to those local papers. Under this system, your publications have been reaping millions, while the local papers are struggling for a bare existence. In this connection it should be borne in mind that those local papers are continually engaged in the upbuilding of their respective communities, and do advertising free of cost, that if carried in your publications would cost thousands of dollars. Your publications do nothing for the improvement of any particular community in which they circulate.

You state that my letter contains so many inaccuracies that it ought to be submitted to the Ways and Means Committee. In reply will say that the manner in which that committee handled your propaganda embraced in the little handbook entitled "Readers' Defense League" shows that its members are most competent to deal with such questions. As the incident seems to be fresh in your memory, it is evident that you have been impressed with the ability of that most important committee.

You are very much mistaken in assuming that Mr. KITCHIN admitted that the postage on the reading matter of magazines would be greater to the people of Texas than of New York and other eastern places. The hearings do not show anything of the kind. You know very well that the reading matter is under a flat rate in the new law, and is the same all over the United States.

Paragraph (4) of your letter contains the following:

"You state in conclusion and as an argument that the present postage charge on schoolbooks and Bibles—under post-office regulations and resulting from the laws passed by Congress itself—is excessive."

Permit me to say in reply that my letter contained no statement to that effect when it passed into your possession. I have not seen it since, and can only take your word as to its present contents. The carbon copy in my possession is silent upon that point. However, under the old law Bibles and schoolbooks were under the "zone" system and given a rate of $160 a ton from New York to San Francisco. At the same time many millions of pounds of advertising matter carried in the periodicals you represent, and consisting principally of such things as advertisements of talcum powder, swan down, tooth paste, cigarettes, and Pears soap, on account of their supposed superior educational value, were given a rate of only $20 per ton.

Not only were those advertisements given that low rate to San Francisco, but after reaching the Golden Gate they were taken for an 8,000-mile sea voyage without additional charge in order that they might take the place of schoolbooks in the education of the young Igorots and used instead of Bibles in the conversion of the inhabitants of the Sulu Archipelago. Under the new law, which you condemn (and for the defeat of which the undisputed evidence before the Ways and Means Committee shows that you expended more than $26,000 on your propaganda), the educational and civilizing value of schoolbooks and Bibles is recognized, and the ultimate rate upon them to the eighth zone will be less than that on advertising matter.

On pages 12 and 13 of the little booklet you sent out you give quotations from President Wilson at the time he was governor of New Jersey. You placed them under the heading: "What President Wilson Thought of the Vicious 'Zone' System." Yet, in all the language quoted, the "zone" system is not mentioned. I find that the principal postal legislation under consideration at the time was the proposed flat increase from 1 to 2 cents per pound, as recommended by the Hughes commission. By placing President Wilson's language under false headlines you doubtless deceived a great many people temporarily.

If President Wilson was opposed to the "zone" system, as you state in the headlines, there is certainly nothing to indicate it in the language quoted. In any event the present "zone" system was not in contemplation at that time. This law puts nothing under the "zone" system except that portion which has been commercialized, and in this respect is entirely different from any other "zone" law ever enacted, and not subject to the criticisms that have been heretofore made of putting reading matter under zone rates.

You stated in your propaganda that Lincoln abolished the "zone" system as applied to second-class mail in 1863. You also repeated this in your letter to me. In your testimony before the Ways and Means Committee last June you labored for half a day in your efforts to show that Washington, Lincoln, and President Wilson were all opposed to the "zone" system. You finally admitted that the only evidence you had as to Mr. Lincoln was the mere fact that he signed the bill abolishing it, which you said was sufficient evidence that he was opposed to it. You were then reminded that President Wilson signed the bill which reestablished it, but you contended that the rule would not work both ways.

Now, all this claim about Washington and Lincoln is really amusing to anyone who will go to the trouble to look up the history of the question. Washington is really the father of the "zone" system for second-class mail. It was established under his administration in 1792, when he signed the first act of Congress that placed magazines and newspapers under a "zone" system of postal charges, in which the then limited area served by mail was divided into two zones—one under, the other over 100 miles. In the act of May 8, 1794, he extended the system, creating a third zone for magazines as contradistinguished from newspapers. By this act he recognized that magazines were not entitled to the same mailing privileges that should be accorded to newspapers, a discrimination against the class of publications you represent, that is not made in the present law, of which you complain.

As to Mr. Lincoln, history fails to show that he ever had anything to do with the question of the "zone" system as applied to second-class mail. There is no record that he either advocated or condemned it, nor did he ever sign any law abolishing it, as claimed by you. The act of 1863, of which you speak, did nothing more with second-class mail than to slightly reduce the rates, that class having been taken out of the "zone" system nine years before Mr. Lincoln was inaugurated. The act of March 3, 1851, seems to be the last law regulating the rates by zones on second-class matter, and these zones were abolished by the act of August 30, 1852, when Mr. Fillmore was President.

Mr. Lincoln's administration was during a period when the most bitter sectional feeling prevailed, and whilst I am from the section where the feeling against him was the most bitter, yet, in behalf of his memory, I respectfully submit that he is not guilty of the act with which you charge him. I am,

Yours, very truly,

J. J. MANSFIELD.

Act of March 4, 1917, Granting Pensions to Certain Texas Volunteers Who Defended the Frontier of Texas.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS L. BLANTON,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 20, 1919.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the act of March 4, 1917, granting pensions, among others, to certain Texas volunteers and surviving widows of such volunteers who defended the frontier of Texas against certain Indian depredations, provides:

That when there is no record of service or payment for same in the War Department or Treasury Department the applicant may establish the service by satisfactory evidence from the muster rolls on file in the several State or Territorial archives.

Unfortunately for Texas, when the State capitol burned a number of years ago some of these particular muster rolls and evidence establishing this service were destroyed by fire. However, such rolls and evidence which survived the fire from time to time during the past eight months have been sent to the Pension Department here in Washington by the adjutant general of Texas for direct inspection.

Commissioner Saltzgaber lately appointed a special committee of experts out of the Pension Department to pass on this evidence, and such committee has filed its report, showing the particular organizations in Texas which come within the provisions of the act of March 4, 1917, and which do not, and the reasons therefor, as follows:

REPORT OF COMMITTEE TO HON. G. M. SALTZGABER, COMMISSIONER, BUREAU OF PENSIONS.

Mr. COMMISSIONER: In compliance with your request of the 31st ultimo, your committee has considered the pensionable status under the act of March 4, 1917, of the surviving officers and enlisted men of the Texas volunteers who served in defense of the frontier of that State against Indian depredations from January 1, 1859, to January 1, 1861, inclusive, and from 1866 to 1877, inclusive, conclusions being based upon examination of the different muster rolls, reports from the Auditor for the War Department, and historical facts gleaned from the old papers accompanying said muster rolls and the history of the State of Texas.

Mr. Speaker, it will be noted that the provisions of this act are not broad enough to include the mounted volunteers and rangers of 1859 and 1860 who served against Mexicans and not Indians; Tackitt's Company of Minute Men, who were paid for more than 30 days' service in 1865—a year not covered by the provisions of the act—but for less than 30 days in 1866; and McNelly's Washington County Company, which served against Mexican bandits, cattle thieves, and robbers, and not against Indians.

I sincerely hope that this Congress will so amend this act as to include the above, and also to permit of parol proof to establish service where the muster rolls have been destroyed by fire.

That portion of the act relating to Texas is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions, limitations, and benefits of an act entitled "An act granting pensions to survivors of the Indian wars"—

And so forth—

be, and the same are hereby, extended from the date of the passage of this act to the surviving officers and enlisted men of the Texas volunteers who served in defense of the frontier of that State against Indian depredations from January 1, 1859, to January 1, 1861, inclusive, and from the year 1866 to the year 1877, inclusive; * * * the campaign against the Kiowas, Comanches, and Cheyennes in Kansas, Colorado, Texas, Indian Territory, and New Mexico in 1874 and 1875; * * * and also to include the surviving widows of said officers and enlisted men who shall have married said survivor prior to the passage of this act: Provided, That such widows have not remarried: Provided further, That this act shall extend also to the surviving officers and enlisted men of the organization known as Tyler's Rangers, recruited at Black Hawk, Colo., 1864, for services against the Indians: Provided further, That if any certain one of the said campaigns did not cover a period of 30 days the provisions of this act shall apply to those who served during the entire period of said campaign: Provided further, That where there is no record of enlistment or muster into the service of the United States in any of the wars mentioned in this act, the record of pay by the United States shall be accepted as full and satisfactory proof of such enlistment and service: And provided further, That all contracts heretofore made between the beneficiaries under this act and pension attorneys and claim agents are hereby declared null and void.

SEC. 2. That the period of service performed by beneficiaries under this act shall be determined by reports from the records of the War Department, where there is such a record, and by the reports from the records of the Treasury Department showing payment by the United States where there is no record of regular enlistment or muster into the United States military service: Provided, That when there is no record of service or payment for same in the War Department or Treasury Department, the applicant may establish the service by satisfactory evidence from the muster rolls on file in the several State or Territorial archives: And provided further, That the want of a certificate of discharge shall not deprive any applicant of the benefits of this act.

Consular and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE EDMUND FOSS,
OF ILLINOIS,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, January 22, 1919.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I greatly regret that the House did not see fit to adopt the rule making in order that provision in this bill which provides for the purchase or erection of suitable embassies and legation buildings in the principal capitals of the world and consular buildings at the principal ports of China.

Some years ago we entered upon the policy of building such buildings. The distinguished governor of my State, Gov. Lowden, when he was a Member of the House, introduced and was instrumental in securing the passage of an act known as the Lowden Act, which became a law on the 17th of February, 1911, during the short session of the Sixty-first Congress. This bill authorized the Secretary of State to acquire in foreign countries sites and buildings for the use of diplomatic and consular establishments of the United States and to alter, repair, and furnish such buildings. It provided that not to exceed $500,000 shall be expended for these purposes in any one year and that not to exceed $150,000 shall be expended in any one place. Now, this bill passed the House on the 17th day of February, 1911, under a suspension of the rules, which necessitates a two-thirds vote. The vote was more than this, however, the ayes being 141 and the noes 39. While there was a demand for the yeas and nays, yet there were not a sufficient number of Members opposed to it to secure such a vote.

All this clearly indicates that the House was exceedingly favorable at that time toward the establishment of diplomatic and consular buildings, and if it had an opportunity to vote at this time for this provision, after reasonable debate, when all the facts could be brought to the attention of the Members, I feel confident that the provision would carry, because it is a reasonable proposition and in continuation of work already begun. It simply provides that an appropriation of $3,000,000 be expended in the purchase and establishment of embassies in the most important capitals of Europe, with a limitation of $250,000 at each place, but in cities containing a million or more inhabitants the limit of cost shall be $500,000.

This, as it will be seen, modifies the Lowden Act so far as relates to this appropriation of $3,000,000 and allows the establishment of these buildings at an increased cost, inasmuch as it is impossible at a cost of $150,000 at each place to purchase or establish suitable embassies or legations in the principal capitals of Europe. This has been carefully investigated by the State Department, and real estate values have been found to be too high to come within the limitation, which will have to be raised if our country provides its own buildings in the foremost capitals.

Great Britain, France, Italy, Germany, Austria, Spain, and Russia own their embassies in almost all the principal capitals of Europe. Some of the foreign countries, as is well known, have very fine embassies here, and it is the duty of Congress to provide for our ambassadors and ministers in such a way as will comport with the rank and dignity of the country which they represent.

We have been too parsimonious in our appropriations for the Consular and Diplomatic Service. We do not pay our ambassadors enough. We have forced them to pay out most of their salaries in renting suitable residences, which ought to be provided by our own Government. It is safe to say that nearly every ambassador who has gone abroad in recent years has been obliged to spend a great deal more than his salary, and in many cases two or three times as much. It is a singular thing that the salaries of our ambassadors to the countries of Great Britain, France, Germany, and Russia were fixed by law at $17,500 44 years ago by the act of March 3, 1875—copy of which is hereby submitted in a letter addressed to me by the Director of the Consular Service—and has never yet been changed. We have increased the salaries of everybody else that I can recall since them—in some cases more than once. We have increased the salaries of Members of Congress, Federal judges, and Justices of the Supreme Court, the Vice President, and President, but the salaries of our ambassadors to these four great countries remain the same.

No one can afford to take these positions, whatever may be his ability, unless he is a millionaire or a man of large means.

Mr. William J. Bryan, speaking of this condition in our Diplomatic Service, said:

> It is not in harmony with our theory of government to have an important branch of the public service open to rich men only, and that is the case under the present system. No poor man can afford to accept an appointment as an American minister or ambassador to any of the principal countries of Europe, and as the years go by the expenses of the diplomatic residences will become greater as the value of urban property increases. * * * Our Government ought to be in a position to select from the whole citizen body those most competent for the work to be intrusted to them, and it goes without saying that efficiency in public service is not measured by the amount of money which an official has either inherited or accumulated.

Mr. Bryan further says:

> The standing of our Nation abroad demands that our ambassadors and ministers shall live in a style in keeping with our ideas, and extravagance is as offensive as parsimony. By owning its own embassy buildings our Government can regulate the standard of living and entertainment of those who represent it at foreign courts. There is no doubt that our Nation must ultimately come to this plan, and the sooner it adopts it the better.

Mr. Taft, while he was President, in an address which he delivered before the National Board of Trade in 1910, made this statement:

> We boast ourselves a democratic country. We say that there is no place within the gift of the people to which we may not select the most humble inhabitant, providing he be fit to discharge its duty, and yet we have an arrangement which makes it absolutely impossible for anyone but a millionaire to occupy the highest diplomatic posts.
> Now, I ask you whether that is consistency; whether it is not the purest kind of demagogy? By demagogy I mean the advancement of an argument which seems to be in favor of democracy, but which, when it actually works out, is in favor of plutocracy.

It should be the immediate duty of Congress to first provide its diplomats and ministers with suitable salaries; and, second, to provide for embassies and legation buildings and consular buildings at important posts.

Diplomacy is just now playing a great and important part in the settlement of the world's condition and advancement, more so than ever before in the history of the human race, and it is exceedingly important that our Government should be generous and liberal enough to maintain our reputation abroad in our Diplomatic and Consular Service upon such a high and dignified plane as will be commensurate with our great interests and our position and influence among the nations.

In conclusion, I desire to call attention to the letter of the Acting Secretary of State to the Secretary of the Treasury, which fully explains our situation:

STATE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 3, 1919.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

SIR: I have the honor to request that you will transmit to Congress the following item of appropriation:

When the estimates for the appropriation for foreign intercourse for the next fiscal year were being prepared, it was not known how long the war would continue, and thus it did not appear to be of immediate importance to lay before Congress a recommendation in regard to the housing of American diplomatic representatives abroad. Now that an armistice has fortunately been signed and the end of the war is in sight it seems fitting that this subject should be taken up without further delay and consideration be given to the desirability of enhancing the prestige of our diplomatic missions and equipping them for the important work which they will henceforth have to do.

It is well known that for many years the American ambassadors and ministers have been at a wretched disadvantage. Not infrequently there have been no appropriately furnished apartments or houses available. In some capitals it has been impossible to find any apartments or houses, furnished or unfurnished, suitable for the residence of a diplomatic representative. Frequently, if suitable quarters have been found they have been situated in a part of the city remote from the residences of other diplomatic representatives, from the public offices, and from the people with whom close relations must be maintained. Moreover, the finding and fitting and furnishing of suitable quarters has been a great burden both in trouble and expense to the representatives and a great loss to the United States in time that should have been devoted to public duties and the cultivation of proper relations with the people of the countries to which the representatives were accredited. Furthermore, the fact that the diplomatic representatives of other nations have been paid larger salaries and enabled to live in dignified and even luxurious residences owned by their Governments has proved a serious embarrassment to the representatives of the United States who have been denied those advantages and have thus suffered in prestige and effectiveness.

In this relation it may be profitable to consider for a moment the manner in which foreign governments have provided for their representatives in this country not only in regard to houses but also in regard to salaries, for the two are closely related, and at the same time to note the contrast with the provision made by the United States for its representatives.

In addition to paying a salary of $50,000 a year, Great Britain very early acquired for her representative a house which has long been one of the landmarks of the National Capital. It is to be regretted that relatively few of the residents of the British capital would know where to find the American Embassy, so frequently has it been changed from house to house with each new ambassador, and yet one-twentieth of 1 per cent of the value of our exports to the United Kingdom for the year 1917 would enable the United States to acquire a most suitable home for its ambassador in London.

France, with a population of approximately 39,000,000, although she at present owns no home in Washington for her ambassador, pays the full rent of a suitable residence and makes an allowance for entertainment expenses and provides a salary of approximately $35,000 a year; but her sister Republic, the United States, notwithstanding its 110,000,000 of population, and enormous wealth, and exports of more than a billion dollars' worth of merchandise to France in 1917, has been unwilling to pay its ambassador to that Republic more than $17,500 a year and to provide a residence for him in the French capital.

Italy, with only 32,000,000 people, is much more generous than the United States, for she not only provides her ambassador in Washington with a residence but also with expenses for entertainment and a salary of $25,000 besides.

The Republics of Argentina and Chile, with populations of approximately 8,500,000 and 4,000,000, respectively, pay their ambassadors in Washington $22,000 a year and provide residences besides, that of the Argentine ambassador being owned by his Government. The American ambassador in none of the foregoing countries is furnished with a residence or entertainment allowances and the salary is only $17,500 a year. In Japan, however, the United States owns the embassy (as it does in Constantinople), but even there the ambassador, with his salary of $17,500, is not so well provided for as the Japanese ambassador in Washington, who receives in salary and allowances $24,000 a year and expenses of entertainment as well as a house. The population of Japan is 56,860,000.

It will be instructive also to compare the provision made by a few foreign Governments for their ministers in Washington with that made by the United States for its ministers abroad. China has long owned a handsome residence for her minister in this city. The United States also owns its legation building in Peking. But the Chinese minister receives a salary of $20,000 a year with allowances for entertainment while the American minister in Peking is paid only $12,000 a year.

Cuba, with a population of 2,600,000, pays her minister in Washington $21,600 a year and has recently erected a very handsome legation building. The United States now owns a legation in Habana, but it pays its minister only $12,000 a year, with no allowances for entertainment. Norway, Sweden, and Denmark all provide their ministers here with residences, although they are not owned by the Governments, and pay salaries of from $12,000 to $20,000 a year, while the United States makes no provision for residences for its ministers in those countries and pays salaries of only $10,000 per annum.

Thus it will be seen that in respect to salary and residence the American diplomatic representatives are, as a rule, at a serious disadvantage with their foreign colleagues. Not only do they suffer loss of time, effort, and money in procuring residences and offices, but they suffer the more serious loss of prestige and dignity through the lack of fixed residences, which results in frequent changes of location and occasionally in enforced residence in unsuitable places, a condition in sharp contrast with that affecting the representatives of other great nations, who have comfortable homes provided by their Governments.

Congress has long since acknowledged the wisdom of acquiring embassy, legation, and consulate buildings and has made occasional appropriations which have resulted in the acquisition of buildings for the embassy in Turkey, the legations in Cuba and Costa Rica, and also for the consulate general at Shanghai. The Lowden Act of February 17, 1911, authorizing the Secretary of State to acquire such sites and buildings as might be appropriated for by Congress, was intended to provide for the systematic acquisition of buildings for the majority of our missions and consulates, but, unfortunately, no progress has been made under the act, owing to the lack of necessary appropriations. The failure to make appropriations under that act has in the main been due to the provision limiting the expenditure at any one place to $150,000, a sum under present conditions entirely inadequate for the purchase of embassy or legation or even consular premises at any except the small and relatively unimportant capitals. It would be most unwise to make purchases unless the property so acquired should compare well with that owned by other Governments. It can not be presumed, for example, that the people of this country would approve of the purchase of an American embassy building in Paris for $150,000, knowing at the time that the British Government owns there embassy property valued at $1,500,000; Germany, nearly $700,000; Austria-Hungary, perhaps, $1,000,000; and Italy nearly $400,000.

This subject has now become one of great urgency. The United States has emerged from the war with a new place among the nations, a prestige of which she must in the future be very jealous and a responsibility in international affairs to which she must be deeply sensitive. It is believed that no reasonable effort should be spared to advance the one and insure the wise discharge of the other. Indeed the future of this country and the success of its foreign commerce and shipping make it imperative that our prestige and the effectiveness of our diplomacy be kept at the highest possible standard. It must not be overlooked that where diplomacy is successful commerce grows; where diplomacy is inefficient, American commercial enterprises abroad suffer; that great prestige and diplomatic effectiveness go hand in hand, and that we can not have the one without inevitably acquiring the other.

In order to attain these ends, better acquaintance and understanding is fundamental, and the acquisition of suitable buildings for our embassies and legations would be an important step toward that closer acquaintance and understanding; one that would carry conviction to the people of foreign countries of the genuineness of our proffers of friendship. There could hardly be a more appropriate beginning to the work of reconstruction than the prompt adoption of a comprehensive plan for acquiring suitable residences and offices for the diplomatic and consular representatives of this Government abroad.

It is difficult to believe that the people of the United States wish their ambassador in Paris, for example, to be dependent upon his private fortune for a residence in which to represent them. Nor can one feel that the spirit of the United States will much longer be patient with a policy that makes private fortune more important than ability and culture as a primary qualification of American diplomatic representatives. It is believed that if the people of this country were to express their conviction upon this subject they would be found to be in favor of such appropriate and dignified and yet not lavish housing of their representatives everywhere abroad as would clearly place them upon an equality with their foreign colleagues. Nothing less than this would seem consistent with the aims of the people of this country or with the full protection of their material interests.

I strongly recommend, therefore, that during the present session of Congress there be adopted a definite program for the expenditure of a specified sum annually for the acquisition of embassy and legation buildings at the principal capitals of the world and consulate buildings at the principal ports of the Far East, and that the Secretary of State be given authority to acquire, as soon as may advantageously be done, suitable buildings or options upon appropriate sites not in excess of a total expenditure, during the next fiscal year, of $3,000,000. This amount would at least provide the United States with homes for its diplomatic representatives at the capitals of the principal nations with which it has been associated in the war, and would prove not only highly advantageous to American prestige in those capitals, but also a delicate compliment to the nations as well. The amount mentioned would also make possible the acquisition of buildings for the consulates at Canton and perhaps Hankow, China, which are most essential from the standpoint of our present and prospective commercial interests and which, if not procured very soon, will be impossible to obtain at any price. I venture further to suggest that the Lowden Act be so revised that the limitations upon the amount to be expended at any one place may be very considerably raised, or eliminated altogether, in order that the act may be adapted to existing conditions and made to serve the best interests of the country by making possible the acquisition of premises comparing favorably with those owned by other great nations.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,

FRANK L. POLK,
Acting Secretary of State.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
THE DIRECTOR OF THE CONSULAR SERVICE,
Washington, January 21, 1919.

The Hon. GEORGE EDMUND FOSS,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. FOSS: If you will consult the Revised Statutes of the United States, second edition, 1878, page 293, you will find that section 1675, Revised Statutes, reads, in part, as follows:

"Ambassadors and envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary shall be entitled to compensation at the rates following, per annum, namely:

"Those to France, Germany, Great Britain, and Russia, each, $17,500.

"Those to Austria, Brazil, China, Italy, Japan, Mexico, and Spain, each, $12,000.

"Those to all other countries, unless where a different compensation is prescribed by law, each, $10,000. * * *."

This section was amended so as to read as above given by the act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. L., p. 483).

The Diplomatic and Consular appropriation act of March 1, 1893 (27 Stat L., p. 491), provided that "whenever the President shall be advised that any foreign government is represented, or is about to be represented, in the United States by an ambassador, envoy extraordinary, minister plenipotentiary, minister resident, special envoy, or chargé d'affaires, he is authorized, in his discretion, to direct that the representative of the United States to such government shall bear the same designation. This provision shall in no wise affect the duties, powers, or salary of such representative."

Thereafter, on March 30, 1893, Thomas F. Bayard was appointed ambassador to Great Britain. On April 8, 1893, James B. Eustis, then minister to France, was raised to the rank of ambassador. On September 14, 1893, Theodore Runyon, then minister to Germany, was raised to the rank of ambassador.

On February 11, 1898, our representative to Russia was raised to the rank of ambassador; the one to Mexico was raised to the rank of ambassador on December 8, 1898; the one to Austria-Hungary on May 27, 1902; the one to Italy on October 20, 1903; the one to Brazil on January 13, 1905; and the one to Japan on January 25, 1906.

The Diplomatic and Consular act of March 2, 1909, provides:

"And hereafter no new ambassadorship shall be created unless the same shall be provided for by an act of Congress" (35 Stat. L., p. 672).

Thereafter the act of September 4, 1913 (38 Stat. L., p. 110), authorized the appointment of an ambassador to Spain and fixed his compensation at $17,500. The appointment was made September 15, 1913.

The act of May 6, 1914 (38 Stat. L., p. 378), authorized the appointment of an ambassador to Argentina and Chile and fixed the compensation at $17,500 each.

Very sincerely, yours, WILBUR J. CARR.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES A. GALLIVAN,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, January 25, 1919.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, if there be any fear in the minds of any Members that the proposal in this bill (H. R. 13879) granting a pension of $5,000 per annum to Edith Carow Roosevelt, widow of the late Col. Theodore Roosevelt, is unusual, may I say to the House that it is according to precedent? It has been the custom of Congress ever since the early days of the Republic to honor the memory of departed Presidents by according some substantial recognition to their widows. It is true that the precedents themselves have been singularly varied. Martha Washington lived some two years after the death of her husband, and it does not appear to be of record that a pension was voted in her behalf. However that may be, Congress granted her the privilege of sending her letters without the payment of postage, and that privilege was established in such a manner that succeeding widows have been granted it without question, whether a pension was added or not. It is not easy to glean from the records whether any of the widows ever asked a pension of Congress. It is to be presumed that they did not, but that friends did so in their behalf, whether or not with their knowledge and consent.

I desire to say to the House that the widow of Col. Roosevelt had no knowledge of the introduction of this bill until it appeared in the newspapers of the country. In presenting it I simply followed precedent, and I would like to place before Congress a short story of what has been done in other cases in bygone days.

Louise Catherine Adams, widow of John Quincy Adams, received no pension, but was granted the franking privilege, and the same is true of Dolly Madison, thus following the precedent established in the case of Martha Washington. In these cases the husband had left the Presidency before his death. But William H. Harrison died in office only 31 days after his inauguration, and Congress voted Mrs. Harrison $25,000, representing the President's salary for the current year. A straight pension to the widow was voted first for Mrs. Julia Gardner Tyler in the sum of $5,000, which sum has not been varied since, although not all Presidents' widows have received it. Margaret S., the widow of Zachary Taylor, received only the franking privilege, and then $5,000 was voted as a pension to Sarah Childress Polk, whose husband had succeeded John Tyler in the presidential office. Abraham Lincoln was assassinated while President, and his widow, Mary Todd Lincoln, was voted his year's salary of $25,000, as Mrs. Harrison had been, less any drafts made upon his salary by Mr. Lincoln before his death. In addition, Mrs. Lincoln was voted a pension of $5,000 a year and the franking privilege, the whole representing the largest sum voted to the widow of any President up to that time.

U. S. Grant lived many years after he left the Presidency, but upon his death Julia Dent Grant received $5,000 a year and the franking privilege, which now had come to be regarded as the established allowance for a President's widow. Between the time of Grant and the death of the next President in office the salary of the President had been increased to $50,000 a year, and when James A. Garfield was assassinated and died in 1882 Congress voted Mrs. Lucretia R. Garfield that sum in addition to the usual pension of $5,000 and the franking privilege. Ida S. McKinley, the widow of the third President assassinated in office, received only $5,000 a year and the franking privilege until her death, and she was entitled also to draw the balance of the President's salary from the death of Mr. McKinley in September, 1901, for the remainder of the fiscal year. Pension bills for Mrs. Benjamin Harrison and Mrs. Grover Cleveland were passed by the Senate, but objection to their passage was raised in the House, and, I understand, the bills were withdrawn, but both widows were allowed free postage. The point was raised at one time that the marriage of Mrs. Cleveland to Prof. Preston in 1912 invalidated her franking privilege, but an examination of the law showed that she was entitled to it until the end of her natural life. The widows of two Vice Presidents also have received money grants from Congress. Mrs. Henry Wilson was voted the Vice President's salary of $10,000, her husband having died in office in 1875, and Mrs. Thomas A. Hendricks received a balance of $8,750 and mileage and stationery allowances to which her husband would have been entitled for one year.

I desire to call the attention of the House to the letter of Hon. Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior, to whom this bill was referred by the Committee on Pensions. Secretary Lane not only refers to the precedents in matters of this character, but gives excellent reasons why the House should pass this bill:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 20, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. KEY: I have your letter of January 14, submitting for my consideration H. R. 13879, in which it is proposed to provide a pension of $5,000 per annum for Mrs. Edith Carow Roosevelt and asking that the committee be informed as to "what widows of ex-Presidents of the United States have been allowed pension by means of a special act of Congress and the amounts of the pension in each instance." I find that it has been the pleasure of Congress to provide a pension of $5,000 per year for—

Sarah Childress Polk, widow of James K. Polk.
Julia Gardner Tyler, widow of John Tyler.
Mary Lincoln, widow of Abraham Lincoln.
Julia Dent Grant, widow of U. S. Grant.
Lucretia R. Garfield, widow of James A. Garfield.
Ida S. McKinley, widow of William McKinley.

Your letter also suggests that I am at liberty to make other comment than a mere formal report upon the proposed bill. I would gladly avail myself of such an opportunity if I thought that any word that I could say would add to the strength of the sentiment that urges the passage of this measure. The impress that Theodore Roosevelt's personality has made upon the world does not, however, need emphasis. Whatever his fame as a statesman, it can never outrun his fame as a man. However widely men may differ from him in matters of national policy, this thing men in their hearts would all wish, that their sons might have within them the spirit, the will, the strength, the manliness, the Americanism of Roosevelt. He was made of that rugged and heroic stuff with which legend delights to play. The Idylls and the Sagas and the Iliads have been woven about men of his mold. We may surely expect to see developed a Roosevelt legend, a body of tales that will exalt the physical power and endurance of the man and the boldness of his spirit, his robust capacity for blunt speech, and his hearty comradeship, his live interest in all things living—these will make our boys for the long future proud that they are of his race and his country. And no surer fame than this can come to any man—to live in the hearts of the boys of his land as one whose doings and sayings they would wish to make their own.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE.

Hon. JOHN A. KEY,
Chairman Committee on Pensions, House of Representatives.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. MONTAGUE, OF VIRGINIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Tuesday, January 28, 1919.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include a letter of Chief Justice Taney under date of February 16, 1863, known as his remonstrance against the imposition of an income tax upon judicial salaries, and also the opinion of Attorney General Hoar in relation to the same. I do this for the benefit of confrères of the House and the few lurking lovers of the Constitution throughout the country.

The matter referred to above is as follows:

[Supreme Court of the United States. Extract from the minutes of Tuesday, March 10, 1863.]

ORDER OF COURT.

Ordered, upon the request of the Chief Justice, that the following letter from him to the Secretary of the Treasury be entered on the records of the court:

WASHINGTON, February 16, 1863.

SIR: I find that the act of Congress of the last session (July 1, 1862) imposing a tax of 3 per cent on the salaries of all officers in the employment of the United States has been construed in your department to embrace judicial officers, and the amount of the tax has been deducted from the salaries of the judges.

The first section of the third article of the Constitution provides that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges of both the Supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."

The act in question, as you interpret it, diminishes the compensation of every judge 3 per cent, and if it can be diminished to that extent by the name of a tax it may in the same way be reduced from time to time at the pleasure of the legislature.

The judiciary is one of the three great departments of the Government created and established by the Constitution. Its duties and powers are specifically set forth, and are of a character that requires it to be perfectly independent of the two other departments, and in order to place it beyond the reach and above even the suspicion of any such influence the power to reduce their compensation is expressly withheld from Congress and excepted from their powers of legislation.

Language could not be more plain than that used in the Constitution. It is, moreover, one of its most important and essential provisions. For the articles which limit the powers of the legislative and executive branches of the Government and those which provide safeguards for the protection of the citizen in his person and property would be of little value without a judiciary to uphold and maintain them which was free from every influence, direct or indirect, that might by possibility in times of political excitement warp their judgments.

Upon these grounds I regard an act of Congress retaining in the Treasury a portion of the compensation of the judges as unconstitutional and void; and I should not have troubled you with this letter if there was any mode by which the question could be decided in a judicial proceeding. But all of the judges of the courts of the United States have an interest in the question, and could not therefore with propriety undertake to hear and decide it.

I am, however, not willing to leave it to be inferred from my silence that I admit the right of the Legislature to diminish in this or in any other mode the compensation of the judges when once fixed by law; and my silence would naturally, perhaps necessarily, be looked upon as acquiescence on my part in the power claimed and exercised under this act of Congress, and would be regarded as a precedent, establishing the principle that the Legislature may at its pleasure regulate the salaries of the judges of the courts of the United States, and may reduce their compensation whenever Congress may think proper.

Having been honored with the highest judicial station under the Constitution, I feel it to be more especially my duty to uphold and maintain the constitutional rights of that department of the Government, and not by any act or word of mine leave it to be supposed that I acquiesce in a measure that displaces it from the independent position assigned to it by the statesmen who framed the Constitution, and in order to guard against any such inference, I present to you this respectful, but firm and decided remonstrance against the authority you have exercised under this act of Congress and request you to place this protest upon the public files of your office as the evidence that I have done everything in my power to preserve and maintain the judicial department in the position and rank in the Government which the Constitution has assigned to it.

I am, sir,
Very respectfully, yours, R. B. TANEY.

Hon. S. P. CHASE,
Secretary of the Treasury.

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE,
October 23, 1869.

SIR: Your letter of September 30, 1869, has been received, asking my opinion upon the question "whether the law is constitutional which imposes a tax upon the salary of the President of the United States and upon the judges of the Supreme Court."

I find no law which in express terms imposes a tax upon the salary of either of those officers. But as several of the statutes which provide for the assessment and collection of internal revenue contain provision for taxing the salaries of all civil officers of the United States, and thus include in their literal application the salaries of the President and of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, the question may perhaps be stated in this form: Are those statutes to be construed as authorizing the imposition of a tax upon the salaries of the officers in question?

The first section of the second article of the Constitution of the United States contains this provision: "The President shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected." The first section of the third article contains the provision that "The judges both of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."

A specific tax by the United States upon the salary of an officer, to be deducted from the amount which otherwise would by law be payable as such salary, is, in my opinion, a diminution of the compensation to be paid to him, which, in the case of the President and the judges, would be prohibited by the Constitution of the United States, if the act of Congress levying the tax were passed during the official term of the President or of the judges, respectively, concerning whom the question should arise.

It was held in the case of Dobbins v. The Commissioners of Erie County (16 Pet., 435) that the compensation of an officer of the United States, fixed by a law of Congress, was not subject to taxation under State authority, because the effect of such a tax would be to diminish the compensation which the officer was by law entitled to receive. Such a tax was held to interfere with the provision made by the United States for the due execution of the powers and functions of the National Government by means of officers which it appointed and paid. In the case of The Pacific Insurance Company v. Soule (7 Wall., 434) it was decided that an income tax was an excise or duty imposed by a statute of the United States relating to internal revenue.

Congress, being prohibited by the Constitution from diminishing the salaries to be paid to the judges of the Supreme Court and the President during their respective terms of office, can no more do it by levying an excise or duty upon those salaries and deducting the amount thereof from them than could a State from that of an officer of the United States under the doctrine of the case in 16 Peters' Reports. The tax directly operates as a diminution of the compensation of the officer.

I am therefore of opinion that no income tax could be lawfully assessed and collected upon the salaries of the President or any of the judges who were in office at the time the statute imposing the tax was passed. In regard to the salary of a subsequent President, or judges subsequently appointed, the constitutional objection would not arise, if it were clearly the intention of the Legislature that the tax should be imposed upon these officers whenever, by new appointments or a new election, there would be no constitutional difficulty in the application of a previously existing law. But I am of opinion that this would not be the safe and just rule of construction. Statutes imposing taxes are in their nature temporary, and subject to frequent modification and repeal. When Congress imposes a tax upon the salaries of all civil officers, the language, although general, must necessarily be construed to mean all civil officers except those whom Congress has not the constitutional power to subject to such a tax.

As the language of the statute could have no application to the President and judges holding their offices at the time it was passed, there would seem to be sufficient reason for holding that there was no intention that it should apply to those officers. If it were supposed applicable to the salary of the President, the singular result would follow in his case that, as the Constitution prohibits the increase as well as the diminution of his salary during his term of office, if at the time when his official term commenced his salary was subject to a deduction in the nature of a tax it would not be competent for Congress during his term of office, by any repeal or diminution of the tax, to increase the amount paid to him. So that if the law imposing an income tax were repealed, the President alone, of all the citizens of the country, would continue liable for its payment during the term for which it had been originally imposed, if his official term so long continued. And in the case of the judges, as the amount of income tax laid upon salary should be varied from time to time, one judge might be liable only to the amount of part of the income tax which the law imposed on salaries generally, and different members of the same court would be receiving different rates of compensation.

I think it a more reasonable view that the class of officers over which Congress has not this taxing power by the Constitution should not be held to be embraced within the general phrase, "all salaries of civil officers," and have therefore come to the conclusion that the just construction of the law does not require or permit any deduction of an income tax from the salaries of the President or the justices of the Supreme Court.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. R. HOAR.

Hon. GEO. S. BOUTWELL,
Secretary of the Treasury.

"They Should be Made to Harmonize and be Enforced Impartially."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DAVID A. HOLLINGSWORTH,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, January 25, 1919,

On the bill (H. R. 14894) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] relative to a rule of the Invalid Pensions Committee which he claims bars before the committee any member of a soldiers' or sailors' home from receiving relief through consideration by the committee of special bills. I do not think the rule quite as broad and arbitrary as he states, but as enforced it amounts to the same thing.

The illustration he gives, of a blind soldier in the soldiers' home at Quincy, Ill., with no friends, no home, nobody on earth to take care of him, and yet denied any special relief at the hands of this committee, seems harsh and unjust, and I quite approve of the gentleman's remarks.

I have myself in mind a somewhat similar case in the soldiers' home at Dayton, Ohio. A soldier constituent of mine, member of this home, sent me word that he longed for the unrestrained freedom of the outside, and that if I could procure him a special pension of $30 per month he would be glad to leave the home and could manage to subsist on this amount. I immediately introduced a bill, not thinking the rule mentioned quite as arbitrary as it seems to be, but, notwithstanding I am a member of the committee, that bill, introduced in January, 1917, still sleeps in the committee files awaiting, with hundreds of others not quite up to the committee standards, the usual biennial 4th of March burial of legislative hopes.

I am not disposed to complain of the committee in any way; they are all true friends of Civil War veterans; but the law itself is at fault in a number of respects, as I shall try to point out, with permission of the House.

I also listened, but with regret, to the remarkable statement of my colleague from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] to the effect that a pension bill of $12 per month granted by Congress to a helpless child of a deceased soldier had been denied payment by the Commissioner of Pensions, alleging as the only reason that the child was in the county infirmary at the time the bill was finally passed.

My colleague's statement, although startling to me, is in such positive form that no room for doubt is left, and yet I sincerely hope that upon further inquiry and investigation he may himself discover some other reason for this blunt refusal of the Pension Commissioner to carry out a solemnly enacted law of Congress even if it be of minor importance in dollars and cents. It seems too cruel to contemplate.

I have known Commissioner Saltzgaber for many years, and my estimate of him has always been that of a high-toned, high-class gentleman in every respect, incapable of intentionally doing a wrong to anyone, much less to a helpless child of one of his comrades, for he himself was a worthy, brave, Union soldier.

I have known him intimately as an official, served with him in the Ohio Senate, and have had much business with his office here in Washington, and, although on opposite sides in politics, I have never had the slightest cause to complain of his official actions or doubt his official integrity. I may of course be mistaken, but I feel sure if the facts stated by my colleague be presented by him personally to the commissioner, and fully explained as they are here claimed to be, Mr. Saltzgaber will not hesitate for a moment to order payment of that helpless child's pension whether she be in or out of the county infirmary.

I regard the present pension laws in their enforcement as unjust to some, just perhaps to others, and possibly too liberal to a few, and as this may be the last pension bill of this character reported by this committee at this session of Congress now rapidly nearing its close, with big war problems, or rather peace problems, yet to be solved, I desire to submit during the consideration of this bill a few additional thoughts on the general subject of Civil War pensions. The pending bill, although intended by the committee, of which I am a member, to be a generous one, is not perfect; no one claims that it is. It does not provide adequate support even for the few needy survivors mentioned, their widows and orphans, as contemplated in the implied promise of the Government at the time of enlistment. The Government, in my judgment, occupies a contractual relation toward the soldiers of the Civil War and their dependents as binding as if entered into with all the legislative formalities of the war-risk insurance law for the protection and relief of the soldiers of the present war and their dependents; as binding in fact as the war bonds of the Government issued at the time.

Although heartily supporting this bill, as I have every pension bill or soldiers' relief measure reported from any of the House committees since I have been a Member of Congress, and have myself introduced and had passed scores of special bills, aggregating nearly 200, for the relief of those needing more help than can be obtained under the general pension laws, I can not say that I am in entire accord with the present laws on the subject or the present method of granting relief by special acts which are liable to give one soldier a preference over another of equal merit.

I also dissent wholly from the theory of charity in connection with relief bills for soldiers of the Civil War or for their dependents. Adequate support for them, at least enough to keep the wolf from their doors, is as much a business obligation of the Government as is its duty to make prompt payments on the insurance policies issued during the present war or on any other contract obligation of the Government.

Veiled suggestions of charity made on the floor of the House whenever pension legislation is up for consideration, and even by well-meaning citizens throughout the country who are of a later generation and can not personally realize Civil War conditions, are unwarranted except on the theory of almsgiving generosity the acceptance of which is objectionable to many sensitive minds. They overlook the fundamental pact of the Government with its volunteer soldiers.

I have no patience with those who undertake to differentiate between the word "compensation" for the unfortunate victims of the present war and the payment of "pensions" to like unfortunates of the Civil War.

It is a matter of tweedledee and tweedledum. Charity is not an element in either. Debt and credit are the only elements of accounting as between the Government and its citizen defenders in either war. Patriotic and sentimental considerations are not matters of accounting.

When the tocsin of civil war sounded in the sixties and the life of the Republic was seen to be in peril the Government at Washington hastily called for volunteers to defend it. Conscription, or selective drafting as it is now sugar-coatedly called, was not then thought of except as a last resort, if it should appear that American citizenship faltered or showed an unwillingness to voluntarily come forward in defense of home and country. It seemed then, as it does yet to some, contrary to republican ideals, foreign to our democratic form of government.

Accordingly recruiting officers duly accredited were sent out by the Government among the people calling for volunteers, and by speech and through the press the promise was proclaimed deliberately and urged as an assurance of the Government to induce volunteering that any citizen thus entering the Army, and his widow and children in case of his death or misfortune, should always be objects of care and solicitude on the part of the Government, and come what might, either during or after the war, they should never be permitted to suffer the pangs of hunger or want. Poor and needy soldiers and their families to this extent were made contingent wards of the Republic by an implied contract as sacred and binding as any obligation ever entered into by human authority. Volunteers with this assurance and without other formality patriotically rushed to the colors, feeling that they and their families were protected against the uncertain contingencies and casualties of the future, not that they expected to be paid specific amounts, as provided in the insurance policies issued to the soldiers of the present war, but simply a solemn though unwritten guaranty on the part of the Government that they and their loved ones should never be permitted to suffer want.

Thus was the Union Army recruited and volunteer soldiers accepted by the Government. Over 2,000,000 of splendidly equipped young men, the flower of the northland, with no other assurance or guaranty, went forth to battle against foemen known, as they proved to be, worthy of their steel.

Victory finally crowned their efforts, after four years of terrific fighting. It was so complete that victor and vanquished at once accepted results, and the white flag at Appomattox proved a signal for speedy disbandment of both armies and their return to the peaceful avocations of civil life, without any need of peace conferences to settle terms or exploit leaders, as is now being done at Versailles.

The intervening years have healed all wounds and to-day we are a united, happy people, in spirit and in fact, welded together by tender ties and common interests found in the hearts of a brave, just people, and, as applied to the sovereign States of a glorious Union, welding them together more indestructibly than is possible by any of the theoretic, bayonet-pinning-together league projects for universal world peace now visualizing at Versailles. The debts and obligations of the Government growing out of the Civil War, even the high interest-bearing bonds discounted and sold to provide for war emergencies, have all been paid or canceled, saving only this one implied obligation of the Government to its needy volupteer soldiers and their dependents, making such special relief bills as we are now considering a necessity of governmental good faith. The general pension laws are admittedly inadequate to cover all cases. They are also so hedged about by technicalities, red tape, and unjust limitations like the requirement of 90 days' service, slight absences from duty without formal leaves, and other boyish delinquencies, trivial in their nature, but which have for over a half century barred many worthy soldiers from needed relief, from absolute rights which were guaranteed to them by this implied obligation of the Government they volunteered to serve.

Statistics are not at hand to show the exact number of unfortunate volunteer soldiers, their widows and orphans, thus barred by legislative limitations, but they certainly aggregate many thousands. Modest, needy heroes, some of them, like two whom I shall hereafter refer to as examples, with years of hard military service for the Government to their credit, compelled to struggle on in life against adversity, and, worst of all, against the stings of ingratitude and neglect shown them by the Government they served.

This ought not to be. It is rank repudiation, under the guise of law, of a solemn, though unwritten, obligation of the greatest and believed to be the most just and considerate Government on earth, and, worse yet, an obligation incurred in an hour of peril, when it was loudly calling for volunteers to defend its very existence.

The end approached. Soon this chapter of ingratitude will have been written and relief bills in Congress will be powerless to bring them even partial justice. An unsavory memory of discrimination, of mixed generosity for some and wrongful neglect and violated faith for others, will mar forever the fair perspective of the Republic unless Congress acts promptly while it can and removes the shadows of injustice now resting upon our national escutcheon. The memory of one unjust act by the Government toward one of its defenders can not be wiped out by a thousand generous deeds for others. It lingers and rankles in the minds of a just people and mars the pages of history after the victim is forgotten. Like truth, it can not be crushed; like Banquo's ghost, it rises continually to condemn.

I know it is said, and truthfully, that many well-to-do survivors of the Civil War are drawing pensions under the present law who can not properly be classed as needy. Charges of commercializing patriotism have frequently been made against them on the floor of the House during the consideration of pension bills for no other offense than accepting in good faith such benefits as the Government has voluntarily granted to them by solemn acts of Congress, with the passage of which they had nothing to do. Shafts of obloquy hurled against citizen soldiers who in the hour of their country's peril voluntarily went to its rescue are sure to react in the public mind and generally reveal under the searchlight rays of truth mere jealousy or envy of those who won distinction in defense of home and country. Such critics are growing fewer and fewer, vanishing like the number of old soldiers whom they would defame. They are unworthy the respect of law-respecting citizens. They are of the Bolsheviki type.

I have never felt any inclination to criticize or find fault with any citizen for obeying the laws of his country, duly enacted. If the Government awards him a pension, it is his right. At the worst its acceptance is a matter of taste.

Special pension bills, such as we now have under consideration, are different. A rigid rule of the committee bars the rich and well to do.

Rule 2 reads:

> The committee will not give consideration to any bill for pension or increase of pension unless the testimony and information submitted with the bill clearly shows that the claimant is now in such physical or mental condition as to be entirely unfitted for self-support and in destitute circumstances.

Everyone who is to receive a benefit under the pending bill has been shown by evidence to come within this rule. He has been shown to be needy and deserving; coming, in fact, under the implied contract the Government made with him at the time of enlistment.

Nor have I any criticism, Mr. Speaker, much less fault to find, with the few remaining survivers of that great Volunteer Army of the Union who still cling to and strictly act upon the original pension theory and implied promise of the Government under which they entered the service of their country in the dark days of the sixties, and which promise they understood to be a part of their contract of enlistment and which, stated briefly, was a simple guaranty to them that, come what might, they and those dependent upon them should never suffer want.

Fortunate, more or less, financially and in fair health, considering their ages, with honorable discharges showing them entitled to pensions if they desire under existing laws, the names of these patriotic, strict constructionists do not appear on the pension rolls. Apparently they prefer, so long as they are able, to eat their own bread in the sweat of their own brows. Perhaps it is more of a sentiment than otherwise, but still it gives luminous emphasis to the poet's inspiration about the "glorious privilege of being independent."

At any rate, it is their business, and their unselfish acts and modesty should, as it does, give them immunity from criticism.

I confess to a little tenderness myself along this same line, and am thankful that the wolf has not yet entered my doorway. But, Mr. Speaker, I fain would say a word for those, numbering thousands, who in dire distress are denied relief because of technical barriers unthought of and not provided for at the time this implied promise was made and volunteers were accepted by the Government. Such exceptions were not reserved in the original pact of enlistment.

What right has the Government, as it does, to say to an honorably discharged soldier who served faithfully for 89 days and now in need, "Step aside; you are not entitled to any consideration from the Government," and at the same time say to the one who served 90 days, perhaps in good health and well to do financially, "Step up to the counter; here is your pension," without regard to health, wealth, or need, at $30 per month and up? What right has it to treat the widows and orphans of the same soldiers in the same way?

It is a hideous discrimination, and yet it is the law of this blessed Republic. Again, a youthful soldier at home on sick leave recovers and instead of returning to the company he belongs to goes, with some of his chums perhaps, into another regiment and serves faithfully under this last enlistment until the end of the war and is honorably discharged with his regiment. From first to last he has been a faithful soldier; at the worst his changing regiments without red-tape approval was only a boyish indiscretion. The Government got the full benefit of his young manhood as a soldier, and yet, when pension day comes, his years of faithful service do not count; he is bruskly told to step aside because he neglected to get a discharge from his first and minor enlistment. But the 90-day boy has no worries about his pension, whether or not he did any of the fighting.

Is it right? Accidental overstaying of a furlough for a few days, or, possibly, caused by sickness unexplained because of his regiment being mustered out during his absence, has left against many really good soldiers the dark mark of desertion, placed on the record by a careless sergeant or other subordinate of his company, who might easily at the time have learned and recorded the facts, a blot to remain forever more terrible to a true soldier than any possible loss of pension rating. It is worse than the "scarlet-letter" mark to a sensitive mind.

Is it right? No; and congressional committees can not, in my judgment, be too liberal in granting special relief measures.

Other instances of discrimination and wrong to worthy soldiers might be mentioned, but I forbear.

It is now, Mr. Speaker, over 50 years since Fort Sumter was fired upon; a jubilee year, with welcome for all those who fought on the other side, has long ago been signalized by this great, wealthy, and powerful Government; another war is upon us and billions of the Nation's wealth are being lavishly and properly expended for the comfort of our new armies in the field and those coming home since the signing of the armistice, and in making much-needed billion-dollar loans to the allied Governments, including a most remarkable gratuity of one hundred millions to a greedy lot of unidentified and unclassified non-English speaking foreigners, wholly without sympathy or appreciation for American ideals, and yet there are thousands in our own land who fought on the Union side in the long ago faithfully and well now in poverty and need, but denied any assistance by the Government and are thus compelled to eke out existence as best they can with the great Republic they served apparently indifferent. They are denied relief only because of such trivial technicalities as I have mentioned.

Is it right? Is their jubilee year never coming?

In my judgment every surviving Union soldier who, accepting the recruiting promises and assurances of recruiting officers, enlisted and served his Government and country, if now in actual need of assistance for the support of himself and family, should be granted a pension by the Government adequate to make good such promise, unless he has been dishonorably dismissed from the service or can be found guilty by regular court-martial proceedings of moral turpitude during the war or cowardice in battle.

It is not a charity; it is a contractual right due him under his contract of enlistment.

And on the trial of such question, especially at this late day, where there is doubt, the just legal maxim, old as the ages, should govern—that is, that it is better that many guilty escape rather than one innocent person be made to suffer.

But I promised to give concrete details of two cases illustrating the hapless condition of many worthy survivors whose actual military service was brave and heroic. I shall do this without indulging in any imaginary war stories. I quote only from official Army records and reports made to this House after full investigations by the Military Committee:

[House Report No. 537, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session.]

[To accompany H. R. 4818, requiring the Secretary of War to issue an honorable discharge to Benjamin R. Buffington.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4818) requiring the Secretary of War to issue an honorable discharge to Benjamin R. Buffington, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do pass.

The records of the War Department show that Benjamin R. Buffington was enrolled November 1, 1861, at Flushing, Ohio, and was mustered into service November 17, 1861, as a private of Company K, Fifteenth Ohio Infantry Volunteers, to serve three years; that he was captured at Murfreesboro, Tenn., December 31, 1862; paroled at City Point February 3, 1863; reported at Camp Parole, Md., February 5, 1863, and that he was honorably discharged the service February 24, 1863, in orders from this department, upon application of his father, on the ground that he was a minor.

The records also show that he enlisted October 27, 1863, at St. Clairville, Ohio, and was mustered into service December 1, 1863, and assigned as a private to the Twenty-fifth Ohio Infantry Volunteers, to serve three years. He served under this enlistment until April 8, 1865, when he was ordered transferred to Sherman's army. He was landed at Beaufort, N. C., and there not finding his command, which was then stationed in South Carolina, he returned to his home in Ohio.

The Adjutant General, in a letter February 5, 1913, to Hon. W. B. Francis, a Representative from the State of Ohio, states the case as follows:

"While, therefore, Buffington does not stand charged with desertion on the records, he is, according to his own statements, a constructive deserter, and, in any event, it is only on condition that he stands charged with desertion, either actively or constructively, that this department can take any action at all in his case looking to furnishing him with a discharge from the Twenty-fifth Ohio Infantry. In other words, the only authority of law under which this department can amend the official records in this case is the act of Congress approved March 2, 1889, which governs the subject of removal of charges of desertion and the issue of discharge certificates to soldiers who failed to receive them by reason of their absence at the time of the muster out of their commands. In order, however, to entitle Buffington to the benefits of this act, it is necessary that he should have served to May 1, 1865, as it is evident from his own statements that he was not prevented from completing his term of enlistment by reason of disability contracted in the line of duty, and it is therefore incumbent upon him to produce satisfactory evidence that he did not withdraw himself from military control prior to May 1, 1865."

It will be noted that this man's service, as shown by the records of the War Department, was only 24 days short of the time required under the act referred to to entitle him to an honorable discharge under it. The war was practically over, he had been landed in a different State from that in which his command was located, was therefore unable to find it, and walked home. His service covered a period of almost four years, and the committee therefore recommend he should be granted the relief asked for in the act.

[House Report No. 724, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session.]

Mr. MCKENZIE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report to accompany H. R. 4814, a bill for the relief of Jonathan Milburn.

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4816) for the relief of Jonathan Milburn, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do pass.

The evidence in this case shows that the soldier served three years and was honorably discharged and that he reenlisted in the same company and regiment.

It further shows that he was detailed with a wagon train under Wagon Master George Marshall. That while in such service the soldier was taken sick and when the train reached Martinsburg, W. Va., which is near the home of the soldier, he left the train and went to his mother's home where he suffered from an attack of typhoid fever, and never rejoined his regiment. In the opinion of the committee this soldier did not willfully desert and inasmuch as he had given long service to his country the relief should be granted.

For the information of the House a letter from Adjt. Gen. McCain and a number of affidavits are herewith included and made a part of this report.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 18, 1916.

Hon. D. A. HOLLINGSWORTH,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of yesterday, in which you state that after having presented to the Committee on Invalid Pensions special pension bills in the cases of Benjamin R. Buffington, Company K, Fifteenth Ohio Infantry, and Jonathan Milburn, Company D, First West Virginia Cavalry, it was suggested to you by the chairman of the committee that the cases of these two soldiers were apparently similar to the case of William H. Blair, in whose case this department had, at the instance of Hon. Mr. ASHBROOK, granted an honorable discharge, and that it would be well to ascertain whether this department would take similar action in the cases of Buffington and Milburn. In response to your request to be advised whether there has been any change in the practice of this department during recent years that would preclude a reinvestigation of these cases, I beg leave to inform you that there is nothing to prevent such a reinvestigation or the introduction of any new evidence in support of the original applications for an honorable discharge.

The law which governs this department in the consideration of cases such as these is the act of Congress approved March 2, 1889, which makes provision under certain conditions for the removal of charges of desertion and for the issue of honorable discharge certificates to soldiers who failed to receive them by reason of their unauthorized absence at the time of the muster out of their commands. The cases of Buffington and Milburn are similar to the case of Blair, in that each left his command prior to May 1, 1865, and in such cases the charge of desertion can be removed under the act of March 2, 1889, only on condition that it shall appear from satisfactory evidence that at the time of desertion the soldier was suffering from wounds, injuries, or disease incurred in the line of duty and was prevented from completing his term of enlistment by reason of such wounds, injuries, or disease. In the case of Blair, evidence was recently submitted by Hon. Mr. ASHBROOK, which was found sufficient to establish that that soldier was prevented from completing his term of enlistment by reason of disability incurred in the line of duty, and the charge of desertion was accordingly removed and an honorable discharge issued in the case.

I gather from your letter that you are in possession of the two communications addressed by this office to Mr. Francis, your predecessor, in regard to the case of Buffington.

It will be observed from those communications that, in the case of this soldier, it is not contended that he was suffering from any wounds, injuries, or disease when he finally withdrew himself from military control, some time in April, 1865, apparently, or that he was prevented from rejoining his regiment, the Twenty-fifth Ohio Infantry, which remained in service until June 18, 1866, and that relief could be afforded in his case under the existing law only on condition that it could be established by competent evidence that he did not withdraw himself from military control prior to May 1, 1865.

As to the case of Jonathan Milburn, which is similar to the case of Blair, not only in that both deserted prior to May 1, 1865, but also in the fact that in both cases it has been claimed that the soldier was unfit for military service at the time of desertion and unable to rejoin his command prior to its muster out of service, some testimony has been introduced in which it is alleged that some three months before the close of the war he was detailed with the wagon train; that he was sent back with the train to Martinsburg, W. Va., and, being sick at the time, he received permission from the wagon master to go to his home, which was near by; that upon arriving at home he was taken down with typhoid fever, and that his regiment was mustered out of service before he recovered from his sickness. In the absence, however, of any record evidence showing that Milburn contracted any disability while in the service or that he was suffering from such disability at the time of his desertion, the department has been constrained to deny the application for the desired relief. Any additional testimony, however, that may be submitted in the case will receive prompt consideration. Such testimony, if possible, should include that of former comrades as to Milburn's physical condition at the time when he withdrew himself from military control.

Very respectfully,
H. P. MCCAIN,
The Adjutant General.

Statement of claim of Jonathan Milburn, of Bannock, Belmont County, Ohio, for correction of his war record and claim for a pension.

Jonathan Milburn enlisted in the First West Virginia Cavalry at Wheeling, W. Va., in 1861 and served his three years, being honorably discharged at end of enlistment. He immediately reenlisted in same regiment, serving a part of his second enlistment with his regiment, but a few months prior to the close of the war he was detailed with the wagon train under Wagon Master George Marshall. Shortly before the close of the war he had been sick with the wagon train, and the latter being near Martinsburg, W. Va., while Milburn's mother lived but a few miles away—9 miles from Winchester—it was thought best to get him to his mother's, and, the war then being considered over, this was done. Wagon Master George Marshall personally took him to within 4 miles of his mother's. Upon his arrival there he took down with typhoid fever and laid for weeks. In the meantime the war closed, troops were mustered out, and the officers of his regiment, not knowing his whereabouts, marked his record as "deserted."

Upon his recovery he came back to Belmont County and has continually resided in the vicinity of Bannock from that time to this. He did not know for months afterwards that his record had been marked this way, and upon discovery of it did not realize the future necessity of having it corrected until after his old comrades had scattered and many of them who knew the circumstances had died. If Wagon Master George Marshall is still living his whereabouts is unknown to said Milburn or his friends.

An attempt was made to straighten this matter out when Hon. Lorenzo Danforth was Member of Congress from this district; his first honorable discharge, together with other papers was sent to Mr. Danforth, who took sick and died very shortly afterwards, and when his estate was settled these papers could not be found.

Jonathan Milburn is to-day not physically or financially able to support himself and wife.

BANNOCK, OHIO.

I have known Jonathan Milburn since before the war, and recall distinctly his visit home just before entering on his second enlistment. The facts as stated in his affidavit is what I have always heard regarding him. He has been a hard-working man among us, honest and truthful, and is deserving in every respect of having this matter adjusted.

BANNOCK, OHIO.

I was personally acquainted with Jonathan Milburn prior to his enlistment. I knew of the facts as set forth in his statement. I saw him at the time of his reenlistment upon his visit home, and have known him continually from the close of the war to the present date; as he has made his home in this vicinity ever since, and has worked for me a goodly portion of the time.

His physical condition is very poor; the majority of men in his condition would not attempt to do any work, but he is compelled to do so, as his financial circumstances are such that he has to work if his strength permits.

The Van Dyke Amendment.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM GORDON,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, January 29, 1919.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, this amendment reads as follows:

That hereafter in making appointments to clerical and other positions in executive departments and in independent governmental establishments preference shall be given to honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines, and widows of such, if they are qualified to hold such positions.

This condition imposed upon the authority to appoint to positions in the public service is clearly contrary to public policy, and the courts should hold it invalid upon that ground alone, and also upon the additional ground that it invades the constitutional function of the executive; but they are not likely to do so for the very reason which passed it through the House by an almost unanimous vote.

The courts should adjudge this restriction upon the appointive power null and void, because where two or more persons are candidates for the same position it may result in the appointment of the least qualified, while the public interests and welfare demand the appointment of the one best qualified.

It is no answer to say that this limitation does not compel the appointment of an incompetent man. "Qualified" is a relative term, and any legislation which will require the preference to be given in any case to the least qualified candidate is obviously vicious, because it tends to lower the standard of the public service, and is for that reason invalid, and should be so adjudged and declared, because it is the duty of the executive to appoint the best qualified applicant to public office.

Some Members have attempted to excuse their votes for this vicious restriction by contending that the appointing officer will construe the statute to mean that "everything else being equal, the preference shall be given to the ex-soldier"; but this construction would entirely vitiate and destroy the intent and purpose of the provision, because it would render it impossible to enforce the preference which it is the only object of the statute to create.

It would violate the terms of the statute itself and convert appointing officers into lawbreakers. This limitation is based upon the wholly false and unwarranted assumption that the qualifications of all persons who are "qualified" to perform the duties of these positions in the executive departments are equally so, which every person of intelligence knows is untrue.

This false and vicious theory closes the door of hope for promotion or advancement in the face of every industrious, conscientious, and efficient man and woman serving the Government in any executive position and reduces all to the same level, regardless of their merits, and will do incalculable harm to the public service.

The result of the enactment of this amendment will be to lead to its adoption by the States and their subdivisions and to displace in the public service thousands of experienced, competent, and well qualified public servants, and fill their places with those who lack these qualifications.

Because a man has enlisted or been drafted into the military or naval service and is "qualified to hold" an executive position does not justify his appointment or that of his widow over a man or woman who is better qualified for the place, and a law which compels such appointment is wholly bad and will inevitably tend to lower the standard of the public service.

If at the next election of Congressmen and Senators men who have enlisted in the military or naval service or who have been drafted shall offer themselves as candidates against the men now in Congress who have voted for this amendment, I would like to hear the arguments against their election in behalf of those who have voted for this amendment.

In Memoriam—Gen. Joseph Sewall Smith.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. IRA G. HERSEY,
OF MAINE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 27, 1919.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Speaker, to-day Gen. Joseph Sewall Smith, late of Bangor, in my State, will be buried in the National Cemetery at Arlington with due military honors. His passing calls for a word from me in testimony of his distinguished public services as a citizen of my State and as one of the military heroes of this Nation.

Gen. Smith was born in Wiscasset, Me., November 27, 1836. When a boy he moved with his parents to Bath, Me., where he lived for a number of years. He had a distinct recollection as a boy of meeting frequently at Bath the first governor of Maine, Gov. William King, whose statue has been placed in the National Capitol as a representative of the great men of my State.

Gen. Smith was educated in the common schools and at Gorham Academy, and after his school days he moved to Bangor, Me., where he engaged in business as a manufacturer.

At the outbreak of the Civil War in 1861, at the age of 25, he enlisted as a private under Col. Oliver O. Howard. His courage and ability gave him quick promotion, and he rapidly rose from the ranks through the successive stages of corporal, sergeant, lieutenant, captain, and lieutenant colonel.

October 27, 1864, while serving on the staff of Gen. Hancock, he was brevetted colonel, United States Volunteers, to date from October 27, 1864, "for gallant and distinguished services at the Battle of Reams Station and Boydon Plank Road, Va.," and was brevetted brigadier general of Volunteers to date from July 11, 1865, "for faithful and meritorious service."

Gen. Hancock said of him—

He was brevetted for bravery in action. His conduct in the field was always marked for spirit and gallantry.

Gen. Humphrey wrote of him—

My estimate of him is a faithful and efficient officer, whose long experience in the field and sound judgment make him a most valuable officer. The spirited manner in which he served as aid in action shows him to be as soldierly as he is capable in administration.

Gen. O. O. Howard wrote of him—

Col. Smith came into the service as a private soldier in the Third Maine, at that time commanded by me. He served on my staff at the first Battle of Bull Run. While under my command his services were of a very meritorious character, and his subsequent record is equally good. I have considered him a capable, energetic, and efficient officer.

A congressional medal of honor was awarded him "for distinguished conduct in recapturing two pieces of artillery in the action at Hatchers Run, Va., October 27, 1864."

At the close of the war he returned to private life and business at Bangor, Me., where, under President Hayes, he was appointed collector of customs for the port of Bangor. Under President McKinley he was president of the Army of the Potomac organization.

He was later appointed governor of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers at Togus, Me., where he served with great satisfaction for many years. From this home he was next chosen for governor and manager of the National Home at Hampton, Va., beautifully situated on Hampton Roads, where he served with great satisfaction and until a short time before his death.

Several years ago the Quartermaster General had set aside for him a beautiful lot at Arlington overlooking the Potomac and the city of Washington, and it was here some eight years ago that he laid to rest his beloved wife, the companion of his declining years. After her death he seemed to lose his interest in many things in life, and often spoke of the time when he, too, would share this resting place in the national cemetery with her.

A few months ago in my office he spoke of the days that were fast approaching when he would rest in beautiful Arlington, where many of his comrades that he loved were now sleeping and where he, too, would find sweet peace. Well might he say, as Stevenson said:

Under the wide and starry sky
Dig the grave and let me lie.
Glad did I live, and gladly die,
And laid me down with a will.

This be the verse you grave for me:
"Here he lies, where he longed to be;
Home is the sailor, home from the sea,
And the hunter home from the hill."

Americanism v. Zionism.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROLLIN B. SANFORD,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, January 31, 1919.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter to me by Simon W. Rosendale, former attorney general of the State of New York.

The letter is as follows:

AMERICANISM V. ZIONISM.

[A letter to Congressman ROLLIN B. SANFORD, twenty-eighth district, New York, by Simon W. Rosendale, former attorney general of the State of New York.]

ALBANY, N. Y., September 4, 1918.

Hon. ROLLIN B. SANFORD,
Member of Congress, Twenty-eighth District, New York,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN SANFORD: I understand that, with other Members of Congress, you have received circulars and documents with request for expression as to your views on a pretentious Jewish movement known as "Zionism." To make known the attitude of a large number of American Jews on this subject, I take the liberty of addressing you.

This matter, owing to war conditions, has recently taken prominence and is of deep interest to a great number of American citizens. It has been rendered especially prominent by reason of a recent letter of President Wilson referring to the declaration of the British Government, and apparently having his approval, in regard to the establishment in Palestine of a Jewish State, a national homeland, for the Jewish people, the claimed realization of the so-called "Zionistic" movement.

This project has not had and does not have the general sympathy or approval of that large religious organization of citizens known as Reform Jews of America, nor of a representative body in Great Britain known as the League of British Jews, headed by such prominent Englishmen as Claude Montefiore and others.

It should be stated at the outset that the great body of Reform Jews in this country maintain that they are Jews by religion only and Americans by nationality.

Their religion is concerned with the State only to the same extent to which all other denominations share the common aim of praying and working for the highest welfare of one's native or adopted country. But the implications of a Jewish Palestinian State include those distasteful, dangerous, and outworn doctrines of a combination of church and state, from the evils of which the world is being more and more saved; hence they neither participate in nor approve of the efforts to establish a Jewish Palestinian State.

If the Reform Jews have been comparatively silent as to their attitude, it is because they have hitherto regarded the controversy on this point among Jews in this country as largely academic. The subject, however, now brought into the limelight, discloses radical differences between Jews on the subject of nationalism. These variances are accentuated by recent occurrences and present conditions. It is no longer a matter wholly of rabbis or for theological discussion. It is a practical question whether we shall stand and be regarded as a separate national entity, or, asserting our Americanism, declare, as the fact is, that we are Jews in our religion only.

It goes without saying that any efforts to provide a place where oppressed or persecuted Jews may find a place to live in peace, as well as any movement toward educational or cultural advancement, must meet with universal approval.

Thus, if the British declaration had been for a free State, open for all with protection to all, no such question could be raised; but this is very different from and issue is taken on the proposition to establish Jewish nationality.

Some philanthropic American Jews seem to hesitate in opposing this movement. They apparently do so because they believe this proposed homeland will afford an asylum for the oppressed and persecuted. Its "asylum" possibilities are extremely limited, and it is doubtful whether Zionists would concede this as its object, and, besides, this does not meet the principal objection. The movement is not philanthropic. It is political. The effort is for the establishment of a State. A national flag has been adopted, and it is carried and displayed by its adherents even in this country. National songs are used, and at least the nucleus of a Jewish army is organized and in Palestine; this "legion" is, of course, not to be confounded with the hundred thousand and more of loyal American Jewish soldiers who are doing their duty, shoulder to shoulder, with their fellow citizens, and who with emphatic unanimity will disavow such dilution of loyalty to the flag of our Union.

This matter of Jewish nationality is not new. It is important to note that formal action was taken on this subject years ago at conferences of American rabbis, notably at Philadelphia in 1869, and 20 years later at Pittsburgh, Pa. Out of these grew the organization of Reform Judaism in America. They adopted as the corner stone the doctrine that the hope, expectation, or belief in the restoration of Palestinian nationalism had no place in American Judaism.

It was asserted that we are Jews by religion only; that in the spirit of our country's institutions no religious dogma or prayers were longer proper, which would express a hope or desire for a separate nationalism; that the basic principle of separation of church and state imposed a duty on American citizens to abandon all aspirations or propositions tending otherwise. This principle was so appreciated and approved that it was accepted in its furthermost and most radical application. Most important, then, was the discarding of the ancient ritualistic prayers and utterances of expectation or desire for Palestinian restoration, recited during the centuries of the "dispersion." It was held that such were out of place in this country; that even if the possibility of realization could be seriously contemplated, it would not be availed of. They were eliminated from the prayer book, as they no longer voiced their desires, but more especially and particularly as such thoughts and hopes were inconsistent with singleness of American nationality.

The men composing these conferences being largely, if not wholly, of foreign birth, command additional commendation for their courage in thus eliminating sentiments, of course, written and introduced after the dispersion 20 centuries before, and uttered and repeated by devout worshippers during all those years (as they still are preserved in orthodox rituals). It was bravely done to meet the spirit of this land of religious liberty which had received and adopted them, to which they had sworn allegiance and whose institutions in the correct view demanded the abandonment of such doctrines.

Out of this movement has grown the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, which embraces practically all of the Reform Jewish congregations of America, numbering over 200, located in all parts of the United States with many thousand members. It has established and maintains a college for rabbis at Cincinnati, which was the residence of the late Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, the leading spirit in this great American reform movement.

For many years this union embraced the greater body of American Jews who were generally connected with congregations belonging to the union. They were numerically in the majority in the country until the more recent great influx of Jews from eastern Europe—from Russia, Galicia, Roumania, etc.—who in numbers now far exceed them. These latter, perhaps naturally, have adhered to orthodoxy in observances, customs, and prayers which they brought with them and which their congestion in larger cities does not tend to change. A percentage of the younger generation, particularly in smaller communities, is affiliating with reform congregations, but the bulk of these newcomers, especially those creating huge communities in populous centers, retain their foreign languages and customs as well as their orthodoxy with the ancient ritual, which includes prayers for Palestinian national restoration. The great majority does not appear to realize, if they fully understand, their inconsistency in respect to citizenship in this country.

Among the more recent comers, too, there are found radicals of every shade, who assert that they are not Jews by religion, but by race and nationality. Some of the latter are among those who sneer at the worship and observances of their orthodox neighbors. In these congested communities are found, too, sectarian schools and other religious and semireligious social organizations and factors, besides some distinctly un-American bodies, such as Jewish partisan political clubs and Jewish workingmen's and other associations. The foregoing is referred to principally because in this mass is found the bulk of those who furnish membership in and compose the "Zionists" in this country and who contribute their voices and "shekels" toward that movement. It is true that in the Zionistic movement in this country there are several men of public position and prominence, as well as a small number of reform rabbis, who have lent themselves thereto. They must feel satisfied that their participation is not, to them, inconsistent with unalloyed Americanism. So, too, with the orthodox or conservatives who retain their ancient prayers and aspirations and insist on Jewish nationalism as a dogma. We are claiming no monopoly nor questioning the loyalty of any of these parties. We simply assert our position—that our nationality and religion are distinct and separate. This we conceive the true American national spirit. It would be unfortunate if it were generally or largely otherwise.

Among these laymen above referred to, there are those who, strangely enough, are, so to say, nonconformists; that is, they are not and some even prominent ones never have been connected with any congregation. These must be ranked with those who assert that they claim to be Jews by race and nationality alone. All these together form the Zionists in this country. It is this same element which a short time ago endeavored to organize a most unjustifiable political Jewish separatism in this country by promoting an American-Jewish congress, a movement which is believed to be happily frustrated. They are the Sinn Feiners of American Judaism.

The situation, then, as it stands clearly presents the line of demarcation, and as stated sharply defines the attitude of, so to say, a separate sect, i. e., American Reform Jews who assert that they are Jews solely in and by religious belief. They agree with the declaration of the distinguished English scholar—Lucien Wolf—and the eminent Englishmen who compose the league of British Jews in denying that they are a separate race or nation and declaring they are simply a religious community of great antiquity.

As standard bearers of their faith through centuries of adversity do they chiefly revere the history of their people.

As American Reform Jews they assert that, without sacrificing any principle of religious faith, it is their duty to and they do conform to the country's customs and recognized institutions; they maintain that there should be no religio-politico organizations. In the congregation and its related bodies, such as the Sabbath school, the young people's associations, charitable, and perhaps fraternal institutions alone should sectarianism be expressed.

It is true that President Wilson in his letter refers to the fact that in the Balfour declaration it is the understanding that "nothing is to be done which would prejudice civic and religious rights of Jewish people now in Palestine or the rights and political status enjoyed by the Jews in other countries."

This latter reservation, important as it may be, does not affect the principle involved in the view of the Reform Jews of America who object and refuse to be hyphenated.

It will not answer for the American Zionist to say that the Palestinian nationalism is for the "other fellow." A Jewish nation means a nation of and for Jews. To divest oneself of nationality requires renunciation, which may or may not be recognized. The right of expatriation has not been universally acknowledged by governments.

A very practical objection to Zionism is that it does not tend to make its American members better Americans. On the contrary, it introduces an undesirable hyphenism predicated upon religious lines and based on religious sentiments. We are asked as 100 per cent Americans to obliterate and aid in obliterating all hyphenism in American nationality. Does it tend to such a desirable end to introduce a Palestinian national flag or to sing Palestinian national songs? The attention of our adopted Jewish citizens may well be called to their oath in forswearing allegiance to any king, potentate, or other nationality.

This war is calling attention to the fact that the oath of allegiance is not to be regarded as a "scrap of paper." To illustrate a proposition it is sometimes justifiable to present even extreme possibilities. What would be the attitude of "Zionists" in case of war between our country and their "national home land"?

Can the American Zionists think that their propaganda is conducive to better Americanism, especially for the more recent comers to our country—or will tend to make them thorough Americans? Will the cultivation of ideas or even ideals of a sentimental nature for Palestinian national restoration help to pure American citizenship? These are sterner times. Unhyphenated Americanism should be our objective.

It is said that the international policies of some of our allies favor the creation of a buffer state. The harm done by American Zionists, who are building worse than they think, in retarding if not preventing full and unalloyed American citizenship, more than counteracts any possible demands of loyalty to our allies. We are urging the abandonment of the "German-American," the "Irish-American," and so on. Shall there now be introduced the "Jewish" or "Palestinian" American? This would be the logical sequence of political Zionism.

We have but one national flag, the Stars and Stripes. We assert that there is no such thing as a Jewish flag. We do not recognize the Zionistic flag adopted by the Palestinian nationalists, nor countenance their national songs appealing for and glorifying their national homeland.

This subject in these times above all is a matter of Americanism—and there should be but little patience for these un-American Zionists. If they want a Palestinian Jewish State, let them get it if they can and go to it. It will not do for them to say it is or they want it for some other person than themselves.

We are Americans by nationality, and in our interpretation of Judaism there is neither doctrine nor dogma of Palestinian nationalism. If there were, we would reject it as inconsistent with untainted Americanism. We refuse to have any other nationalism thrust upon us. We will have no Palestinian nationality primarily or secondarily, directly or remotely. To paraphrase the language of a distinguished orator, we say to the Zionist, "You shall not press the (yellow?) badge of Palestinian hyphenism upon the Reform Jew in America."

With assurances of my highest personal esteem and regard, I remain,

Very sincerely, yours,

SIMON W. ROSENDALE.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. FRED S. PURNELL,
OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, February 17, 1918.

The House had under consideration the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. DANIEL W. COMSTOCK, late a Member of the House from the State of Indiana.

"Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the family of the deceased."

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, for many years I have known of Judge COMSTOCK as a soldier of the Civil War, as a commander in that great struggle, as prosecuting attorney, as circuit judge, as appellate judge, as department commander of the Grand Army of the Republic, and as one of the leading citizens of the great State of Indiana.

I do not recall that I ever saw him or knew who he was until the 2d day of April, 1917, when we, as new Members elect, marched down this aisle together to take the oath of office as Members of this body. I was attracted to him then and have since learned to know and love him. His tall, stately form, his keen sense of humor, his ability as a lawyer and jurist, his record as a soldier, and the general big-heartedness of the man combined to make him distinctly fascinating. Another fact entered into our brief comradeship. He and I represented the two extremes in age of the Indiana delegation, he being the oldest Member and I the youngest. In fact, with two or three exceptions, we represented the same extremes in the entire House of Representatives. When I refer to his age I do not mean to suggest that he was old, except in years and experience. To do so would do a great injustice to his memory. He was exceptionally young in mind and actions. I have observed that many people live in the past proportionally as they advance in years. It was not so with him. Judge COMSTOCK was a student of modern questions. He referred to the past only that he might profit by the experience it gave him and thereby build the better for the future. He was intensely interested in the success and conduct of this war. His only regret, as expressed to me many times, was that he could not shake off the 50 years that have come and gone since he served on the field of battle and give again to his country the same service he rendered then.

I attended his funeral and observed the high and exalted place he held in the hearts of those who knew him best. His friends and neighbors loved and respected him. To my mind this is the real test of the man. I helped to carry his lifeless form to its last resting place. When we reached the hallowed spot I thought I had never seen a more wonderful setting. Between two stately trees on the crest of a sloping hill we laid him to rest, and here he sleeps in a cemetery covered with beautiful grass and foliage and shaded by majestic trees. It looked more like a natural park than a city of the dead. What a fitting end this was to a busy and successful life. To die in the harness, so to speak, in possession of all of one's faculties and at the end of a long and useful life should be the ambition of every man. Such a life can not end with death. Such was the life of our departed colleague. His State and Nation could ill afford to lose him. His services to both will long be remembered and appreciated by a grateful people. [Applause.]

The Hospital Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM J. GRAHAM,
OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 27, 1919.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, H. R. 13026, the bill now under consideration, is entitled "A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanatorium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers and sailors."

The title is in itself a misnomer, as will be seen by examination of the bill. It is a bill the purpose of which is to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to expend $10,500,000 for additional hospital and sanatorium facilities for the treatment of discharged sick and disabled soldiers and sailors who are patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and for any other persons who are entitled to treatment by the Public Health Service. On an amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] the bill was restricted in its scope to the providing of additional hospital and sanatorium facilities for patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau alone. As the bill was originally presented these additional hospitals for which the $10,500,000 were to be expended could be used not only for discharged soldiers and sailors but for a large number of other patients who may be from time to time treated by the Public Health Service, to wit: First, merchant seamen; second, Mississippi River Commission; third, the United States Coast Guard Service; fourth, the United States Lighthouse Service; fifth, the Engineer Corps of the United States Army; sixth, the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey; seventh, civilian employees injured under the workmen's compensation act; and, eighth, civilian employees injured on Army transports. In addition to these classes, all of which are specified in the report of the majority of the committee filed with the bill, the law authorizing the Public Health Service to perform certain functions also gives to that service the right to receive into such hospitals persons from civil life who may be afflicted with diseases which the Public Health Service desires to study, and in cases of epidemics or cases where the public health demand it, a considerable number of other civilians afflicted with diseases for study and experimentation, and the like. In other words, the bill as originally drawn provided that the patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau and the discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines might be placed in these hospitals, together with many other civilians afflicted with various types of diseases, or the hospitals themselves might be filled with such civilian sick, to the exclusion of the patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

The United States declared war against the central European powers on the 6th day of April, 1917. The war-risk insurance act, so called, was approved on the 6th day of October, 1917. The act now referred to is the act under which certain discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines are entitled to hospital treatment by the Government. The authority to give such hospital treatment is found in paragraph 3 of section 302 of that act, which provides, in addition to the compensation provided for in the act:

The injured person shall be furnished by the United States such reasonable governmental medical, surgical, and hospital services * * * as the director may determine to be useful and reasonably necessary.

The War Department has known since the passage of that act that the Government was responsible for the treatment of all members of the Military Establishment of the Government who should become sick or in need of medical or hospital attention. Knowing this to be true, it was the part of wisdom, and to be expected, that the War Department or the War Risk Insurance Bureau or other responsible officer of the Government would make some adequate preparation to take care of such sick or diseased soldiers, sailors, and marines. So far as can be ascertained, no such proper arrangements have been made. While the Government of the United States was pledged to give to these defenders of the country the best medical and hospital care and attention that was possible, the Government has stumbled along without any preparedness in this matter, just as it stumbled into the war without preparedness.

The war practically ended on the 11th day of November, 1918, by the signing of the armistice. Almost three months have elapsed since that time, and to-day, after the war has been closed practically three months and when tens of thousands of men have become sick and disabled on account of the service they rendered the Government, neither the War Department nor the War Risk Insurance Bureau has brought forward any comprehensive plan toward the alleviation of the physical ailments these men have incurred. But three measures have been presented to this Congress for the relief of these discharged soldiers and sailors. One of them, called the Gandy bill—H. R. 13440—was presented to the House and was framed with the idea of removing some 400 veterans of the Civil and Spanish-American Wars from their hospital at Hot Springs, S. Dak., and removing them, in the dead of winter, across the country a thousand miles or more to some other hospital or institution and using the hospital thus emptied for the reception of sick and disabled soldiers of the present war. This bill was happily defeated; it would have been a tragedy to have done otherwise. If the bill had been to the effect that all vacant beds in that institution should be used for the accommodation of sick and disabled soldiers of the present war, not a vote would have been cast against it; but such was not the case.

Another bill—H. R. 12917—was presented, called the Dawson Springs Sanatorium bill. This bill appropriated $1,850,000 for the erection of a sanatorium at Dawson Springs, Ky., which hospital, the hearings showed, to be intended for the treatment of tuberculosis. This hospital was to be permanent and to have 500 beds. It was evident to the unprejudiced observer, from the hearings, that Dawson Springs was an unfit place for a tuberculosis sanatorium, and that even if the sanatorium were built there it would be approximately two years before it would be available, and then only for 500 patients.

Finally this bill, H. R. 13026, is presented, which is said to present a comprehensive scheme for taking care of the patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau. It will be observed that no soldier, sailor, or marine, none of the wounded or sick soldiers who are being returned from Europe now and have not been discharged can be treated in the hospitals to be built under this bill, but that this bill only includes in its scope soldiers, sailors, and marines who have been already discharged. The hearings showed that the hospitals to be built under this bill are to be of wood, not fireproof, and to be single-story structures. So far as it appears, then, they are to be largely a repetition or a duplication of the dozens of cantonments and camps scattered over the country and are to be no different, in general, than the temporary barracks which have been built already all over the United States.

Mr. N. V. Perry, constructing engineer of the Public Health Service, stated that it was expected to build these hospitals at various places, and he named Boston, Mass.; Chicago, Ill.; Cleveland, Ohio; Detroit, Mich.; Evansville, Ind.; Louisville, Ky.; Norfolk, Va.; New Orleans, La.; San Francisco, Cal.; Seattle, Wash.; St. Louis, Mo.; Wilmington, N. C.; Fort Stanton, N. Mex.; and two sanatorias, one somewhere in the Berkshire Hills and one somewhere in North Carolina. This was the comprehensive scheme that has been mentioned by the majority of the committee when they proposed this bill to the House and for which $10,500,000 is to be expended. However, it does not seem to have been comprehensive enough, because on page 44 of volume 14 of the hearings I observe that after this list had been talked over by the committee and the various witnesses the chairman of the committee, Mr. CLARK of Florida, seems to have had the following colloquy with the witness, Perry:

The CHAIRMAN. I want to revise that tentative list and put one in Florida.

Mr. PERRY. I want to say in regard to this now, we are only dealing with one-third of this proposition. We have got to come back to you people and get the balance of this; but we didn't feel like loading our hands up under the present market conditions, trying to take 13,000 all at once. We felt that it would be better to divide this up. Dawson Springs would be one proposiion. These 5,000 here would be another. Then, after we get these going we can place the others around in Florida and Georgia and the Northwest, because there are 10,000 more. All I am concerned with now is the putting up of the buildings and getting ready to take care of these men now.

Therefore I presume we may confidently expect that we are to have further requests from the Public Health Service and that instead of $10,500,000 we shall expend at least the full $26,000,000 which Mr. Perry estimated the whole program would finally cost, and I assume that we are further justified in believing that the gentleman from Florida and the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from the Northwest—wherever that may be—will each get their share of hospital construction in the future. It will be remembered that these are to be frame buildings, temporary, and not fireproof.

The hearings showed that there were approximately 50,000 vacant beds in the United States that might be used for this purpose. These beds are in Army hospitals of various kinds, general and temporary. The officials from the office of the Surgeon General of the United States Army testified before the committee that if they had the authority they would take care of these war-risk insurance patients. When the Dawson Springs Hotel matter was being discussed on the floor of the House I placed in the RECORD a statement showing the vacant beds in these hospitals and this committee had this table in its hearings, and at that time knew this to be the situation. No move has been made by anyone on this committee or connected with the Government to try to propose legislation that would make these existing hospital facilities available for the use of the war-risk insurance patients. It could have been done by a brief act or resolution which would have been passed unanimously and might have been the law before this.

If this bill becomes the law we may expect the Public Health Service to at once proceed to the building of a large number of additional temporary hospitals over the country, although we already have scores of them. As soon as this bill becomes a law we may also expect the Public Health Service to greatly expand its personnel and to come to Congress for authority to do so. A great number of clerks and employees and stenographers and all the machinery to which we have become so used during this war will be built up, called an organization. It was admitted by the committee on the floor of the House that this would call for a great expansion of the department. Then at once buildings will be rented or constructed for the use of this new expanded Public Health Service of the Government. The next step will be to come to Congress for appropriations of millions to carry on the increased activities of this department; and before we know it we shall find that we have added to our financial burdens another greatly enlarged branch of our Government which will cost us millions to maintain. While we are doing this the Surgeon General of the United States Army has built up an immense organization under him, composed of the best physicians and surgeons in the country, a great force of whom are still in the service of the Army and under the Surgeon General, and which organization is now available to take care of these patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau. Why not use the existing force for that purpose? Why has not the committee suggested to the Congress some legislation to make available the existing force rather than to create a new force and an immense additional expenditure? In addition to this, the President had power, under the so-called Overman Act, approved May 20, 1918, "to make such redistribution of functions among executive agencies as he may deem necessary, including any functions, duties, and powers hitherto conferred by law upon any executive department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer, in such manner as in his judgment shall seem best fitted to carry out the purposes of this act." In other words, the President might cause the Surgeon General's Department to care for these patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau by a mere Executive order; but it has not been done and will not be done.

I am forced to the conclusion that there is no desire on the part of anyone connected with the Public Health Service or the War Risk Insurance Bureau who is attempting to put into effect any measures for the economical administration of the war-risk insurance act. Rather it seems to be the effort of those who are responsible for this bill to create more positions, spend more money, and add greater burdens to the already taxation-burdened people of the country.

It goes without saying that those who have become wounded or sick and disabled through their service to the country in this emergency are entitled to the best treatment that a grateful people can give them. Surely, they are entitled to vastly better treatment than this bill proposes. The Government ought to have made adequate preparations and had ready for them the best of permanent fireproof hospitals and facilities for taking care of every one of them. Nothing of the kind has been done. This scheme intends nothing but to continue the present shiftless, purposeless, planless idea of spending money and creating new and expensive Federal organizations. But it is the only thing that is proposed. We now have but a month remaining of this Congress. Legislation to use the existing organizations of the Government to care for these patients would not be possible unless it was proposed by the majority party in this House and favored by the executive officers of the Government. This they do not propose to do. We must therefore accept such scanty measures for the relief of the patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau as are offered us by those who are now responsible for the policies of the Government. It may be that the expenditure of the $10,500,000 will help some few who have borne the Nation's burdens in this time of trouble, and therefore, as it is the only thing that is or shall be presented, I shall vote for the bill.

Discharges for Soldiers.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN Q. TILSON,
OF CONNECTICUT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 1, 1919.

Mr. TILSON. Under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I insert here a few letters from soldiers and others. They are selected from an accumulation of almost 500 letters received by me within a few days after making some observations on the subject of good faith in granting discharges to soldiers.

My intention in presenting the matter originally was to call attention to the fact that in numerous cases officers had flagrantly violated the spirit of certain orders of the War Department, and by so doing were bringing discredit upon themselves and reproach upon the good name of the Army. At any rate, it served to bring out what was smoldering in many a soldier's breast, and I am sure that many of them will feel better for it. After eliminating all cases that smack of mere homesickness, laziness, or grouch, there remain a sufficiently large number of bone fide cases to demonstrate conclusively that officers, especially of the lower grades, in command of organizations made a mockery of Circular 77 of 1918 and openly disregarded Circular 6 of 1919.

The letters here printed were selected almost at random. They group themselves into about six general classes, though many of them overlap and cover a number of different points.

The first group relate to applications on the ground of dependents. As the selective draft law itself was liberal in this respect, this class of applications should have been granted easily and freely. Quite the reverse has been the case, as some of these letters show.

It is well worth while that these spontaneous outpourings from the hearts of some of our soldier boys who have endured the hardships of camp without any of the glory of foreign service be spread upon the record.

The letters are as follows:

CAMP UPTON, N. Y., January 17, 1919.

Hon. JOHN Q. TILSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. TILSON: I am writing to you to explain the circumstances under which some of the men are being held in the Army.

I have already written to Mr. GLYNN, and he promises some action, and after reading in the morning paper the speech you made in the House, thought you would be able and willing to help also.

I am a married man and, due to a recent illness combined with chronic nervousness, my wife is absolutely dependent upon my work for support.

She writes me to-day that she has only $2 left, and this is the last of a fund of cash and liberty bonds that I left for her when I was drafted.

She can place no confidence in the Government allotment, as the War Risk Bureau is not concerned in making payments, but in drawing their own checks. In four months she has received $56, and even if she had received all the money due it would have been insufficient. It is absolutely impossible to feed, clothe, and keep any one person on $30 a month. The Government can't keep a man in the camps for that money. How can a woman live outside for less than the Army can keep me?

It is not only my case but that of many others in this camp—five in this one company—all married and have positions waiting, and we are held here to aid in the demobilization.

We all did our duty and objected not at all while our country needed our service; and though we did not get our chance at the Hun, we did our bit here. Our records are clean; the need of us is past; and we want to return to our natural positions with our wives. We were married. For that reason and before our Holy Father we pledge our support to the girl of our choice. Shall we not be allowed to return and take up that duty, now that we have fulfilled our obligations to the country?

We came here to support all that our flag stood for—liberty, justice, and democracy—and now that we enforce those principles on the Hun, why not get the same principles applied to ourselves?

We have the privilege of applying for discharge, but that is another case of the inefficiency of the Army administration. We are told that we must be held, as our services "can not be spared," and we discharge hundreds of men every day. Young men of 21 were discharged from Camp Jackson through this camp, and they were mostly clerks in civil life. Why could not these young men be held—the men who had no homes to support, no wives waiting, and no positions to go to? No reason—just thoughtless, inefficient administration and absolute injustice.

The conscientious objectors and draft dodgers are all discharged, and honorably discharged in the bargain. Is that justice?

If the men held here were paid the same wage as an officer, or even if the allotment was sufficient to help at home, they would not object.

I draw from the Army $33; $15 goes for allotment, $3.45 for insurance, and if I am lucky I can go home. This takes $10 for car fare. Then for smokes and amusements I can spend $4.55, and I have to write to my wife at least every other day.

The Republican Party is losing time by not taking this matter up. They are assured of a thousand boosters right in this camp that I know of if they do, and if they don't I'll place my loose change on Eugene Debs for next President.

We did our duty, Mr. TILSON, and ask now that our country do hers.

Our papers boast that our demobilization is far ahead of England. We are far behind. The Englishman who has a job and a home is going back to it. We who have those things are staying here to send others back to take our positions away.

Look at the New York American some morning and count the ads. from honorably discharged men. There is a big answer to our boast.

MEDICAL SUPPLY DEPOT,
Camp Merritt, N. J., January 22, 1919.

DEAR SIR: Learning of your interest in behalf of enlisted men who have urgent grounds for discharge and are unable to obtain satisfaction, I am prompted to present my case for your consideration. I am inclosing copies of my papers and holding originals, awaiting some new light.

On December 17, 1918, I made application to my detachment commander for discharge, at the same time presenting the inclosed doctor's certificate and letter from my local board. He in turn wrote to the Red Cross headquarters of Perth Amboy, N. J., requesting them to investigate my claim. They wrote back recommending my discharge, finding the evidence true and meriting an immediate discharge. The detachment commander then forwarded the papers to the office of the camp supply officer, whence they were returned with the second indorsement, "Not enough evidence."

Thereupon I submitted the inclosed affidavits of my father and one from the vice president of the Perth Amboy Trust Co., as per suggestion of my detachment commander. The papers went back to the office of the camp supply officer and were again returned with the third indorsement, stating that my discharge could not be approved at this time.

I am a private, first class, in the medical section of the purchase and storage division of the Quartermaster Corps, and outside of helping with the inventory, which was completed about a week ago, I have done nothing more than waste time. I am at a loss to understand why I am being kept, especially since it is so vital for me to be released at once.

My father's health is fast giving away. Both the business and he are suffering. Neither can he find the time to care for his health nor will his health permit him to take the proper care of the business.

I hope that you will give this matter your kind attention and advise me if you can help me. If you then desire the original papers, I shall forward them at once.

DETACHMENT SANITARY CORPS,
Camp A. A. Humphreys, Va., January 18, 1919.

DEAR SIR: Having read of your splendid appeal in our behalf, we will submit this case to your investigation, or anything that you may do to help us. We have for a commander Second Lieut. ———. Two-thirds of the men in this detachment have been in the service from 12 to 15 months, and nearly the same number of us have immediate dependents—wives and children. We have filed requests for discharge to our commanding officer, and to date they are piled upon his desk entirely ignored. When asked about the requests, he answers, usually, "You're making more money than you ever made in your life. What do you want to get out of the Army for?" We worked night and day at the base hospital during the raging of the influenza, and we don't feel as if we were being treated fair. If there is anything you can do, sir, to help us, please do it and we will appreciate it surely, as the allotment and the allowance isn't sufficient to meet the needs of our families.

We are,
Respectfully, yours,
DETACHMENT SANITARY CORPS.

FORT HAMILTON, N. Y., January 16, 1919.

DEAR SIR: Am a married man, supporting three children, and have sent a letter through military channels, with three sworn affidavits before a notary public, to be discharged from the Army. Other men have put in same time and are discharged, but I can not hear from mine. It is impossible for me to support a wife and three children, and I would like to know if you can do anything for me.

Please let me know if you can, and how I should apply. Seems like it has been pigeonholed at Governors Island, Fort Jay, N. Y. Hoping a reply.

CAMP RARITAN, N. J.

DEAR SIR: There are over 4,000 men at Camp Raritan; many are from Connecticut. Hundreds of married men, enlisted and drafted, who have dependents have applied for a discharge, showing that they have a job waiting for them. Many of these applications are backed by the American Red Cross affidavit from their home towns, stating and confirming the fact that these men have dependents and are needed at home. Many of these men are working for $1 per day, as they have been doing for seven and eight months.

Many just applications for the discharge of married men have been in for two, three, and four weeks. Nothing is ever heard of them, showing that they are ignored and not being considered at all. The office is as far as they seem to get.

Many of these men have been in the service 10 and 12 months and are still being held, while others from other camps are being discharged who have seen but from 1 to 4 months.

The married men with dependents have had their applications for discharge in for two, three, and four weeks, backed by Red Cross affidavits, and showing that they have dependents and a position waiting for them. In spite of the above facts, they are being held in the service, while single men who have seen but two and three months' service are being discharged from other camps. Many of these married men with dependents are from your home State. Many are afraid of the guardhouse and the "unjust" court-martial. That is the reason they have never written to you stating facts concerning their troubles.

These men thank you for your good work you are doing in their interest.

Any private soldier who can be seen on the streets of New Brunswick any day or night will gladly tell you of the affairs herein referred to, which need competent readjustment. Any friends of yours from this vicinity are familiar with the facts and will gladly inform you of same. The married men with dependents should be given some consideration at this camp.

There are rumors that the officers are stockholders or interested in the company of Snare & Triest, contractors, now doing work at this camp; consequently married men with dependents are being held. Many are doing nothing, as a little investigation will show. If you will have some of your friends of this vicinity ask some of the soldiers from this camp their opinion, you will receive some information that will more than surprise you. Kindly consider this letter strictly confidential, because if we are found guilty of giving any true information we will be court-martialed.

Again thanking you for your kind interest in behalf of the worthy married men with dependents of this and other camps, I remain,
Respectfully,
———— ————.

HAMPTON, VA.,
DEBARKATION HOSPITAL NO. 51,
Barrack F, January 19, 1919.

DEAR SIR: After having read your article in the paper concerning discharges of men on application, I appeal to you to ask you if you can do anything in regard to my discharge. Having made application about the last week of November (1918), and having received no answer concerning it as yet, I feel your influence can help in getting it for me.

I am a married man. My wife having just given birth to a son on January 13, 1919, and she now, or was when I left her, in poor condition in St. Mary Hospital, at Waterbury, Conn., and is in need of my support, her father and mother both being in ill health, with three children under 16 to support. The Red Cross people, of Waterbury, Conn., where I live, will verify the above statement. I am now stationed at Hospital No. 51, Soldiers' Home, Hampton, Va. There are here about 90 men in the company known as the port utilities, and the majority of them are domestic-service men. I am safe in saying that two-thirds of the men are practically doing nothing. There are 30 men doing work that has always been taken care of by about 8 civilians before, and it is costing the Government about two-thirds more money now than before we were stationed here.

Trusting you will look into this matter, I beg to remain,
Yours, truly,
———— ————.

DEAR SIR: Reading of the great work you are doing in the House of Representatives for the boys that have carried the burden of this great war, I wish to say I will never forget your name at any time where I can use my voice. And for God's sake dear Senator do not stop until you have won for us what we have been told we were fighting for, and that is democracy.

I am also one of those boys that is hard hit by my commanding officer's narrow-minded way of working. I have been a sergeant carpenter in the Camp Utilities Detachment and have served 15 months, have a clear record, and certainly have done my bit while the war lasted, for we have worked as many as 7 days a week and 14 hours a day, but with a record as clear as mine I am still denied the right to go home to support my wife and child.

I have applied for my discharge about the 28th of November. On the 20th of December my supply sergeant returned my three blanks, which never reached the commander of Camp Upton. I have made three more of these blanks out on the 30th of December. I also had two affidavits of friends of mine, with a statement from a family doctor and a letter from one of my employers. This I done for my commanding officer. Lieut. Starin told me that this is the only way I could get discharged, and he also stated that he would let me go. This met with about the same as the first, for it was disapproved without any investigation of my home troubles. I have been asked to make out the third one on the 17th of January, and to-day, the 18th of January, I already have heard it has been disapproved and at the same time this Lieut. Starin has told me on the 17th of January that he will do all he can to let me go. Now, dear sir, can you tell me how it is that the commanding officer, Lieut. Starin, in charge of the carpenters, tells me this and the major disapproves my discharge? Is there no justice coming to the boys that have served their country as a faithful servant?

I am a married man; have a wife and child that is in need of my support, for this little boy of mine is only 4 months old and is a breast baby, which makes it impossible for my wife to help support herself. I also have a mother-in-law, who is a very sickly woman and can only work when her health allows her. But my family must suffer because I am a mechanic, and I am told I am indispensable.

Here is how I am indispensable. Last year this detachment numbered only about 350 men, and we have kept this big camp going, and at that time this camp holding about 50,000 men. To-day we have about 600 men in our detachment, and there is only about 15,000 men in this camp, and still we married men with children and I, being in debt for about $250, am now indispensable.

I am and have been working at things that do not amount to a pinch of snuff, such as building tables for garbage cans after doing without them for 15 months in our detachment. A dog house is a great thing to be compelled to build in the Army when I am needed at home for support. Taking down a mess counter and a center post in a mess kitchen in our barracks that has been only built and then be compelled to build a fighting ring, only to be torn down and rebuilt again by one of our other boys. This is only a little part of our exceedingly carpenter work we are doing.

I hope you will look in this matter, as I can not look upon this much longer without doing something, and there will have to be a dishonorable discharge, for I would much rather prefer that than to see my family in need of my support.

The burden of the next group of letters selected is that the men are being kept at great sacrifice to themselves, at great expense to the Government, and that they are not doing any substantial amount of useful work:

DEAR SIR: The men in the mustering office of Camp Dix, N. J., would like very much to voice their approval of the articles in yesterday's New York Herald, Sun, and World relative to your speech on the delay in mustering out men urgently needed at home on both business and dependency reasons.

It is an outrage the way we are being treated here. Do they think we are slaves, and must we tear this place apart before they will listen to the requests of our employers in civil life and that of our dependents?

In this mustering office are about 125 men, with some 7 officers, doing work, in the main, that is absolutely unnecessary, and work that could be done by any 10-year-old child. The work consists of looking over papers already finished for mistakes, and could be done by less than 30 men. This big force of men spend on an average of three-fourths of their time doing absolutely nothing but fool the time away. The officers in this camp (headquarters and personnel) are doing all they can to hang on to the men for no other reason than it gives them an excuse to hold on to their jobs, as we plainly see every day.

They were seen to read the newspaper articles of yesterday with sneers and sarcastic laughter, with the remarks that nobody had anything on them. We used to get our applications back, but no more, as they simply tell us now that we can't be spared. This is as big a lie as it is a farce, as the officers' pets, particularly in this office, have been discharged through the simple means of transferring them to some unit up for immediate discharge; otherwise, the men that have been discharged from this office have only done so by fighting tooth and nail over the heads of the officers here in camp or by practically having their dependents beg their release by groveling in the dust on bended knees.

The officers tell us that we are highly trained men—doing work that any child could do.

The investigating committees and the newspaper reporters that come down here and are received by the officers in charge have their ears pumped full of dope prepared in advance, and we are usually notified a few minutes in advance of their coming and forced to act extremely busy. If you ask any of the men any questions, they don't dare tell them the truth for fear of court-martial, which is a threat hanging over them at all times.

Why, in the name of heaven, don't they get Regular Army men for this work or some of those idle clerks in Washington that would be glad to do this kind of work?

There are a lot of men here that are having jobs held for them and which they will lose if they can't get out of the Army. Do they want us to swell the army of unemployed after we get out of here?

We most sincerely hope that your efforts will not be in vain and that good will come of it, as it certainly is an outrage the way we are being handled on the question of discharges.

Capt. ———— and Col. ———— are the men in charge of this office, and they work hand in glove with the rest of the officers in headquarters to hold as many men as possible.

The average man here doesn't dare say anything for fear of punishment.

THE MEN FROM THE MUSTERING OFFICE,
Camp Dix, N. J.

MOTOR TRANSPORT CORPS, CAMP JOHNSTON, FLA.

DEAR SIR: The boys in our company read with great relief that someone was awake to the undue delay in the discharge of men from idle units.

For weeks we have been practically idle, with no more and generally less than 10 repair jobs for a hundred and more men.

In the motorcycle repair park, in which I work, are 30 men, including the office force, and if we have five repair jobs going on at once we can consider ourselves extremely busy. There are hardly more than 50 machines on duty in camp, and surely it doesn't take 30 men to keep 50 machines in repair.

The motor-car and motor-truck shops are similarly affected, having sent by far the greater part of their machines to Camp Jessup, Ga.

There have been some men discharged from our unit with good dependency and business reasons, and some that we call "handshakers" that got out without good reasons. There are at present a great many men in our company that have presented excellent reasons for discharge and have been turned down.

The most irritating part of it is that there is so little for us to do but loaf, loaf, loaf.

If you can use some names of men and their particular cases, I will be glad to furnish them.

HONORABLE SIR: I was reading your speech in the paper this a. m. In regards to the officers holding us in the Army because they were getting higher salary than they ever got, it appealed to me very much. I have been in this Army nearly 18 months and I have been rejected five times for oversea service, and I was put in a labor company. I have been trying to get out on my profession. I am an embalmer. I have had license since 1st of September, 1910, and the firm I used to work for is very much in need of me. The influenza is very bad around my home, and he is the only licensed embalmer. Of Badger P. Wood, Petersburg, Va., I received letter after letter asking me to try and get out, and I have asked the captain about it several times, and he told me it was no use, because my discharge would not go through. Now, the war is over and I want to get out. We are doing nothing. They even send the men out of our company to do kitchen police for other companies and put some of them in the warehouses, and they are lying around doing nothing. We have three labor companies, all of them rejected men. We have 301, 302, 306, and you can judge the rest for yourself, and the remark has been made around here by one of the officers that he would hold us three years if he could. You are right in everything you said. We know, but we are afraid to say anything. You know what we will get—about six months in the guardhouse. The firm I worked for has written my company commander several letters, and he hasn't received any answer from either one of them. And if you can do anything to help me, it would be greatly appreciated, and for God's sake do not breathe what I have written you. If you do I will get about 12 months.

UTILITIES CONSTRUCTION DIVISION,
Upton, Long Island.

HONORED SIR: Your arraignment in the House on January 15, charging officers not acting in good faith in handling applications for discharges has come to our attention through the press, and we heartily indorse your opinion. You have struck the right point in your reasoning, that many Army officers are holding better jobs to-day than they ever did before. We are subjects of exactly same injustice in this organization, where our case needs to be investigated, as there seems to be no other way to be freed from the hands of our superior officers, who keep us here for their own benefit.

It is more than a clear fact that this organization, under the title of Utilities Detachment of Camp Upton, has been put on the ground of a permanent character, employing soldiers of various physical status, and especially limited and domestic service men, regardless of their immediate need at the head of their home.

During the time of war, when camp activities were at a height, this organization operated with 350 men, and had done considerable work during this period. Now, with the construction at a standstill, the head of this outfit has maneuvered so that he is now holding 720 men, part of which is absolutely in idle condition. For example, in the executive department there are 12 men, ranking as follows:

One lieutenant in charge; two sergeants; two corporals; seven privates.

Is it not surprising, when we consider that this same office had been managed in 1917 and 1918 with only three men in charge. This is a flagrant fact, and the rest of the offices as well as outside branches are in similar condition. It is an outrage.

Just another example: In time of war this organization had 17 plumbers, but at present they are holding 57.

Many of us, thinking we may profit from the privilege given to us by the War Department, have filed application for discharge, only to have them disapproved without the least investigation as to the true character of our claims. One fellow even was threatened to be sent to guardhouse for insisting to get application blanks from an inferior officer. We are unfortunately the victims of these capricious officers in charge of us, who want to keep us for reasons above our knowledge, when we have absolutely nothing to do and have to struggle in vain for our liberty, with broken spirit and naturally lack of patriotism.

We think we deserve consideration, and as we have no friends to defend our cause, we appeal to you, as your attitude seems to be a just one in this matter of holding men for unknown purposes to let their relatives suffer the consequences. We earnestly request you to be interpreter of our sad condition and try to obtain a favorable solution for which we are looking forward with still a little light of hope left in our hearts. We simply are begging you to save us from the cruelties of these superior men in cleverness exercising the power given to them with utmost severity. There is no prospect for us to be released of serving like slaves before the end of this year. Although it is surprising that same organization under different name has a force of 1,750 civilians who get $7 a day and work on the side of us soldiers.

In putting these facts before you we have the indorsement of our fellow soldiers and believe that in the name of humanity we will share equally all the rights which are given to us by laws and nature.

Respectfully,

A SERGEANT.
A PRIVATE.

P. S.—We did not dare to put our names in full, because we believe we are liable to be strictly pursued should this letter fall into the hands of some Army officials.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL.

DEAR SIR: May I compliment you upon your speech of yesterday in regard to the discharge of enlisted men. Your sentiments meet with the hearty approval of the enlisted personnel of this department. Many of them, promising young lawyers with growing practices, barred by physical defects from more active service, in order to help their country sought voluntary induction into this department to act as law clerks—at least they were informed that they would be so used when they made application for induction.

Now that the great emergency has ceased they seek to return to their practices and to recoup their fortunes,—for theirs is a real sacrifice, the pay of an enlisted man being wholly insufficient to meet the exorbitant charges of this city. Their positions await them, there is need for them at home, two of the men will lose positions paying several thousand dollars a year unless they return soon, yet they are held here—for what reasons unless those set forth in your speech we are unable to determine.

There is little or no work to be done. It is a fact that some of the men average less than three hours of work a day. The work is of the lowest type—acting as messenger boys, as mimeograph operators, as typists; in short, as everything but law clerks. Nor is it as though civilians could not be obtained to perform these lowly duties; little or no attempt has been made to do so, for, as we have been informed, a military establishment is preferred.

It is therefore with relief and pleasure that we learn that Congress is turning its attention to these matters and that we may soon obtain that just treatment, untouched by personal ambitions, upon which the success of the draft principle vitally depends.

With best wishes for this new year, and sincere regards, I am,

Very truly, yours,

——— ———.

CAMP UPTON, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: In yesterday morning's World there was reported a speech which you had made in the House of Representatives relative to the method of making Army discharges. During the course of your speech you mentioned that some Army officers had better jobs than at any period of their lives, and in order to make their own jobs good they were refusing discharges to soldiers who desired discharges. The foregoing statement is particularly applicable to the conditions at present existing in the office of the camp utilities at this camp. I happen to know, as I am employed in that particular office myself. "Did I say employed?" Pardon me; I was mistaken. I am not employed in the office, but I am only spending my time there, as I do not do any work, but simply put in my appearance in the morning. During the day I read such literature as is to be found in the office, and there is plenty of it here, the morning and evening papers, and such letters as need to be written. I receive $36 per month, but do not earn 36 cents. I am not the only one who is trying to kill time here. There are three men besides myself employed in what is called the service order section, making a total of four. One man could handle the whole business and still find time to read a book of 300 pages each day. Altogether in my department, the administration, there are 11 men employed, whereas 4 men could handle the work, and still find time hanging on their hands. The foregoing situation is typical of this office. There are about three times as many men employed as are necessary. I am a class C, limited-service man, and am hanging around this office doing absolutely nothing, yet am rated as an indispensable man. All the men who could be spared from this office are being held up on their discharges, being told they are indispensable. Why are they rated as indispensable? Neither you nor any other man can answer that question, except to say that these men are not indispensable. Don't you think that such a condition is pretty rotten? Four hundred and twenty-four dollars are paid in wages every month in the administration department, which expenditure is absolutely unnecessary. The facts which I have stated in this letter are absolutely true.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Your wonderful speech, part of which was published in the New York World, relative to men being held in the Army because a few officers higher up desired to keep their organizations up to their full strength, was read by all of the members of the camp dental detachment, and my, what applause. It struck the nail right on the head. Every word of which I honestly say and can prove. I think perhaps if you knew these facts you might be able to do something for some of us boys who are absolutely wasting Government funds and ruining our futures. We idle away our time in the most disgraceful manner, and if you only knew the kind of work we do. In this camp there are three dental infirmaries, over 30 first lieutenants drawing salaries approximately at $200 per month, including allotments. There are approximately 100 privates, a great many sergeants, corporals, first-class privates, two captains, and a colonel. I am positive the pay roll of the staff, exclusive of the colonel's, is approximately $20,000 per month. Now, figure food rations, clothes, fuel, electricity, and dental supplies. Why, the figures are immense, and to cap the climax the men have almost nothing to do. A majority of the lieutenants are begging to be discharged, but the answer is always "no." I personally have a chance of my lifetime to resume my business, which I strove very hard to build, but on technicalities I am kept here, wasting the best days of my life, idling away my best days, and there are lots of others. Look at the record of work done. It is outrageous. Investigate these facts, and please, for God's sake, make the Military Committee break up such an exorbitant expenditure of moneys. The boys are all anxious to go home and resume their careers as civilians.

Picture this scene. I am almost going insane from worry, and because of men higher up, as you stated, I am held here. * * *

In time of war we had about 90,000 men in camp and no more than 25 dentists and 25 enlisted men. Now, in time of peace, with only about 20,000 men in camp, we have over 50 first lieutenants and almost 100 enlisted men and hardly any work. They have to go out and lasso patients. Very few come there voluntarily, and then when they get there the officers start to work on them and in a day or two they are discharged, work incomplete, and what is the result? They are not any better off. Please, Mr. Congressman, bring these facts to light and expose this organization and save the Government from any such wild expenditures and save the boys from becoming idlers and also from losing all of their ambition.

If you desire I will be only too happy to appear before the Military Committee in private, as I do not wish my name mentioned and am not seeking any notoriety.

Trusting you will investigate the truth of these assertions, I am,

Very respectfully,

——— ———.

CAMP UPTON, N. Y., January 16, 1919.

HONORABLE SIR: Have read of your speech which was published in to-day's newspapers relative to men being held in the various camps throughout the country who have people dependent upon them for support, and also men who have business and positions waiting for them upon their release from the Army. You sure have been very well advised in this matter, and I wish to state that at this camp there are men who have filed applications under the rules and whose applications have been turned down. The commanding officers in many instances have refused to accept the soldier's application, and when they do accept them they forward them to the higher officers with a statement that the soldier is doing very important work and can not be spared when, as a matter of fact, a 9-year-old schoolboy could do this so-called important work. The officers are very anxious to stay in the Army and keep as many as possible in with them, so as to make their positions very secure. I think that you should see that there is an investigation started to ascertain why the men are being held in the camps in this country, especially those men who have business and positions waiting for them. It is a very funny thing to look at the daily papers and see the number of men who are advertising for positions at clerical work who have been discharged from the Army. There sure should be some consideration given to a business man or a man with dependents who has immediate work to go to. In this camp there is a labor board established, which, from all appearance, is a sinecure for some who are in right. These men, I am informed, receive the sum of $9 per day for sitting around looking wise. They don't do anything all day themselves, as they have a detail of soldiers furnished them every day to do the work which they are supposed to do. That is one of the reasons why they are holding some soldier for "important work."

Trusting that you will continue the good work which you have started, and assuring you that it is greatly appreciated by a large number of soldiers in this and the many other camps throughout the country, I beg to remain,

———.

CAMP UPTON, N. Y., January 16, 1919.

SIR:

* * * * * * *

I am a resident of New York State, but as this matter is one which concerns all, and since you expressed yourself in your speech of yesterday on this matter, I take the liberty of addressing you. I am forwarding you an exact copy of my application, which was submitted as shown; but I am not forwarding this requesting action from you in my personal case, but to submit one of many, others even more deserving than mine, also showing the action taken here.

Since this application was submitted I have twice been transferred to different departments or sections of the personnel office of this camp, each time doing absolutely nothing, to speak in truth. At the present time I do for an average day:

Report for duty at 9 or thereabouts in the morning, wait for my personal mail, and if there is any answer those that require to be answered, but do not fail to watch the hour for mess, leaving at 11.15 a. m. and returning therefrom generally about 2 o'clock in the afternoon. Read the afternoon papers or such other literature as there is time for until the evening mess at 4.30 p. m. I have expressed myself in the matter: "The letter or two that I do write now and then certainly is not worth 10 cents of the dollar and a quarter that I receive daily, besides the other necessary allotments received by a soldier."

I have no objections whatsoever of your using my name in connection with this letter or the contents of any part thereof. The only object of this letter is to show that conditions really do exist as expressed by you, and that there are many officers who have declared that their jobs in the Army are the best that they have ever had, and a perusal of their qualification cards will show this.

The following letter was brought to me by a messenger who is a noncommissioned officer. It is signed by a number of sergeants, corporals, and privates, whose names are withheld for obvious reasons, as are the names in other cases:

PORT OF EMBARKATION,
Newport News, Va., January 21, 1919.

DEAR SIR: In a recent paper your address in regard to discharging of soldiers has come to our attention. The undersigned men wish to express their appreciation of your championship in this cause and state conditions as they are here.

Take the engineering and construction branch of the port utilities, for instance: During the war the work of this department, which included the engineering works concerned mainly in construction of cantonments, waterworks, sewers, etc., at Camps Stuart, Hill, and Alexander, was accomplished with expediency by attached officers, civilian employees, and enlisted personnel, as follows:

DURING THE WAR.

One captain.
Two lieutenants.
Two civilian engineers.
One civilian stenographer.
One civilian draftsman.
Eighteen enlisted men.

Although there is practically no new construction work at the present time, this branch has been increased in number of attached personnel by 3 captains, 2 lieutenants, 1 civilian employee, and 38 enlisted men, making

AT PRESENT

Four captains.
Four lieutenants.
Five civilians.
Fifty-six enlisted men.

In this branch work is slack and what there is of it is mostly useless duplication, yet men having excellent grounds for discharge meet every obstacle that their immediate higher officers can place in the way. These obstacles take the form of conditional recommendations with impossible conditions, return of papers several times for correction of minor mistakes, holding papers without action until repeated requests for action are made, and similar quibbles. Under these conditions the men are becoming discouraged and learning something different from the enthusiastic service once rendered. In one case of this kind cited above a man with dependents risked court-martial by going over the head of his company commander and making a personal appeal to the general in command of this port. His case was examined and he was discharged immediately. This would seem to show that these conditions are not caused by the higher officers but by the captains and lieutenants in command of detachments.

Aside from the matter of discharges, we desire to call your attention to the manner of recruiting the labor and utilities detachments at this port. After the signing of the armistice men who enlisted in combatant companies, with the understanding that the act of enlisting gave them their choice of service, were transferred to labor and utilities detachments, while their comrades were demobilized. A particularly flagrant case of this kind is at hand. A private, formerly of the Second Engineers and 16 months in France, a veteran of Chateau-Thierry, gassed, and wounded so that the hearing of one ear is lost, was transferred to the utilities detachment as a house painter two weeks after arriving in this port. This does not seem to be justice to the men who were sent away with cheers and promises as to the welcome that awaited them when they came home.

Respectfully.

[Signed by a number of sergeants and other enlisted men.]

Some of the men object very properly to being worked indefinitely alongside of civilians receiving high wages.

EDGEWOOD ARSENAL,
Edgewood, Md., January 16, 1919.

HONORABLE DEAR SIR: Having read with interest the article in today's New York World that deals with your activities in Congress as relating to the speedy discharge of soldiers, I am taking the liberty of writing you on this subject.

Permit me to acquaint you with a few facts concerning the attitude of the officers at Edgewood Arsenal in so far as the discharge of enlisted men is concerned:

Out of a personnel of some 7,500 men they have already discharged some 4,000 enlisted men and those officers who had signified their willingness to get back into civilian life. No one seems to know what method was pursued in discharging the men, but we do know that when they got rid of this amount they seemed perfectly satisfied, and we know now that when a soldier goes to the trouble of having papers and affidavits filled out requesting his discharge, and giving as the reasons dependency or the fact that he has a good job awaiting him, he is plainly told that his application for discharge will not be considered, because the whole outfit will be discharged in the course of a few weeks. We have been told this for a good many weeks past, and it seems that there is always a few weeks between the time one wishes to get out and the time they are going to discharge us all. Sometimes they take a soldier's papers, and they are either thrown into the wastebasket or pigeonholed.

To make you better acquainted with conditions here, it will be necessary for me to briefly outline what we have been doing here. Perhaps you already know that this is the one place that the United States Army depended upon for their supply of poisonous gases, in bulk, in shells, and in hand grenades. The plant was constructed at a cost of some $60,000,000, a good portion of which represents the pay roll of civilian laborers who have worked alongside of $30-per-month soldiers, while they were reaping a harvest with fat pay envelopes every week. You can imagine what dangers are to be met with in a plant of this kind, where the poisonous gases are ever ready to leak out and snatch away some one's life or to maim them for the rest of their days. The highly paid civilians did not have to face any of those dangers, for they worked only on new buildings or in places well out of the danger zone, while all hazardous work was done by the soldiers. No one complained because of this state of affairs, for we all rejoiced in the fact that we were helping the cause by doing the work that was required of us, at the same time lamenting the fact that we were denied the privilege of going overseas.

Now, after the armistice has been signed things have changed. Most of the civilians have been discharged, and the soldiers, who have suffered all sorts of hardships and who have been denied all the privileges for which our armies were fighting, are compelled to stay here and do the work that could very well be done by civilians.

As in all big plants there are different departments here, such as operating, maintenance, and construction, and they are in turn subdivided into different branches, such as carpenter, plumbing, chemical, electrical, etc. Most of this sort of work, as you know, requires highly skilled labor, so the men appointed to do this work were selected by carefully going over the questionnaires. As I have stated above, the men who were discharged were selected without regard to what work they were doing. It seems as though they were trying to get enough of them out of the way so as to hold the rest here without any criticism from the War Department, and then the officers, who have better jobs than most of them ever had before, could remain here in peace. This slipshod method of discharging has made a shortage of soldiers in some sections of the plant. To offset this they have in a good many cases transferred soldiers who are skilled mechanics to such jobs as firing the boilers, hauling ashes, policing up, or to any common laboring work.

Our point is this: If the Government could afford to pay high prices for civilian labor prior to November 11, it could well afford to have this work done now by civilians and discharge the soldiers, who have done their bit here. Most of the boys have good jobs waiting for them on the outside. If the plea is made that we are needed here, we would gladly stay as civilians, for then we would at least be getting enough salary to get at least the enjoyment out of life that the Lord intended.

It is very evident that something is wrong. Doesn't it look very much as though the officers here are afraid of losing their good jobs? You can easily understand the feeling among the boys at this post, and you can see why none of us are very anxious to remain here at common laboring work in the uniform of a United States soldier. We have been issued but one winter dress suit and one pair of leggins, and still we are expected to work in those clothes and at the same time try to look halfway decent when we go on pass.

This plant up to November 11 has been run continually on three eight-hour shifts, and in addition we had one and one-quarter hour Infantry drill each day and one and one-half hours' gas-mask drill three evenings each week. Sundays and holidays were an unknown quantity here. We have work day in and day out, receiving no credit and asking none. And all that we ask now is an immediate discharge, so that we can throw off the bonds of slavery or of conscripted labor, whichever you might call it. We appeal to you to champion our cause.

I might add that the officers are at a loss for enough work to keep all the soldiers busy, and many of us are told to hang around and be ready when wanted. With civilian labor and good management, this plant could be run with one-fourth the number of men that are now being used. When you consider that the Government has to clothe and feed a soldier as well as give him medical attention, it would be a saving over the present method.

Trusting that you will investigate this matter and offer what assistance you can to have us released, we feel that you will be rewarded by keeping the soldiers of Edgewood Arsenal good patriots of the country that they have served so nobly.

Respectfully, yours,

A SOLDIER OF EDGEWOOD,
Chemical Warfare Service, United States Army.

45 BROADWAY, NEW YORK CITY.

DEAR SIR: Seeing your name in this morning's World as advocating the release of men in the Army, allow me to congratulate you on your stand in this matter.

We enlisted men stationed at the above address in the Army railway traffic service are working with civilians, who, by the way, are in the majority here, who are receiving from $1,000 to $2,400 per year for doing the same work as we are. Now that the war is practically over, I can not see any reason why this service is not made a civilian organization, especially as we are now handling foodstuffs for civilian relief over in Europe. Why should we work for civilian relief over there when we only get $30 per month? Why can not we receive our discharge and then take us on as civilian employees and let us earn a livable salary? It seems to me as though some of our junior officers are "pulling" some of same stuff as you stated in the morning paper.

You would do us young fellows a great favor by looking into this and seeing that justice is done.

——— ———.

I beg pardon for not signing my name, but I am in the United States Army and afraid to open my mouth.

ABERDEEN PROVING GROUND,
Aberdeen, Md., January 22, 1919.

* * * * * * *

There are some 5,000 men here, and to date only about 5 per cent of these have been discharged. Men ordered discharged on December 3 last have been held until January 20, and claims made on industrial grounds are given no consideration whatever, in violation of War Department Circular No. 6, 1919.

During the entire period of the war the soldiers were employed on the construction work side by side with civilians drawing high wages for doing the same work. And all this while they did it cheerfully; but since the armistice has been signed this number has been increased by adding men who had formerly done work of a military character. We consider this a gross injustice. If the Government is so solicitous about taking care of discharged soldiers, why are they not discharged and put to work as civilians, or, at the least, given indefinite furloughs and made to work here at civilian wages?

Is it due to the fact that—we'll be lenient and call it the gross inefficiency of the commanders of this post—the construction work has been done at what is really a criminal waste of money, and they now wish to get some results without their appearing in the construction costs? We can see no other explanation for the way we are being treated.

For obvious reason it would be useless to give my name, but nevertheless I hope you may see fit to give this matter some attention with a view of getting a square deal for the men at Aberdeen.

Yours, very respectfully,

ONE OF THE FIVE THOUSAND.

While we are warned frequently that the number of unemployed is rapidly increasing in many places, many men who are the owners or managers of large enterprises, and if discharged would be able to give employment to others, are, nevertheless, held for menial service.

The writer of the next letter filed affidavits showing that he is the owner, proprietor, and manager of a large farming and stock-raising enterprise in Minnesota, but he is refused his discharge and held as an enlisted men in a supply train in an inland camp:

DEAR SIR: I fortunately secured an account of your speech of 15th instant in Congress, and would like to say that you covered matters almost identically as they stand in the division supply train to which I belong.

I have been endeavoring to secure release from service since early in December, and all efforts have been "frozen out" in some manner or other. I am inclosing you my original petition, which was recently disapproved, and certified copies of the affidavits I submitted indorsing my petition for discharge. I have been in communication with Hon. C. B. MILLER, Member of Congress, who knows of me as a resident in his district, and who has been advising me in my efforts for discharge.

I would refer you to him regarding my standing, and possibly you could cooperate with him in securing my release from service. I certainly believe that from my experience and training that I could be of more value to the country in agricultural production than as I am now being held, especially when a man could be trained to do the work I have been doing in less than a week. It is very urgent for me to get released immediately to get ready for the coming season's planting of crops, etc.

I certainly hope that you can do something in my behalf, as from your position on Committee on Military Affairs you seem to be our last place of appeal.

The writer of the next letter is the sole manager of a large business in New York City.

DEAR SIR: I read with considerable interest your speech regarding men being held in camps contrary to War Department orders.

I was ordered discharged on an industrial claim on January 1, and through a technicality was held up and finally my order for discharge was revoked.

Am inclosing copy of a letter which I have sent to the camp commander, which I have been told by disinterested parties is a very clear and legitimate case; but I have been informed by others in touch with these matters in camp that it will do no good.

This is an injustice, but an enlisted man has absolutely no redress in the Army and can do nothing to help himself.

Before entering the military service I was the sole manager of the above business, in which I am associated with my father. It has been a hardship on both him and my mother, who has tried to help him to the detriment of her health, during my absence; but they made this and other sacrifices willingly while the war was on.

It is torture to me, knowing that this condition could be very easily relieved, and I know it is the intention of the Government to remedy such conditions with the least possible delay.

However, instead of this system being followed, thousands of men have been discharged who are walking the streets unable to obtain employment, while most of the men being retained are of the caliber who can return to their old positions, which are generally above the average, as these men are being held because of their known superior ability.

Anything you can do to help me in this matter will be gratefully appreciated, and your speech has earned the respect of thousands of men in this camp who are being dealt with as outlined by you.

DEAR SIR: I am a farmer, as inclosed papers will show. Every day that I am away from home lessens my chance for a crop this year and goes that much closer toward the ruin of my enterprise.

I have sent the inclosed papers through military channels twice. Once after War Department Circular 77 went through, and my application was disapproved. Since the armistice was signed we have been of no use to the Government, as we have done nothing of value.

In the spring of last year I was told that the Government needed my crop better than my service; I prepared for a big crop. After I was through with spring work, my local board informed me that the Government had given orders not to exempt farmers any more, and told me to enlist, as I would be drafted in a few days.

I brought my horses home to my father's farm, sold two, and enlisted for the war.

I got a furlough for harvest, thrashed out 3,400 bushels of grain, and returned to the Army.

I write this in good faith, and kindly ask your advice as to what can be done.

Very sincerely, ——— ———

DEAR SIR: It is very urgent and imperative that I again resume my business for the reasons that my investments, especially in the ——— Co., of ———, is in jeopardy and in immiment danger of great loss to me as well as others interested in the above corporation. For some time prior to my induction into the service I was, and still am, treasurer of the above corporation and as such handle all the finances and participate in the general management of the business. It is quite a large concern, employing a great many hands, but since my induction into the service the capacity has been decreased to about 40 per cent, due to my inactivity.

* * * * * * *

I fear that unless I am immediately discharged that the business will result in complete and disastrous failure.

Maj. ——— ———, who is my commanding officer, claims that I am indispensable and can not be spared. As a matter of fact, I am doing ordinary clerical work which could readily be performed by a schoolboy of ordinary intelligence and though there are many other men in the same department with me doing the identical work that I am and who have not as good a claim for discharge as I have are being discharged. There is no question in my mind that I am being discriminated against, presumably because I am a good deal better off financially than others.

* * * * * * *

I am an employer of a great many men, and were I given an opportunity to resume business again I am sure that the capacity of my plant will run 100 per cent. Will you, therefore, be good enough to have my case investigated with a view to obtaining my immediate discharge?

Very respectfully,

———.

RECONSTRUCTION DIVISION, COMPANY E,
WALTER REED GENERAL HOSPITAL,
Washington, D. C., January 21, 1919.

DEAR SIR: Prior to my enlistment, April 24, 1918, was employed by the American Bank Note Co., New York City, as a steel bank note engraver, and am still under contract with said concern as such. There being only 85 men trained as such in the country, I feel it imperative that I hastily resume my activities with this company and live up to my contract. The company has written to the commanding officer of this post and to myself, trying to effect my discharge at an early date, but without success.

Have a partially dependent mother, who is not in the best of health, and who at all times is looking for my early return.

Was sent to this post in October as an instructor of engraving, but since that time have been used in the capacity of office boy and clerk; still, on requesting discharge, was told that I was an essential man and that my services were very necessary—this selfsame story being told to all men making application.

The following are selected from a large number of letters covering the entire subject of the refusal to grant discharges and some of the reasons:

SIR: Permit me to thank you in the name of the boys of this camp for your true statements which appeared in this morning's papers.

Your remark about the cause why some officers decline to approve claims for discharge is correct. * * *

I am going to give you a true case of the type of officers who are invested with the power of the life of their men. I say life, because in some cases where they refuse to recognize the claims of their men the life and death of some relatives are dependent on the decision of the commanding officer.

We have a lieutenant, named ——— ———, who is the head of this detachment; he is a shyster lawyer from Wilkes-Barre, Pa. He is married, has seven children, and yet maintains a home for another woman in Trenton, N. J. This is the type who has turned down almost every application made to him, no matter how important the case may be. You may investigate this case; it will provide you with food for thought; but do not use any method which may bring disgrace on his family. They should not be made to suffer.

I have given you a true case. Such a man should not be permitted to make hundreds of Americans—good Americans—unhappy.

I can not sign my name, but you will find my statements correct. Personally I have no grudge, nor ax to grind, but some of the men here have related to me their cases, which are truly heartbreaking. Please keep this letter to yourself.

A BLUE-BLOODED AMERICAN WHO HATES TO SEE THE GOOD NAME OF THE ARMY SUFFER BECAUSE OF A FEW MEN.

WALTER REED HOSPITAL,
Washington, D. C., January 16, 1919.

MY DEAR SIR: I have just read with pleasure your interesting article in this morning's paper pertaining to the discharge of men from the Army. You are to be congratulated when you say that the hold-up is due to the man higher up, fearing he would be demoted. If you or some reliable person would investigate matters here at the hospital, you would find what you say is correct.

1. First we were told to make application for discharge, which we did.
2. Those who had a little pull were discharged.
3. Tuesday night we were told that no discharge would be granted at the present time, and had our applications handed back. Why? Because our detachment commander is afraid of losing his "title"— rank; being a drug user, and half the time you talk to him his mind is on something else.

An investigation would do a little good. Investigate the men and their applications; then investigate the officers.

I would sign my name and rank, but I am afraid this letter might go astray, and then I would be liable to court-martial; however, if you should investigate and run across me—which you would—I will then make myself known.

DEAR SIR: We were happy to read of your speech in a clipping that we received from New York.

You hit the nail on the head. If a man as fearless and just as you could only witness conditions at this hospital, we boys would get a square deal if it were in your power to grant it.

Here is our plight: We are a company of over 700 men, and the amount of patients total 100 less. Over half of us come from New York and Connecticut and other States up North. We were drafted and taken from the Infantry and transferred to the medical detachment. When we ask questions pertaining to discharge we are laughed at and told by officers that we are "out of luck" for being in the medical detachment. We are willing to do our duty, but when we are told we are out of luck for being in a branch of service that we never did want it makes a bitter and disgusted bunch of men. The truth is, Senator, that we are slaves disguised as soldiers. Your charge about officers ignoring requests for discharge is correct. We all realize the fact that we are being held in order that some parasite holds onto his commission. The southern fellows don't mind it so much, as most of them can go home and back on a 36-hour pass. We poor northerners, though, are stuck. They could easily send us to our homes, and we wouldn't mind staying in the Army a little longer if we could be transferred North. We do all kinds of dirty work—mopping, sweeping, oiling, dishwashing, and all the disagreeable work attached to the wards. They won't consider our applications; not even send them to camp headquarters; and they don't even let us know the reason for disapproval. And the Government's excuse for inducting us was that we must fight and defend the country. And now that we are in it we are driven like slaves. And away down here, a thousand miles away from home, a northern fellow gets it pretty rough. He can't get a furlough unless a member of his family dies, and even then they "red tape" him and he does not get home in time for the funeral.

Senator, all of this is the truth, and anyone of us will swear to these facts if protected. Our opinion of the Army is formed, and we have decided that it is slavery. Anything you can do to get justice to us northern boys, Senator, we will more than appreciate.

Respectfully,

NORTHERN BOYS OF THE MEDICAL DETACHMENT,
Base Hospital, Camp Gordon, Ga.

P. S.—We would sign our names, but fear it is mutiny to do so.

JANUARY 16, 1919.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed with this note is a clipping from the New York World, dated January 16, with heading of "Men held in Army to keep officers' jobs," and in this address to the House allow us to inform you that you have struck the nail squarely on the head, and have spoken the sentiments of some four or five thousand men of this post who are unable to express for themselves. Let us assure you, dear sir, that your message sounded the greatest revielle this camp has ever heard, and we, each and every one of us, thank our God that you have started the wheels turning in a very great and legitimate cause. So positive are we that your findings are correct and we pray the good move will "carry on."

This small camp contains hundreds of officers, generally juniors or lieutenants. Their purpose here is quite a mystery, but one that we have no reason to fathom, further than that which most directly concerns us. Since we have had the privilege of making application for discharge from military service, it is safe to say 75 per cent of the men at this post availed themselves, while the per cent actually discharged will record very law, indeed. While this is an arsenal containing some four or five thousand men, only a few hundred are employed in the handling of munitions, and, there being no exercise or drill, the monotony and discontent and ill feeling created here will truly picture this branch of the service a most undesirable one. Speaking in no way from a personal point of view, as it is very evident that thousands of men at this post are fairly begging to return to their families, to their places of business, to their positions, and to their employers where their time will not be spent in idleness and waste, and where their bills are now piling up against them every day. Sincerely, Mr. TILSON, we feel very gratified to you and your high office for the course you are pursuing, and assuring you the cooperation we are so feebly able to lend, and wishing you the success you have so deservedly earned, believe me,

HONORABLE SIR: I—and so have a great many other soldiers here at camp—have read of your fight against the Army officers holding the men in the Army longer than necessary.

So we thought it might be of interest to you to know of something that is being put over on the soldiers here in the machine-gun school. The commandant of the school, Col. H———, was approached the other day by Gen. E———, who has just returned from Washington. E——— is in command of the camp. He said to H———, "We'll have to get these drafted men out of the machine-gun school. Congressmen and Senators have made repeated complaints, and the War Department is after The Adjutant General, and he is raising hell with me. We don't want a scandal, you know. The men want to go home, and we couldn't under these circumstances get anything out of them anyway. They have been designated for discharge." The colonel replied, "Well, the men shouldn't be dissatisfied. There'll be men in France eight months longer, and we'll get them home in six months. The draft law says we can hold them four months after peace is signed." "I know," said the general, "but we've got to get them out." "Well, what's going to become of me then?" said the colonel. Now, this is not hearsay or an Army rumor, but the positive, thoroughbred, through and through truth. If Col. H———'s morals of holding these men to hold his job is any different from those of the Kaiser, who used men to sustain his ambitions, I can't see it. The men are red hot. It is an unnecessary expense. There is hardly a man in the machine-gun school who doesn't earn $35 to $50 a week in civil life. Many of them have been urged by their former employers to get released. Some will lose their old jobs if indefinitely detained. All will lose the familiarity with their professions and businesses that gets further away every day. Some are married; most of them have dependents. The company commanders have instructed the first sergeants not to send any man to them to talk about making application for discharge, because they will approve none whatever.

Now, Mr. TILSON, there is plenty of militarism in our Army, and some day the public will know it. We have censorship and military restraint now. However, some one should show up these Army officers who are making men make unnecessary sacrifices, who are forcing endless hours of unnecessary anxiety to our loyal wives and mothers. Something should be done to relieve or to punish these militarists. They are breeding bolshevism, anarchy, and socialism in the souls of men who were sterling patriots. Indeed, they are traitors to their countrymen. The demobilization at the outset should have been put in the hands of a civilian commission of able sociologists. It should be now. It is more of a social than a military problem. The Army officers—even the West Pointers—are an ignorant set outside of guns and drills. That is, I mean those that are trying to make the Army a business and jump from $20 a week income to reserve commission and then a regular commission. They are using their authority in a cowardly manner. Denying a soldier the right to make application for discharge is taking a right away from him by War Department Bulletin 77. It never was posted in the machine-gun school, but a few select ones were called in, told about it, and got out. Then things were closed up. The men that got out were most of them fellows they were afraid of—afraid they'd start something with a newspaper, etc.

Now, I am not a Connecticut boy, but we are all good Americans, and thought it might interest you to know what is going on to any American soldier even if it isn't one from your State.

Sincerely,

AN OUTRAGED SOLDIER.

P. S.—I have a $50 a week job being held open for me. I am the sole support of a sister who I am trying to educate. I have spent $200 more than I have earned trying to make ends meet since I've been in the Army.

I'd sign my name, but something might happen, and good gracious but we do hear a lot about Fort Leavenworth.

HOBOKEN, N. J.

DEAR SIR: This is just to let you know that the victims of the conditions laid bare by you before the House yesterday are with you. All that we ask is a square deal. We're not getting it.

You could not have stated the conditions prevailing in Hoboken with greater accuracy if you had investigated them. It would take no searching investigation to discover many holding better jobs than they ever held in their lives right here, and who are doing all they can to hold on to them as long as they can. Why, the writer knows of a case where one of these "patriots" gave one of the boys an awful bawling out for trying to secure his discharge, telling him that he was unpatriotic, and a lot of other stuff.

I do not think it is so much the fault of the War Department as it is of these "patriots." The department naturally has to rely, in many cases, on such men for information concerning conditions. They will not let anybody out here, except a chosen few, and yet the men know that 50 per cent could be let go and the machinery would go on, not only as it is but with greater efficiency. Too many cooks spoil the broth. Your criticisms are constructive. Go to it.

Respectfully, yours, A VICTIM.

Here are a few selections from a mass of letters received from dependents, friends, employers, and others outside of the military service:

NEW YORK, N. Y., January 20, 1919.

Hon. JOHN Q. TILSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have read with a great deal of interest the article in the New York World on January 15 quoting from your speech of that date on the subject of men being detained in Army camps under unfair conditions.

As I am a frequent visitor of a camp where the conditions regarding the men's discharges are identical with those stated by you, I take the liberty of bringing it to your attention.

At Camp Kendrick, Lakehurst, N. J., a soldier whom I know personally has tried repeatedly to obtain his discharge, as he is actually needed at home, and his former position is open for him for a limited time. Although his application has been in for over a month they have taken no action on it whatever. However, they are discharging the men by lottery, and the few already discharged have been men with no dependents, no allotments, and men who have been in the guardhouse. Meanwhile, the great number of soldiers remaining in the camp are doing absolutely nothing.

This most certainly does not seem to be in accord with the orders of the War Department, and evidently there is something wrong somewhere.

If anything can be done to enable the men in this camp who, according to Government ruling, merit their discharges to obtain same, it would indeed be a valued favor and most deeply appreciated by all those affected by the prevailing conditions.

Yours, very respectfully,

EVA L. BARNETT.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Permit me to congratulate you on your stand in Congress for the boys in khaki. They will never forget what you are endeavoring to do for them.

I have a son at Camp Dix, N. J., who is held there in the mustering office, and is therefore one of the victims which you have so aptly portrayed in your speeches in the National House.

There are at present detained at Camp Dix in the mustering office 120 soldiers, most of them high-salaried men when they were drafted in the United States Army, and the major part of them could be discharged immediately without hindrance or detriment to the work there in hand. Their jobs are open for them as soon as they secure their discharges. Their retention there seems to be for no other purpose than to keep the captain in a better job than he ever had before in his life.

The Regular Army men who are at the Jersey camp could readily be detailed to do all the clerical work and would be glad of the opportunity. Twenty men, from what I learn, could easily handle all of it, for there is so little in hand most of the time that the staff practically sit in idleness most of the time. In fact, the staff, according to reports, has been instructed by the officers in charge that when visitors appear upon the scene at any time to pretend to be very busy, whether anything is doing or not. Such a mandate is repugnant to American ideals, and, to say the least, savors of instilling dishonesty among the soldiers.

Permit me to again congratulate you, and should you need a résumé of conditions at Camp Dix, I am at your command.

Hon. JOHN Q. TILSON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. TILSON: I want to congratulate you on your manly speech made yesterday in the House of Representatives. You gave them concrete facts, and I can furnish you with evidence along the line you spoke.

One of your constituents, F. D. Layton, secretary of the National Fire Insurance Co., of Hartford, wrote a letter to Secretary of War Baker in regard to a soldier who was employed by them, and who was urgently needed by his company. After some delay the letter was answered by The Adjutant General, who stated that the soldier should make application through his commanding officer. This the soldier has done, but it never reached any further than his commanding captain.

The soldier I refer to is ——— ———, Third Transportation Battalion, One hundred and fifty-fourth Depot Brigade, Camp Meade, Md. I have some very interesting correspondence regarding this case, and if you could use it I would be pleased to forward same. This is one of the most beautiful cases of "passing the buck" from The Adjutant General to the commanding officer and from the commanding officer to The Adjutant General.

Keep up your fight for justice, and the people will not forget you.

Believe me to be,
Very truly, yours, ——— ———.

DEAR SIR: Having read an article on your speech, in the Daily World, I take this liberty of calling your attention to a few flagrant cases in Camp Morrison, Va. I am an ex-soldier and just visited some buddies of mine at that camp, and heard from them that they made application for discharge, affidavits attached, and that Gen. Ferguson approved them, stating that they had sufficient reason for discharge. The major at Camp Morrison claims he can not spare them, although there are many men idle. I believe there are 130 patients and 190 medical personnel (approximately). The cases I have reference to all have good reason to be home. All cases of dependency, with positions waiting, and one case who has a farm and dependent mother.

I am taking this liberty, as my buddy told me they had been warned not to write to any Congressman or Senator, and from your article I feel that you have the interest of the men who sacrificed all they had to do their bit, and fair play would keep them all better citizens.

Hoping you will overlook my forwardness in taking this matter in hand, and do what you can to help these boys,

Sincerely,
HERBERT BROWN,
One who did his bit and knows.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 20, 1919.

Hon. JOHN Q. TILSON, Member of Congress,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Please keep up the good work in connection with the Army subject. A thorough housecleaning is absolutely needed.

If opportunity serves, please don't neglect the United States Army automobile abuse here in Washington. This is obvious and scandalous. The Secretary of War evidently intends to permit his many aids to retain all the passenger cars, the same as war time. Every day on the streets one can see Army automobiles lettered "For official business only" or the like, obviously used otherwise. Well-dressed women are frequently ridden around; Army officers, even of ordinary rank, to the writer's knowledge, have United States Army cars, driven by enlisted men, call and wait for them to finish breakfast, then "tote" them to the office. Outside the big clubs, at the large theaters, etc., these cars can frequently be seen waiting, with their enlisted men chauffeurs. These Government cars are often seen on the streets on Sundays, obviously used for pleasure. Surely this is against all law. I am a taxpayer. If the Secretary will not stop the waste and abuse, Congress might properly take cognizance of it through restricting appropriations.

Very respectfully,
——— ———.

HOOPESTON, ILL., January 20, 1919.

Representative TILSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: My husband, Pvt. ———, of the Two hundred and seventy-first Aero Squadron, Aberdeen Proving Grounds, Md., has applied for discharge from the service, as I am wholly dependent upon him for support. I am recovering from a severe attack of the influenza, and this disease has left my physical condition greatly weakened so that I am unable to even partially support myself without permanently endangering my health. As I owe a doctor bill and a nurse bill which amounts to $5 per day for three weeks, and as my allotments just covers my board bill, it is very necessary that my husband be discharged at once. All these facts have been stated in the affidavits that my husband had made out. We have turned in an affidavit from my doctor telling the exact condition of my health; also two affidavits from relatives stating the extent of my dependency; also two affidavits from nonrelatives who know that we are married and know the extent of my dependency. My husband has given these documents, which have been duly signed and sworn to, together with a statement from his former employer that he has a position awaiting him on his return, and also a certificate of our marriage which we obtained from the county clerk in the county where we were married, to his commanding officer. Up to this time his commanding officer has ignored them, and my husband is powerless to help himself, for we understand that the commanding officer must sign them and send them to Washington before he will be given his release. In reading over this newspaper clipping I decided to write to you and acquaint you with the facts concerning our particular case in a vain hope that in some way you might be able to help us.

SIR: In looking over the evening paper of January 16, 1919, I saw the article in regards to "The neglect of discharged soldiers."

On December 14, 1917, my husband enlisted in the Ordnance Department of the United States Army for the duration of the war. We have been married since September 9, 1914, and previous to his enlistment he was my sole support.

It was impossible for me to get along on my allotment. As I was in poor health and had absolutely no means of support, I had to break up my home and store my furniture and go back to my mother's home.

Since the war has ended I have tried to build up my home again, thinking my husband would soon be out of service. He made application for immediate discharge, and I also wrote to his commanding officer some weeks ago, but up to the present his officer always tells him that he put the application through, but he doesn't know where it is held up.

Now, would you kindly advise me what steps to take, as I have tried to work, but my work is an awful strain on me and I will not be able to continue it much longer; but still it is impossible to get along on the allotment alone. My husband has been stationed at Raritan Arsenal since March, 1918. His present rank is ordnance sergeant.

JANUARY 16, 1919.

Hon. J. Q. TILSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I was very much interested in your remarks in the House yesterday respecting the retention of men in the service who have desirable situations open for them in civil life. I want to state a case that has come under my personal observation.

Mr. ———, who was my secretary, was drafted and reported at Camp Lee on the 2d of September. Notwithstanding the fact that he had a wife entirely dependent on him for support, he made no effort to be excused from the draft, but at once reported to his commanding officer. He was among a large number at Camp Lee selected for overseas duty, but prior to being ordered to some point of embarkation the armistice came.

As one of the trustees of the Columbia Hospital for Women, which, as you know, is a Government institution, and subsequent to the armistice I secured a place there as bookkeeper for this soldier at a salary of $1,800 a year, and so advised him; at the same time I wrote the commanding general at Camp Lee of this opportunity. The soldier also made application for discharge that he might accept this position. No action was taken and no reply was received, and we were compelled to fill this position at the hospital.

Later on, as president of the University Club, I offered Mr. —— a situation there at the salary of $1,600 a year. I again wrote the commanding officer at Camp Lee, setting forth that this soldier had been deprived of one $1,800 position and hoped that he would be permitted to accept this. I even ventured to say that to retain him in the service was a rank injustice and a violation of the spirit of orders that had been issued from the War Department to release men who were married or who could obtain positions.

It seems to me that some officer, puffed up over the importance of his position, thinks more of retaining the services of this man at $30 a month, who is an efficient stenographer and typist and who is detailed for duty in the office of the camp adjutant, than of sympathizing with a man who has a wife to support on a salary of $30 a month.

I made representations of these facts to The Adjutant General of the Army and was told by him that action in this case was entirely within the jurisdiction of the commanding general at Camp Lee.

I am taking the liberty of bringing this case to your attention for further evidence of the rank injustice that is being done soldiers now in service, who need employment outside and who have been refused an opportunity to accept positions offered them.

I have the honor to be,
Very truly, yours,
——— ———.

P. S.—My last application to the commanding officer at Camp Lee, like the first, elicited no reply.

NEW YORK, January 16, 1919.

HONORABLE SIR: Had the pleasure of reading to-day in the New York World your speech, made in the House of Representatives, and will state that we have had a man in our employ for several years. He is doing guard duty in Portsmouth, Va. We have been holding his position open for him, but we can not do it indefinitely. He wrote us yesterday that 12 of his officers signed his papers for release, and the commanding officer refused to sign it, and he is still carrying a gun around some T. N. T. plant.

If you can help us to secure the release of this man, so that he can fill the position that is open to him, it will be much appreciated.

——— ———.

JANUARY 16, 1919.

DEAR SIR: The Public Ledger, of Philadelphia, to-day contains a speech which you made in the House about keeping men uselessly in the Army here. I cry aloud, Amen! to what you say, having gone through it and just released recently from Camp Dix, after a life-and-death struggle to get out.

Circular No. 77 seems to be a big joke to the officers; at least, it would seem so. To add to the irony of the thing, along comes the War Department with Circular No. 6—I guess to add to the mental anguish of the men held in.

I know of lawyers, business men, and a dentist who are being held at Camp Dix to check and recheck the documents signed by captains, majors, and higher officers. In the meantime, who cares that their business, professions, and families are suffering? More power to you. Keep up the good work, and hundreds of men will rise and call you blessed.

Yours, respectfully,
R. R. GRAMER,
District Manager.

LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY NEWSPAPER,
New York, January 16, 1919.

Hon. JOHN Q. TILSON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. TILSON: I was delighted to read your plain-spoken criticism of the military authorities in Washington, enmeshed, as they are, in red tape. If you could see some of the letters that come to my editorial desk from soldiers in the service, you would feel justified in continuing your comments. The public stands behind you in this matter.

Sincerely, yours,
JOHN A. SLEICHER.

Casualties in the Pennsylvania National Guard.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM S. VARE,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 6, 1919.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted by the House I print in the RECORD the following article from the Philadelphia Press of February 2, 1919, showing casualties in the Pennsylvania National Guard:

PENNSYLVANIANS WITH 3,890 LOSSES LEAD GUARDSMEN—2,389 CASUALTIES IN SEVENTY-NINTH—10,000 MEN STILL MISSING—SENT INTO ACTION JULY 16, TWENTY-EIGHTH WAS FOREMOST IN FIGHTING UNTIL ARMISTICE CAME—ASSISTED BY THE FORTY-SECOND—CROSSED OURCQ JULY 30 AND TOOK PART IN ARGONNE AND WOEVRE OFFENSIVES—GRAND TOTAL IS 59,592—17,434 OF MAJOR CASUALTIES ARE CLASSIFIED AS EITHER MISSING OR CAPTURED.

WASHINGTON, February 1.

Official tables of the major battle casualties of the American forces in France, made public to-day by Gen. March, Chief of Staff, show that approximately 10,000 men remain wholly unaccounted for nearly three months after the ending of hostilities.

The deaths, missing, and known prisoners are tabulated up to January 10 for each of the 30 combatant divisions of Gen. Pershing's army. The total is 56,592, of whom 17,434 are classified as missing or captured. An appended statement shows that only 29 American military prisoners were believed to be still in Germany on January 8, and that 4,800 prisoners had been checked up as returned, and 118 died in captivity.

Suffering 3,980 casualties, the Twenty-eighth Division, made up of Pennsylvania National Guardsmen, was harder hit than any other unit, with the exception of the Regulars, official figures show.

Trained at Camp Meade, the Seventy-ninth Division suffered the second highest number of casualties with 2,389, while the Seventy-eighth Division, made up of New Jersey, New York, and northern Pennsylvania draft men, had 1,825.

The heaviest loss in prisoners was also in the Twenty-eighth Division, 691 men being taken by the enemy. The Twenty-eighth Division was also second on the list in "missing in action," with 1,174, while the Seventy-ninth was third with 1,142.

The Twenty-eighth was ordered overseas about June 1, 1918, spent the fortnight of June 14 to July 1 in a training area, and then moved up to the front line, taking its position northeast of Parnay on July 16. From that date until the armistice was signed, with the exception of a brief rest period, the Pennsylvanians were in the forefront of the fighting.

The colorless files of the General Staff give the following brief details of the record of the Pennsylvania Guardsmen:

"July 28, crossed the Ourcq; July 30, joined Somme drive; July 31, in advance on the Vesle, with Forty-second on their left; August 6–9, moved to Vesle front, relieving Thirty-second; August 8–30, in advance to Vesle; September 4, advance elements crossed Vesle; September 5, crossed Vesle in force; September 6–7, in action; October 1, moved to Argonne, joined offensive; October 7, in Aire offensive, near Chatel Cheherry; October 29, moved to east of Woevre; November 2–11, advance in Woevre."

MOST OF 10,000 DEAD.

Some portion of the great body of missing men may be located as the return of the Army thins out the American force in France. Indications are, however, that the majority of the 10,000 finally will be added to the roll of honor shown in the tables of those killed or died of wounds, now recorded as 39,158 men.

To that figure, also, must be added 1,551 men of the Marine Brigade figures for which, not carried into the tables, were obtained from official sources. This brings the grand aggregate of deaths from battle up to 40,709 on returns estimated officially to be 95 per cent complete. As figures on missing and prisoners of the Marines are lacking, the number of unaccounted for which finally will be added to the roll of the dead can not be accurately estimated.

The Army tables, however, give a total of 14,649 men missing in action, and 2,785 known prisoners, making up the 17,434. The statement shows that the Army rolls record 4,918 American military prisoners accounted for. Admittedly, there are many possibilities of error, but the statement says it is anticipated that the indicated unaccounted-for list of 12,516 will be brought "down to less than "10,000."

The tables do not furnish any data as to the wounded or deaths other than those resulting directly from battle. A new estimate of the complete figures on American casualties is therefore not possible. It is significant, however, that up to to-night the War Department has published the names of 43,882 men killed or died of wounds, as against 39,158 shown in the 15 per cent tables. The difference is made up by additional returns since the tables were closed January 10.

ESTIMATE BY PERSHING.

On November 17 Gen. Pershing estimated that his total killed and died of wounds would be 40,455. Presumably publication of the lists of these known deaths and exclusive of the unaccounted for is nearly completed, having exceeded the estimate by more than 3,000, due in part to additional deaths from wounds and to the listing as dead of men formerly reported missing.

The names of 149,418 wounded had been published up to to-night compared with a November estimated total of 189,955. Of those missing in action 11,676 have been published against the estimated 14,260 total and compared with the 17,434 missing and prisoners shown in to-day's tables.

Examination of the losses by regiments shows clearly that the brunt of the fighting fell on the infantry. In every division which got into action losses were many times greater, even proportionately to the strength of the units, than those of the artillery, machine-gun battalions, trench mortar batteries, or engineers. A score of regiments lost fully one-third of the full strength of 3,700 men in killed, died of wounds, missing, and prisoners.

When figures on the wounded are available officers believe the total casualties in several regiments may equal the full strength.

SLIGHT LOSSES IN ARTILLERY.

The artillery regiments escaped with relatively light losses. In some cases machine-gun battalions suffered severely, and there are a number of the divisional engineer regiments that paid a heavy toll for their place in the front lines.

The records of the Twenty-sixth (New England National Guard), the Twenty-seventh, and Seventy-seventh, both New York divisions, the Thirty-second, the famous Forty-second (Rainbow), and the Seventy-ninth (Pennsylvania, Maryland, and District of Columbia troops), with more than 2,000 casualties each, tell of the work they did. These and every other National Guard or National Army division that was given an opportunity at the front won its ground despite losses in men. The totals for all divisions, exclusive of the two regiments of marines in the Second Division, are:

Killed in action	27,762
Died of wounds	11,396
Missing in action	14,649
Prisoners	2,785
Grand total of major casualties	56,592

The figures for each of the 30 combat divisions included show the following totals of major casualties:

First (Regulars), 5,248; Second (Regulars), 2,965; Third (Regulars), 3,617; Fourth (Regulars), 2,986; Fifth (Regulars), 2,504; Sixth (Regulars), 122; Seventh (Regulars), 326.

Twenty-sixth (New England National Guard), 2,864; Twenty-seventh (New York National Guard), 2,194; Twenty-eighth (Pennsylvania National Guard), 3,890; Twenty-ninth (New Jersey, Virginia, Maryland, Delaware, and District of Columbia National Guard), 1,117; Thirtieth (Tennessee, North Carolina, and South Carolina National Guard), 1,772; Thirty-second (Michigan and Wisconsin National Guard), 3,213; Thirty-third (Illinois National Guard), 1,171; Thirty-fifth (Missouri and Kansas National Guard), 1,733; Thirty-sixth Texas and Oklahoma National Guard), 896; Thirty-seventh (Ohio and West Virginia National Guard), 1,250; Forty-second (Rainbow), 2,950; Seventy-seventh (New York Metropolitan National Army), 2,692; Seventy-eighth (New York and northern Pennsylvania National Army), 1,825; Seventy-ninth (southern Pennsylvania National Army), 2,389.

1,355 CASUALTIES IN EIGHTIETH.

Eightieth (New Jersey, Virginia, Maryland, Delaware, and District of Columbia National Army), 1,355.

Eighty-first (Tennessee, North Carolina, and South Carolina National Army), 370.

Eighty-second (Georgia, Alabama, and Florida National Army), 1,592.

Eighty-eighth (Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, North Dakota, and South Dakota National Army), 66.

Eighty-ninth (Kansas, Missouri, and Colorado National Army), 1,525.

Ninetieth (Texas, Arizona, New Mexico and Oklahoma National Army), 1,585.

Ninety-first (Washington, Oregon, California, Nevada, Utah, Idaho, Montana, and Wyoming), 1,702.

Ninety-second (National Army, negroes), 211.

Ninety-third (National Army, negroes), 489.

In killed in action the First Regular division leads the list with 2,303. Other divisions with more than 1,000 men killed in action stand in the following order:

Third, 1,901; Forty-second, 1,702; Thirty-second, 1,694; Twenty-eighth, 1,544; Fourth, 1,500; Twenty-sixth, 1,388; Second, 1,383; Twenty-seventh, 1,302; Seventy-seventh, 1,275; and Thirtieth, 1,084.

The only division to lose more than 1,000 men died of wounds was the First, with 1,050. Only three divisions had more than 1,000 missing in action—the First, with 1,789; the Twenty-eighth, with 1,174; and the Seventy-ninth, with 1,142.

The heaviest loss in prisoners was in the Twenty-eighth Division, with 691 men taken by the enemy. The Twenty-sixth was second, with 354 taken prisoner, and the Seventy-seventh third, with 336.

Table showing loss by regiments place the four Infantry regiments of the First Division as heaviest sufferers, with from 1,150 to 1,264 major casualties each. These regiments are the Sixteenth, Eighteenth, Twenty-sixth, and Twenty-eighth Regulars. Figures for the Fifth and Sixth (marine) Regiments in this division are not given.

ONE HUNDRED AND TENTH INFANTRY HARD HIT.

Among the National Guard divisions the heaviest regimental losses recorded are for the One hundred and tenth Infantry, of the Twenty-eighth Division, 1,142 men, while the losses of the One hundred and ninth Infantry, of the same division, stand second, at 1,112. Next is the One hundred and second Infantry, of the Twenty-sixth Division, with a total of 988; and fourth is the One hundred and sixty-fifth Infantry, of the Forty-second, with 879.

In the National Army division the regimental losses of the Three hundred and sixteenth Infantry, Seventy-ninth Division, were the heaviest, totaling 800.

Two tables of prisoners taken by the enemy, one prepared by the American Red Cross and the other by The Adjutant General's office, were given out. Both show much larger totals than the announced list of known military prisoners, but the latter will be increased, and the number of missing in action correspondingly decreased by checking. The Red Cross total is 5,243, including 4,857 military prisoners. The Adjutant General reported 5,401, of which 4,916 were military prisoners.

The Adjutant General's records show 480 prisoners have been released and 118 died in captivity. Practically all prisoners now are out of Germany.

MARINE LOSSES.

Figures for the Marine Brigade of the Second Division, not carried in the War Department summary, complete to January 1, show killed and died of wounds, 56 officers and 1,507 men; missing in action, 2 officers, 695 men; severely wounded, 91 officers and 1,802 men; slightly wounded, 186 officers and 5,296 men; gassed, 31 officers and 1,854 men. Total casualties for all causes, 365 officers and 11,152 men.

The identification of the various divisions given is taken from the latest official list issued by the War Department, but since it was printed there have been made numerous changes. In the case of the Seventy-eighth Division there has been information to show that troops from western New York, New Jersey, and Delaware composed it, whereas the department's list gives New York and northern Pennsylvania troops.

Later information has indicated that the Eightieth Division had troops from Virginia, West Virginia, and western Pennsylvania, instead of New Jersey, Virginia, Maryland, Delaware, and the District of Columbia, as given in the official table.

SOLDIERS TRAINED AT MEADE LOST MORE SINCE SEPTEMBER 26 THAN ANY OTHER DIVISION—1,174 MISSING IN ACTION—TWENTY-EIGHTH, WITH 641 TAKEN BY ENEMY, TOP CAPTIVE LIST—SEVENTY-EIGHTH IS HARD HIT—ONE HUNDRED AND NINTH INFANTRY CUT—RANKS OF REGIMENT COMPOSED MOSTLY OF PHILADELPHIANS DEPLETED IN BATTLE OF MARNE.

The Seventy-ninth Division, composed of selective-service men from eastern Pennsylvania and Maryland, who trained at Camp Meade, lost more men between September 26 and the end of the war than any other division in the American Army.

Ten American divisions have a larger number of major casualties than the Seventy-ninth, but every one of these 10 were fighting in France long before the boys from Camp Meade.

The Seventy-ninth never went into action until the morning of September 26, but it lost 2,389 men.

The other 10 divisions which exceeded it in losses and the dates they first went into action show how terrible the losses of the Seventy-ninth must have been in the drive on Montmaucon and northeast of Verdun to reach a total so high. Those divisions are:

First, 5,248; in action May 28.
Third, 3,617; in action June 1.
Second, 2,965; in action June 15.
Twenty-eighth, 3,890; in action July 15.
Forty-second, 2,950; in action July 15.
Fourth, 2,986; in action July 18.
Twenty-sixth, 2,864; in action July 18.
Thirty-second, 3,213; in action July 29.
Seventy-seventh, 2,629; in action August 1.
Fifth, 2,504; in action September 13.

The first nine of the above divisions participated in the fighting which swept the Huns from the Soissons-Rheims salient, and some of them later joined with the Fifth Division, which made its debut at St. Mihiel.

The First Division may be said to have been fighting constantly for more than five months. In that time its losses were 5,248, while the Seventy-ninth, fighting just exactly a month and one-half, lost almost half as many men.

The Seventy-seventh Division, the only National Army division to have greater losses than the Seventy-ninth, only exceeded the latter by about 300 losses, although it fought desperately at the Vesle in August, long before the great September offensive.

Likewise, the Fifth Division, which lost but 115 more men than the Seventy-ninth, participated in the reduction of the St. Mihiel salient before going to the Argonne.

Even a further indication of the terrific losses in the Seventh-ninth as compared to other divisions which swept northward on a 20-mile front on September 26, is the loss in the Three hundred and sixteenth Infantry. That unit, attached to the One hundred and fifty-eighth Infantry Brigade, of the Seventy-ninth, had major casualties totalling 800, which were the greatest of all the National Army Infantry regiments.

FOUGHT FOUR MONTHS.

In fact, the Three hundred and sixteenth's losses were within 342 of the losses of the One hundred and tenth Infantry of the Twenty-eighth Division, and that latter unit has the distinction of losing more men than any other regiment in the Army. The One hundred and tenth, however, fought from July 15 to the end of the war—practically four months—while the Three hundred and sixteenth fought a month and one-half.

The governor of Kansas has raised a vigorous complaint against what he termed the useless slaughter of the men of the Thirty-fifth Division in the Argonne drive. The total losses of the Thirty-fifth Division, however, were 1,733. That figure is 656 less than the losses of the Seventy-ninth for the same period, but there has been no complaint so far from Pennsylvania and Maryland.

The discovery of the huge size of the casualties in the Liberty Division overshadowed to-day the previously known fact that the Twenty-eighth Division (Pennsylvania's Iron Division of Guardsmen) suffered more severely than any other division except the First Regulars.

It could not help to overshadow it, in fact, when the length of time the two divisions were in action is considered.

Four companies of the Twenty-eighth Division fought the Huns on July 15 and on July 16 one of the division's regiments became engaged in a four-day battle. This latter was the One hundred and ninth. When the Huns fell back across the Marne the Twenty-eighth Division was hurled in pursuit and overtook the enemy on July 29. It was engaged practically continuously from that time until September 7, when it was withdrawn, only to be hurled in again in the Argonne on September 26. It fought clear through to October 4, when it was withdrawn and sent to the St. Mihiel front. Two days before the armistice it began a new offensive.

The Seventy-ninth, however, went in on September 26 and was relieved October 1. It returned to the offensive November 1 northeast of Verdun, but did not begin actual fighting until November 7. From then on it was engaged in a bitter struggle. Summarized, the results are these:

Twenty-eighth Division, days of fighting, 50; total major losses, 3,890.
Seventy-ninth Division, days of fighting, 15; total major losses, 2,389.

The comparison is not to detract from the magnificent work of the Twenty-eighth or any other division, but merely to demonstrate what two brief offensives cost the selective-service men from eastern Pennsylvania and Maryland.

The Three hundred and sixteenth Infantry, named by Gen. March as having lost 800 men, is composed largely of Pennsylvanians, with about 30 per cent coming from this city. It was badly cut up north of Montfaucon between September 28 and October 1, and lost heavily again on November 7, when it took the Bois de Corneuillers, northeast of Verdun.

The Seventy-ninth holds another sad distinction, a distinction shared by the Twenty-eighth. These two Pennsylvania divisions and the fighting First were the only divisions to have more than 1,000 men missing. While the First Division led in this respect, the Twenty-eighth and Seventy-ninth followed close behind with 1,174 and 1,142, respectively.

The Twenty-eighth Division holds numerous records. It lost more men prisoners than any other division, with a total of 691. Two of its Infantry regiments, the One hundred and ninth and One hundred and tenth, both composed 50 per cent of Philadelphians, had the greatest casualties in the entire Army. Its total major losses exceeded those of any National Guard or National Army division and were only exceeded by the First Division's losses. It stood fourth in the total number of men killed, with 1,544, being led by the Third, Forty-second (Rainbow), and Thirty-second (Michigan and Wisconsin National Guards) in that respect.

The catastrophe at the Marne on July 15 accounts for the manner in which the division exceeds in total losses in men missing and in prisoners. Four companies, two from the One hundred and ninth Infantry and two from the One hundred and tenth, were literally cut to pieces by the Germans on July 15. There were just about enough survivors from all four companies to form a single unit of 250 men when the action ended. This disaster also accounts for the preponderant losses of the two regiments, the One hundred and tenth with 1,142 and the One hundred and ninth with 1,112.

The bulk of the losses in the One hundred and tenth were sustained in four engagements—July 15, when two companies were almost wiped out; July 30, when the regiment took the Grimpette woods, along the Ourcq; in August, north of the Vesle; and in late September, in the attack on Apremont.

The losses of the One hundred and ninth were garnered on July 15 south of the Marne; in August, north of Fismette; in early September, south of the Aisne; and in late September, on the Argonne front, at Apremont.

The One hundred and ninth Infantry is composed of the old First Regiment, N. G. P., of this city, and the Thirteenth from the vicinity of Scranton.

The One hundred and tenth is made up of the old Third Regiment, of this city, and the Tenth, of western Pennsylvania.

Perplexing Problems of the Paris Conference.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. MORIN,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, January 31, 1919.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, availing myself of the privilege granted by the unanimous consent of the House, I wish to include the address on the "Perplexing problems of the peace conference" delivered by my distinguished predecessor, Hon. James Francis Burke, general counsel of the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh, before that body on January 30, 1919.

Of all the many documents read by me since the world leaders met at Versailles, Mr. Burke's address is the most complete analysis of the world's problems thus far delivered in this country. It is so forcible, so eloquent, and so impartial that every American who reads it will be benefited and enlightened. His speech is as follows:

No military conflict in history ever attracted wider attention or aroused a keener interest in its developments than the great battle for final peace now in progress at Versailles. The guns of yesterday are silent, the charges of troops halted, and the strategy of military geniuses in abeyance, while through the maze of imposing formalities and impressive courtesies the most skillful diplomats of the age maneuver for power and points of vantage in a conference called to perfect treaties and perpetuate the peace of the world.

Broadly speaking, the task before the conference is not only to transform the present temporary peace into permanent form but to obliterate, as far as human ingenuity can do so, all those racial, geographical, political, and economic sore spots whose existence in the past have at intermittent periods thrown the body politic into violent convulsions.

There are those who believe that the proposed soothing process of arbitration which its advocates have in mind will prove comparatively easy of application and entirely effective in preventing future wars, while others regard it as a fantastic vision entitled only to a place in the cloudland of dreams and idealities.

Popular interest centers in the discussion of the proposed league of nations, and the most pronounced diversity of opinion exists regarding the practicability of creating an international or supernational body which will possess not only the legal authority but the necessary armed force to compel nations to yield to its decrees when the peaceful process of arbitration fails.

THE WORLD'S CONFERENCE.

Peace conferences and a study of the temporary or enduring character of their results offer a wide and fascinating field for intellectual diversion. While good has come from many of them, no conference has ever been held that successfully guaranteed or was followed by a permanent peace.

Whether Versailles is to mark the birth of a new era of never-ending international harmony is a question for whose reply I had rather depend upon the historian of to-morrow than trust the prophet of to-day.

Most of us fervently pray that it may succeed. Every believer in Christ's gospel of "peace on earth and good will toward man" sincerely hopes for its realization, but no student of history or analyst of the ever-present elements of human selfishness and national ambitions will discount the dangers of discord in the days to come.

The term "peace conference" is a misnomer when applied to all the treaty-making bodies that have followed the cessation of hostilities. Those who believe that suspicions disappear, that ignoble aspirations cease, and that good will takes the place of all the baser impulses and ambitions of men the moment peace delegates are chosen are ignorant of the events of history.

Beginning with the famous league, known as the Truce of God, which medieval Christendom brought about over 900 years ago to put an end to feudal wars, and which was supported by solemn religious oaths and armed forces, down to the present day, peace conferences have been followed by wars of increasing area, atrocity, and destruction as time has passed and as civilization is presumed to have developed.

WESTPHALIA—1648.

The great conference that produced the treaty of Westphalia in 1648 came at the end of 30 years of bloodshed; but that the animosities and bitterness of actual warfare survived the hour when arms were stacked is evident from the fact that three full years elapsed before the delegates chosen to negotiate the real terms of peace could even agree upon a place of meeting. Furthermore, when they did it was at two different places, in two different diplomatic divisions, and 13 years elapsed before that memorable treaty was finally agreed to by all the parties in interest.

Inasmuch as religious prejudices inspired the division of European territory in that treaty it, of course, rested upon a foundation of sand and lasted about as long as such a compact could be expected to survive.

In that congress there was not even attempted the creation of a universal league of nations.

UTRECHT—1713.

The treaty of Utrecht was negotiated in 1713, when France, Great Britain, Holland, Prussia, Savoy, Portugal, and Spain ended the bitter war over Spanish succession, and placed the Bourbon, Philip, on the throne, the crowns of France and Spain never to be united, gave Newfoundland and Nova Scotia to Great Britain, and also gave her Gibraltar and Minorca, and conferred upon her the right to ship African slaves to America. While territorial traces of this convention survive to the present day, yet despite all the avowals of friendship that followed it, affecting millions of people of different colors, customs, and castes in Africa, Europe, and America, peace soon gave way to war and the rulers and boundaries changed again with the whims of succeeding periods.

PARIS—1763–1898.

During the conference at Paris between France on the one side and Great Britain, Russia, Austria, and Prussia on the other, in the winter of 1814, Napoleon, who previously had abdicated at Fontainebleau, hearing of the bitter controversies between the peace delegates, left Elba, landed at Cannes on March 1, and entered Paris on March 20. The troops sent out under Ney to resist him joined him, and afterwards fell with him at Waterloo. Thus the convening of that conference was not succeeded by any more international harmony than we have at present under the surface between Prussia and Poland, Greece and Turkey, Italy and Czecho-Slovakia, and other conflicting elements in Europe to-day. In fact, its own discordant deliberations had much to do with bringing about the "Hundred Days War."

At none of the peace conferences of Paris, beginning in 1763 and ending in 1898, was a league of nations evolved. Nor was it even suggested in the conference of 1783 between France, Spain, Great Britain, and the United States, when American independence was acknowledged and ratified in treaty form.

VIENNA—1815.

The notable Congress of Vienna, convened in September, 1814, in response to Austria's invitation to all her diplomatic visiting list, except France, proceeded to arrange and adjust all the powers and principalities disturbed by Napoleon. When it concluded its sessions, in June, 1815, it had formed "The Holy Roman Alliance"—said to have been neither holy nor Roman—and the first real dream of universal peace for the moment impressed the world with the prospect of its permanency.

This alliance was formed by the sovereigns of Russia, Austria, and Prussia, and afterwards was joined by all European sovereigns except Rome and England, although some dispute exists as to England's real attitude and relation to it.

It professed to unite all in a Christian brotherhood, while in reality it was designed for the sole selfish purpose of perpetuating its own group of dynasties.

And while it was the most pretentious of all the peace problems of history, its harvest of harmony ended within 15 years, when the French Revolution of 1830 and other local conflicts kindled new flames in Europe.

Nor was this plan a newly devised one any more than is the "league of nations" which is being so widely discussed to-day. In fact, the idea of a league of nations was originally outlined and published by Abbe St. Pierre in 1713 as a scheme for perpetual peace, and subsequently submitted by the Russian Emperor Alexander to Pitt in 1804, and was ultimately crystallized into the "holy alliance" of 1815. Incidentally, it is interesting and important to recall that it was in opposition to the ambitious schemes underlying this very "holy alliance" that President Monroe injected into his famous message of 1823 the admonition which laid the foundation of the Monroe doctrine and frustrated the imperial designs of Europe on the Western Hemisphere during the century that followed.

VERSAILLES.

By comparing it with all the great conferences preceding, it will be apparent that the body now in session at Versailles is confronted with problems greater in number, more vital in character, and more far-reaching in their consequences than any other in the world's history.

Hence every step in its construction and every chapter in its proceeding is of absorbing interest.

The place of meeting is governed by precedent and propriety. It is on the soil of a victor and at a point agreeable to all of the triumphant powers interested in its outcome.

The supreme allied council, or steering committee, consists of the United States, France, England, Italy, and Japan, by which general control over all preliminaries is exercised, developed, and acted by common consent and not in pursuance of any fixed inflexible rule of law or precedent.

The apportionment of representation is a matter temporarily within the discretion of the supreme council, but finally within the jurisdiction of the congress itself.

The right to preside is governed by well-defined rules of international courtesy and belongs by right to France, in which the congress is held. Hence, the election of Clemenceau.

Whether all the delegates shall participate in all the proceedings is within the discretion of the body itself.

In addition to the main delegates there are also secondary or technical delegates, who may speak when requested to do so regarding any of the subjects of which they have made a special study or upon which they are admitted to be recognized authorities.

Whether every nation that enters shall be held responsible for the future enforcement of peace among all the nations who may engage in disputes over alleged violations of conditions agreed to by this conference is for the conference itself to determine and the treaty or treaties to specify.

What language is to be the medium of expression in the conference is one question, while that used in the final written instrument is another. One language alone or several may be used during the conference, and the same rule applies to the treaty itself.

When the treaty is between two distinct tongues the custom is to run it in parallel columns in both languages and to sign in duplicate.

When the treaty includes covenants to be signed, say, by the United States, France, China, Japan, Greece, Italy, Germany, and Russia, speaking many distinct tongues, they may all sign a single document in French, which is "the language of the courts," or they may be in as many forms and languages as the signatories may agree upon.

SELECTION OF DELEGATES.

The manner of selecting delegates varies in different countries. In the United States it is wholly a presidential function, and, while controversy has waxed warm over the right as well as the propriety of the President to act directly rather than by delegating the duty to others, there is no doubt whatever but that he has the legal right himself to act as the only delegate, or as one of many delegates, if he deems it proper to do so. There is nothing in the Constitution which renders it impossible for the Chief Executive in this regard to do directly what he may do indirectly.

This does not mean, however, that there can not be a serious and an honest difference of opinion regarding the wisdom of the President's recent and present course.

Whether the dignity and the influence of the presidential office will be impaired or enhanced, whether the power and the prestige of the Nation itself will be added to or diminished, are questions upon which wise men will differ and over which partisans will indulge in controversy whose bitterness too frequently blinds the participants to the virtues of each other's attitude.

Whether the admitted intellectual force of the man himself and the unquestioned prestige with which the presidential office endows the individual wherever he may go, renders it imperative that Mr. Wilson in the capacity of Chief Executive impress his presence and his views upon the body whose decisions are fraught with such vital consequence to the American people and to the world or whether, in keeping with our loftiest traditions and in accord with the examples of our Presidents from the days of Washington, it were wiser for him to invoke the use of the brains and experience of some of the great men of our country for the immediate work of the peace congress, as all other nations are doing, and reserve to himself as the final arbiter the right to ratify or reject whatever agreement may be negotiated, will no doubt continue to be a seriously disputed question for many years to come.

A multitude of earnest and well-informed people believe that the President can not afford to deny the American people the full benefit of his superior intellectual attainments on the scene of action when so precious a price as the permanent peace of the world is at stake. Many others, equally well informed and patriotic, declare that he can not afford, directly or by implication, to lead the people of the world to believe that among the hundred million Americans there is no set of men of adequate experience or of sufficient intellectual force and capacity, without his aid and presence, capable of meeting and matching the wits of other nations, and faithfully and competently protecting the interests of this mighty Republic in any conference on any subject in any section of the world.

PRESIDENT OR DELEGATE?

Some suggest the fine-haired distinction that Mr. Wilson is acting as premier and not as President. If this be true, can the President legally or with propriety divest himself of his office, hang the presidential hat in the hall of the Trianon, and enter a chamber which chokes with the spirit of controversy and take his place as a delegate among the rank and file of the subordinates of other nations?

If he can, what becomes of the presidential office and who is our Chief Executive during the interim? This question recently brought from one of the most zealous senatorial champions of the President the suggestion that he was at Versailles not as President nor as premier but as the Commander in Chief of our armies.

Others quickly pointed out the inconsistency of this claim by suggesting that if he is there in a military capacity as our Army's chief commander he denied himself a great opportunity for service by waiting until the guns were stacked and the fighting ceased before he entered France. I believe the suggestion of his zealous champion does the President an injustice.

RIGHT TO RATIFY.

When we recall the processes by which treaties are perfected another serious question involving the President's direct participation presents itself. In England the delegates are named with full power to act, without reserving the right of parliamentary rejection or modification, and in other countries the procedure differs from ours, but no treaty can become binding upon the United States or a part of the supreme law of this Republic until certain well-defined steps are taken.

First, it is attested by the signatories at the conference, thence it goes through the Secretary of State to the President, and by the President it must be submitted to the Senate, not for ratification but for rejection or approval.

The Senate may pigeonhole it permanently, it may discuss it for any length of time, or it may adopt a resolution approving it without a single word of debate. Then comes the final act of ratification, which belongs to the President and not to the Senate, as popularly understood.

Can the President at this stage veto a treaty which his plenipotentiaries have negotiated and which he has invited the Senate to approve? He can, and he may do it by affirmative written declaration or by withholding his signature and consigning it to the wastebasket.

Here, however, arises another question. If while the Senate discussed the treaty new conditions arose or the President changed his mind, could the President veto or withhold his signature as President from a treaty which personally he had negotiated and signed as a delegate and which he had invited the Senate to approve? No doubt he could, but would not his presence as a delegate and his signature as such prove somewhat embarrassing, to say the least? On the other hand, is the probability of such a dilemma arising sufficiently strong to forbid his acting as a delegate in the first instance?

PROBLEMS OF THE CONFERENCE.

We come next to the problems of the conference itself. These are varied in character and many in number.

First. Shall the President's doctrine of "open covenants openly made" prevail? If so, what of the new controversies the publication of every bitter expression in debate might engender among the rank and file of people whose patience and poise might not equal that of trained diplomats who learn to give and take in discussion?

Second. The important questions to be settled between the central powers and the allies, including evacuation, restoration, and indemnities. This includes the disposition of Germany's colonies and the political interests of the millions of human beings affected; it also includes the determination of the economic and financial burden to be imposed upon Germany and Austria after they are stripped of the territory of which each is to be deprived in the readjustment, and also the question as to whether they shall pay in full all the damages their wicked destruction wrought upon nations. If the latter course meant their bankruptcy and ruin and meant defeat of the purpose itself by rendering them incapable of carrying it out, shall they be compelled to pay all they can bear within a period of 50 years; and if so, how shall the indemnities thus paid be divided among those who suffered losses?

Shall they be compelled to repudiate their home debt of billions of dollars, held by their own people, until all the obligations due all people of other countries are liquidated?

Third. The treatment to be applied to Russia in order to avert the further spread of bolshevism and anarchy.

Fourth. The settlement of 26 dangerous and irritating territorial disputes in Europe in addition to those in Asia and Africa.

Fifth. The definition of and an agreement regarding the so-called "freedom of the seas."

Sixth. The manner in which the economic barriers between nations shall be removed.

Seventh. The definite formation of a league of nations, with a clear and distinct understanding as to who shall compose it and what its powers and methods of procedure shall be.

Let us deal briefly with these problems in their order.

The first involves No. 1 of the President's 14 points: "Open covenants of peace openly arrived at," and a process by which "diplomacy shall always proceed openly and in the public view." This would mean not only the end of secret treaties and agreements, but also the end of all secret sessions and discussions attending their negotiation. One school advocates pitiless publication of every expression of every delegate regarding every question affecting all the nations involved in settling their disputes, on the theory that the light of day will prove a universal antidote for the evils of secret diplomacy.

The other school declares that such a course would add fuel to the flames already kindled, intensify the hatreds and animosities of races, and sow new seeds of discord among those who would not be inclined to display the moderation and exercise the self-control of which great intellectual leaders and trained diplomats are capable and to which they are accustomed in settling serious disputes.

Literally, this would mean that the executive sessions of the United States Senate, in which our most delicate and important affairs with foreign nations are discussed, are to be abolished, after continuing for 140 years without serious criticism.

Also it would mean that even the President's Cabinet, when it meets to discuss an important treaty with a foreign power, shall throw open the doors and invite the eager ears of foreign diplomats and spies to cable every word of dissension in our own councils across the seas to foreign offices.

But that this expression does not mean what the country first understood it to convey when the President used it in his speech of January 8, 1918, is apparent from his letter to Secretary Lansing on March 12, two months later, in which, in reply to a query regarding the Borah resolution to compel the Senate to conduct all treaty discussions in open session, the President said: "When I pronounced for open diplomacy, I meant not that there should be no private discussions of delicate matters, but that no secret agreement should be entered into, and that all international relations when fixed should be open, above board, and explicit."

Inasmuch as under our form of government it is impossible to have a secret treaty, and that no such treaty ever existed in the history of this Nation, the President's declaration for publicity after the fact is nothing new—in reality, it is more than 100 years old.

The second series of problems need only be named to reveal their difficulties, and as I have already mentioned them their repetition is unnecessary.

The importance of the third, involving the treatment of Russia, is heightened by the fact that her betrayal, which constitutes one of history's most shameful stories of bribery, bloodshed, and national disintegration, is being followed by a reckless disregard for law which not only imperils Europe, but threatens to fan into flame the smoldering embers of anarchy throughout the world.

The fourth problem includes a number of territorial disputes, several of which so seriously threatened a new outbreak of war that the peace congress a few days since was compelled to issue a warning to several of the smaller nations involved.

Let us glance over Mowrer's array of disputes and wonder how and when perpetual peace is going to dawn in Europe:

1. The Aaland Island, now held by Russia, apparently claimed by Sweden.

2. Helgoland, now held by Germany, probably claimed by England.

3. Denmark demands the return of Schleswig from the hands of the Germans.

4. Belgium seems to be preparing to demand from Holland the Province of Limburg, which stretches like a peninsula between Belgium and Germany and forms an awkward barrier.

LUXEMBURG'S ALTERNATIVE.

5. Luxemburg will be called upon to decide whether she prefers to be French, Belgian, or independent.

6. France desires to neutralize the left bank of the Rhine.

7. France wants to include the Sarre Basin in Lorraine.

8. Italy claims part of the Austrian Tyrol.

9. The Italians and Jugo-Slavs are engaged in bitter controversy over the Dalmatian coast, which both claim; they are intrenching opposite one another where the lines meet north of Fiume.

10. Northern Albania is claimed by the Jugo-Slavs, the Valona region by Italy, and southern Albania by Greece, while the Albanians themselves desire independence.

11. Greece claims all of Thrace, including Constantinople, from Bulgaria and Turkey.

12. Greeks, Serbs, and Bulgars all demand favorable frontier rectifications in Macedonia.

13. The Jugo-Slavs seem to claim the strip running from Graz to the Danube east of Vienna so as to give them a common frontier with the Czecho-Slovaks.

BITTER PROTEST BY HUNGARIANS.

14. The Hungarians protest bitterly against the newly declared southeastern frontier of Slovakia.

15. The Poles, Czechs, and Germans all claim Silesia.

16. The annexation of the banat of Temesvar has been proclaimed by both the Jugo-Slavs and the Roumanians, while the Hungarians are unwilling to relinquish it.
17. The Roumanians occupying Transylvania are driving out the Hungarians.
18. Roumanians and Ruthenians are fighting over Bukovina.
19. The Bulgarians want a favorable frontier rectification in the Dobroges.
20. Roumanians are occupying Bessarabia, which the Ukrainians also claim.
21. The Poles and Ruthenians are fighting over eastern Galicia.
22. The Germans and Poles are fighting over Posen.

CLAIMS BY POLAND.

23. The Poles claim the valley of the Vistula and Danzig from Prussia.
24. The Poles claim east Prussia.
25. The Poles claim Lithuania, which seems to prefer independence.
26. The Bolsheviki are invading the Baltic Provinces, which seem to desire independence.

The fifth problem of the Congress involves a definition and enforcement of the President's declaration for "freedom of the seas."

If this means the right of unmolested travel for all law-abiding people upon the great highways of the world beyond territorial waters, many assume that the enjoyment of such right was made certain the day the German fleet surrendered, the Prussian mine floater was discovered, and the hell-born submarine ended its mission of murder.

If it is designed to end England's undisputed sway as mistress of the seas, the present plan of our Navy Department to equal or surpass England's Navy in 1925 should set at rest the apprehension of those who are unwilling longer to intrust her with that power.

If it means the dismantling of the navies of England, France, and Japan, then, too, must it mean the end of Navy building in America and ultimately an unprotected American merchant marine seeking sales for its cargoes in the great markets of the world.

In fact, the list of things it might and might not mean is too formidable to repeat, and for this reason the world eagerly awaits its official definition and will welcome its enforcement if it proves just and practical.

The sixth problem involves the removal of all economic barriers between nations.

While the President, who is also the author of this suggestion, has not defined just what idea he intended to convey, many of his friends and political adherents declare that this does not mean, as some assert, the tearing down of customhouses and the repeal of all tariff and customs revenue laws. That what the President meant, as he said in his recent notes to the Senate, was that while all nations were to impose whatever customs tariffs they saw fit they must impose them against all countries alike.

Those who disagree with the President quickly point out that this would forbid the United States maintaining a reciprocity agreement with Cuba, which has proven so beneficial to both; that it would be an insurmountable barrier against our building up trade through reciprocity treaties with South America; that it would compel us to allow Germany and China and all other countries that saw fit, regardless of their labor conditions, to enter our markets on the same terms as any other nation with which we sought a businesslike reciprocal trade agreement.

Whatever it means, the peace conference will have no easy task in solving these economic problems to the entire satisfaction of the world.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Lastly we come to the league of nations, the dream of the ages, a dream that its vast army of intelligent and well-meaning advocates declare and believe is soon and certain to be realized—realized, as one of its great advocates declared, because Jesus Christ, the Savior of Man dreamed of it; because David, the sweet singer of Israel, dreamed of it; because George Washington, the father of our Nation, dreamed of it; because the poet Tennyson dreamed of it; because Robert E Lee dreamed of it; and because millions of mothers in the broken homes of the world are dreaming of it to-day; and, finally, because the spirits of 10,000,000 dead men who but yesterday fell victims to the folly and criminal shortsightedness of man are whispering their supplications into the ears of a just God that national butchery shall end and war shall be no more.

And that is why, with the burning spirit of crusaders, the advocates of the league of nations believe in their cause.

That, my friends, is why their zeal is entitled to the respect of all, including the equally great body of well-informed people who realize that until humanity is itself stripped of its selfishness, until nations are divested of their ambitions, and all the prejudices of race, class, and creed and clime have disappeared from the earth, a binding league of nations possessing power to institute and perpetuate the peace of the world will continue for centuries to come, as it has for centuries in the past, a mere vision, a companion of the stars, beyond the reach of man.

The advocates of the league declare that as nations are as civilized as the people who compose them, there is no more justification for their adhering to war to adjust their disputes than for men themselves to repudiate courts and go back to the brutal process of the "wager of battle" which prevailed among the tribes of former days.

That, as a matter of fact, the frightful destruction of life and property involved should make it even a greater inducement for nations to submit their disputes to an international tribunal than the ordinary private losses involved would induce individuals to invoke the aid of the courts of law.

That if a league were formed compelling nations, before actually shedding blood in any justiciable cause, to submit the question to arbitration, and any nation should refuse, the scorn of mankind would be so strongly manifested and the moral force of the world would be so formidably asserted against it that no nation could survive its wicked disregard of international fair play.

Many of the league's advocates believe also that it is entirely practicable to create a world court (with rules written in advance by the powers creating it) with authority to decide all international questions and to enforce its decisions by ordering all the signatory nations to punish any offender by an economic boycott, thus making her at the same time a political outcast and a prisoner within her own borders, with all means of dealing or communicating with the outside world denied her, which, of course, would probably mean commercial ruin, industrial stagnation, and physical starvation.

Other league proponents go a step further and would equip this international or supernation body with an interallied army and navy, which it may order to attack any nation disputing its decrees.

The most distinct line of cleavage yet developed between those who differ regarding the practicability of such a league involves its right to use armed forces to render its decrees effective.

Advocates of the force theory declare such a joint military and naval force entirely practical, while the opponents irreverently designate it as a "foolish dream."

Let us dispassionately review some of the suggestions of the leaders in both groups. The last of President Wilson's 14 points reads as follows:

"A general association of nations must be formed under specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guaranties of political independence and territorial integrity to great and small States alike."

The President, in elaborating upon this, declared:

"My conception of a league of nations is just this: That it shall operate as the moral force of men throughout the world, and that whenever or wherever wrong and aggression are planned or contemplated this searchlight of conscience will be turned upon them, and men everywhere will ask 'What are the purposes that you hold in your heart against the fortunes of the world?'"

Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler says:

"Let these nations, assembled by their representatives at Versailles, declare themselves to be a league of nations organized for the precise purposes for which the war was fought and with which their several peoples are entirely familiar, namely, the definition and protection of standards of international right and justice, the sanctity of international obligations, and the right of the small and less numerous peoples to be free from attack or domination by their larger and more powerful neighbors. This will be sufficient to begin with."

Mr. Talcot Williams says:

"The league is inevitable. It exists for war. Why not for peace? It has suffered from too much definition. It would do its chief work in preventing war by the use of military force to prevent hostilities by action without the declaration of war, avoiding disturbance to trade, to international intercourse, and to credits."

Senator JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS:

"There are only two ways of keeping the peace of the world. One by an amphictyonic council of the civilized world which we are trying to secure; the other is by the domination by one great world power, such as the Prussian and the Germans attempted and failed."

Viscount Grey:

"The Versailles conference will be the vital beginning of such a league. All that is necessary is that it should not commit suicide but keep itself alive by recessing from time to time and maintaining a permanent organization. This is not all that is desirable but all that is essential. A beginning that has vitality is better than a more complete plan that has no life. One is a living thing and the other a piece of furniture."

Lord Parmoor:

"I approve of the principle of a league of nations and the constitution of a tribunal whose order shall be enforcible by an adequate sanction."

Lord Curzon: "The French commission seems to have pointed out that it would be out of the question to set up an international police, a state above all other states whose aims should be to substitute law for force in the settlement of these national disputes. In this I think we shall all concur."

The plan of Baron de Constant and Leon Bourgeois agrees with the American suggestions generally and differs with the French commission.

Lord Parker: "It is a very serious matter to ask great nations to agree beforehand to submit disputes of whatever nature to the arbitrament of a tribunal consisting of some two dozen or three dozen States, many of whom may be interested in casting their votes on this side or that."

The absence of French quotations is best explained by the following letter from Robert E. Olds, one of the best-informed Americans in France:

"I assume you are following closely the career of that ancient and honorable idea of a league of nations. One gains the distinct impression that the French regard the notion as chimerical and visionary."

OUR OFFICIAL ATTITUDE.

As compared with the report of the French commission, the American Government by the act of Congress of August 29, 1916, declared it to be "the policy of the United States to adjust and settle its international disputes through arbitration to the end that war may be honorably avoided, and the President is authorized and requested to invite at an appropriate time all the great Governments of the world to a conference which shall be charged with the duty of formulating a plan for a court of arbitration, etc., to appoint nine citizens of the United States as delegates, and to expend such portion of $200,000 as may be necessary to carry this act into effect."

Mr. Wilson signed this bill, but never acted upon the suggestion.

This act, you will observe, makes no reference to equipping the court with a joint army and navy to enforce its decree.

Perhaps the most thoughtful and elaborate of all expressions on the subject are those of Lord Bryce, in which he concludes:

"I think we may dismiss all these grandoise notions of what has been called a federation of the world and attempts to induce the great States to forego sovereignty and to submit to some superior authority and to constitute an international army. All these schemes must belong to a very distant future, and I do not think we ought to contemplate any further limitation of sovereignty. It is not to be denied that the difficulties in the way are very great. I do not think anyone can appreciate how great these perplexities are unless he confines himself to a close and long-continued study of the subject and to the various plans that have been advanced."

Lord Bryce suggests the following concrete essentials of the league of nations, upon which its advocates are to accord:

1. The prevention of war, one of the world's supreme necessities.
2. War can be obviated only by arbitration.
3. Arbitration can not succeed without force behind it.
4. Compulsive force can be secured only by international operation.
5. Every member of such a league must agree to accept arbitration.
6. The league shall defend any of its members who may be attacked by any other State refusing to support arbitration.
7. The league will require:

(a) A tribunal to arbitrate justiciable controversies;

(b) A council of conciliation to inquire into and apply mediation to nonjusticiable controversies;

(c) A conference to amend, regulate, and codify international laws; and

(d) An executive authority to decide on the time and methods of compelling States to submit to arbitration.

8. Enforcement may be either by economic pressure or armed force, or both.

The points upon which they do not agree are as follows:
1. What principal shall control the admission of States to the league?
2. Shall members, great and small, have equal powers?
3. How shall the judges or arbitrators in the council of conciliation be chosen?
4. Shall the executive authority consist of persons representing the nations who are its members, or how otherwise?
5. Shall the council have power to act when it sees danger without being requested by a disputant State?
6. Shall the league have a standing army and navy?
7. Shall its decisions require a unanimous vote or merely a majority of the governments represented?
8. Shall the league have power merely to force nations to arbitrate their differences or shall it also have power to force them to abide by the arbitration decree?
9. How are military and naval armaments to be reduced?
10. Can members of the league conduct secret diplomacy?
11. Can members of the league have separate treaties among themselves?
12. May members of the league have different tariff or reciprocity agreements with each other?

Senator LODGE has suggested another serious question as to whether or not there shall be any race exclusion or discrimination.

To this formidable array of obstacles the thoughtful American is compelled to ask by what constitutional authority any department or officer of this Government can confer upon any international or supernational body, beyond the control of the United States, the right to enforce its decree against the United States to attack any other power, or even to attack the United States itself, in order to enforce the decree of such foreign independent body? Can the United States by any arrangement afford to place its great instrumentalities of power in the hands of any foreign body which it does not itself control with the authority upon the part of such a foreign body to use American arms against nations with whom we have no direct disputes or grievance?

Can the power to declare war, which is vested in the American Congress alone, be delegated to an alien body in which we might possibly have a single representative? Would it be constitutional? Would it be prudent?

As a great many of the world's serious disturbances and injustices involve disputes between peoples and their own governments, is the league of nations to have any power to intervene between citizens and their own governments, between subject and sovereign, and thus control the internal affairs of other nations under the guise of averting civil war and preserving the world's peace? If so, are the Army and Navy of the United States to be used for that purpose without affirmative action by our Government?

WILL IT REDUCE ARMAMENTS?

But one of the most practical of all questions is whether the formation of the proposed league is to do away, to any extent, with armies and navies, and is the great tax burden of militarism to be lifted from the people who are to-day groaning under the load already imposed?

The most surprising answer to this is found in the proceedings of our own Congress within the past few months, when Secretary Daniels, before the Naval Committee, made the startling declaration that the present proposed expenditure of $600,000,000, as a consequence of which the United States in 1925 would have the greatest navy in the world, even outstripping England, was necessary in connection with the formation of the proposed league of nations.

Secretary Daniels amazed the committee when he said: "You can do nothing in the world which would so strengthen this country's position at the peace conference as to authorize this enlarged naval program." The following is also the New York Times' report of his testimony before the same committee:

"Secretary Daniels and the naval officials desire to have a navy which will be as large as that of any other country not only for our own purposes but for policing the world in case a league of nations to enforce peace is created at the Versailles conference."

Admiral Badger, before the same committee, declared navies must be the principal support of the league of nations, and the United States will be called upon to contribute a very large share of the international police force to render the league effective. The admiral was supporting the $600,000,000 program.

For these reasons it is well for those who are ardently urging a league on the theory of lightening the world's burdens to bear in mind that its creation is to be followed in our own case by the largest naval expenditure of any nation in the history of mankind.

In view of the foregoing list of problems to be solved and the obstacles to be surmounted by the men at Versailles, reasonable and thoughtful citizens of this Republic will understand why our former Secretary of State and present Senator, Mr. KNOX, suggested by resolution that the immediate problems of the war should first be disposed of in order that the people of all nations might resume a more normal, placid, and impartial state of mind and in order, too, that when that judicial atmosphere is established the world might take up and consider the wider and more fundamental problems involved in the establishment of a league of nations to avert discord and perpetuate the world's peace.

In conclusion, let us ask, whatever may be the present and future motives and ambitions of other nations, have the people of the United States not established in a greater degree than any other their devotion to the spirit of fair play and their freedom from many of the local and petty prejudices and selfish aspirations that still linger about other nations? If this be true, why not continue to build up and intensify our people's love for those ideals, and the love and respect of other peoples for our country, and keep as far and free as possible from unnecessary foreign entanglements and alliances?

Why not keep in mind, too, that in spite of all their unselfishness and sacrifices for mankind, the Italians crimsoned the snows among the clouds with their blood primarily because of their love for Italy; that the British fell in millions before Hindenburg's armies primarily because of their love of England; that the Blue Devils wrote the most heroic stories of sacrifices of the war in their own blood at Verdun because of their love and devotion to France; and that every soldier of this Republic who died in the St. Michel salient and fell face downward in his own blood in the Argonne Forest died not only for mankind but above all because he loved the land of Washington and Lincoln and its hundred million free people—and thus it will ever continue to be, men will be willing to live and die for their country, their kinsmen, and their homes, but will the day ever dawn when their devotion to their country can be literally wiped out or transferred to some distant, independent conglomeration of nations of which they are only an incidental part?

Let us approach the solution of these problems as we would a sanctuary, and if ever God's holy light revealed to man his duty, let it reveal it now, when the peace of to-morrow depends so much upon the prudence of to-day.

Theodore Roosevelt.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FREDERICK C. HICKS,
OF NEW YORK,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 6, 1919.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I insert the following:

[Memorial address delivered by Hon. FREDERICK C. HICKS, of Long Island, at the Sunday Tabernacle, Washington, Jan. 12, 1919.]

THEODORE ROOSEVELT, THE FOREMOST SOLDIER OF THE COMMON GOOD OF HIS GENERATION.

In the universe of God there are no accidents. From the fall of a sparrow to the fall of an empire or the sweep of a planet, all is according to Divine Providence whose laws are everlasting.

Roosevelt the man is no more; Roosevelt the example still lives. Mourn not his death, rejoice rather in the grandeur of his achievements. Be thankful that this man among men set his conceptions of life and his precepts of duty so high that the generations to follow will be guided by his example and inspired by his attainments.

Strong in body, vigorous in intellect, fearless in action, inflexible in determination, he molded public opinion in a higher envisagement of the obligations of citizenship, and by his indomitable purpose shaped the destinies of a nation. A virile Americanism was the characteristic of his soul, the guide of his life, constant as the eternal stars. His was the voice which sounded the warning of imminent national peril; his was the voice which roused the Nation from its lethargy of unpreparedness; his was the voice which summoned the American people, without prejudice and without preference, to unanimity of sentiment and unity of service in support of the national cause. In every act, in every utterance from the beginning to the end, his first, his only motive was "my country, ever my country."

The primal truths of the declaration of principles which gave our Nation birth, the ideals and the purposes which carried it forward in the full sweep of its power, were the tenets of his American creed, exemplified by his actions as a statesman, glorified by his deeds as a soldier. He breathed the lofty spirit of patriotism of the fathers of the Republic and ceaselessly transmitted it to his generation.

A wonderful individuality coupled with a magnetic personality endeared him to all, friend and opponent, critic and adherent alike. His deep sympathy and sincere interest in every phase of human activity drew to him the admiration, the affection, and the confidence of innumerable thousands, who looked to him as leader, counsellor, friend. Untiring in his efforts for the uplift of humanity, his days were all too short for the energies of his mind and the generosities of his heart. A fidelity of purpose and a profundity of moral rectitude guided him in private act and public service. He was the foremost soldier of the common good of his generation.

His superb courage was halted neither by the magnitude of the task before him nor the criticisms of those who differed with him. His splendid optimism, lofty patriotism, and unbounded faith in humanity never deserted him; they were with him in his college days, in his early manhood and maturer years, as statesman and soldier, in public and private life; they were with him, radiant and strong, when his spirit passed to the great beyond. They were the philosophy of his life, the touchstone of his thoughts, the mentor of his actions, fundamental principles, firmly welded into his very being.

His conception of duty can best be expressed by his own words:

I wish to preach not the doctrine of ignoble ease but the doctrine of the strenuous life, the life of toil and effort, of labor and strife, to preach that highest form of success, which comes not to the man who desires mere easy peace but to the man who does not shrink from danger, from hardships, or from bitter toil, and who out of these wins the splendid triumph.

As a man, justice, simplicity, frankness, determination, kindliness of heart, and unswerving loyalty to friends, all were met in him. Happy in life, his home was ideal and the family ties perfect and complete. Deeply imbued with divine teachings, incorruptible in purpose, with a course steadfast as the needle to the pole, his life moved forward to its fullness under the watchful guidance of an omnipotent Providence.

As a soldier, his signal ability as an organizer, tenacity as a fighter, and genius as a leader of men won for him renown in the War with Spain. When the call came in the great conflict he pleaded for the chance to vindicate on the battle fields of France—by the supreme sacrifice, if need be—the convictions of his soul. Rejected, he gave four sons to win distinguished honor in the service of their country.

As a statesman, his profound knowledge of human nature, marvelous insight into the motives and ambitions of men, and clear and unerring perception of right, awakened the conscience of the people and carried the Nation onward to higher planes of thought and action.

As a lover of nature he held communion with her various forms, rejoicing in the beauties of hill and forest and stream, of rolling sea, of boundless sky, of sweeping prairie. He delighted to study the habits of the great beasts of the jungle in their native haunts or listen to the song of the birds nestling in the trees about his Long Island home.

As a scholar, his wide and deep study unfolded the beauties of the literature of the ages; his accurate analysis of the underlying factors in the development and advancement of civilization, together with a keen perception of the essentials of history, gave to his pen a versatility of thought, a strength of expression, and a purity of diction entitling him to preeminence among the foremost men of letters of his generation.

His life was an answer to that noble sentiment:

"Bring me men to match my mountains,
Bring me men to match my plains;
Men with empires in their purpose
And new era in their brains;
Pioneers to clear thought's marshlands
And to cleanse old error's fen;
Bring me men to match my mountains—
Bring me men!"

He sleeps and the nations weep. He has gone, but the cherished memories of his life remain. Silent is the voice that was the clarion call of a Nation. Yet the grave speaketh a benediction upon a life nobly spent, and whispers a message of love to his grieving countrymen. He has departed, but his name survives; a name too grand for any State, too great for any nation, too noble for any generation; a name which through all the ages shall be the guiding star for all mankind. His tomb on the hilltop by the waters, radiant with the golden light of his home across the valley, in the land he loved the best, will be revered by the centuries, and for generations to come those who seek the noblest attributes of man will receive their inspiration at his shrine.

"Put None But Americans on Guard To-Night."

(President George Washington.)

[Address by Hon. W. FRANK JAMES, of Michigan, delivered at the Knickerbocker Theater on Memorial Day, May 30, 1918.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PATRICK H. KELLEY,

OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 8, 1919.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address by Hon. W. FRANK JAMES, of Michigan, delivered at the Knickerbocker Theater on Memorial Day, May 30, 1918:

ADDRESS OF HON. W. FRANK JAMES, OF MICHIGAN.

Fellow Americans, our most important duty these days is to "Win the war" and "Beat the Hun," and, when I say beat the Hun, I not only mean the Hun over there, but the Hun over here. In fact, I have far more respect for the Hun over there than the Hun over here—those damnable traitors who want to live over here according to the American standard of living—I mean those modern Benedict Arnolds who want to work over here and be paid according to the American wage scale, but whose sympathies and hearts are over there. If I had my way about it, I would not put a single pro-German nor traitorous American in an internment camp, but I would put them so far under the ground that the smell of brimstone would remind them of their future homes.

We meet here to-day not only to pay a tribute to the heroes of '61 and '98, but also to the heroes of this war.

All over this broad land to-day there are millions of little flags, "service flags," to show that "a man from this house has gone to fight" and, if need be, die for his country.

I never see a service flag in a window but what it reminds me of that most beautiful poem, "The service flag," by Mr. William Herschell.

THE SERVICE FLAG.

[William Herschell.]

Dear little flag in the window there,
Hung with a tear and a woman's prayer;
Child of Old Glory, born with a star—
Oh, what a beautiful flag you are!

Blue is your star in its field of white,
Dipped in the red that was born of fight;
Born of the blood that our forbears shed
To raise your mother, The Flag, o'erhead.

And now you've come, in this frenzied day,
To speak from a window—to speak and say:
"I am the voice of a soldier-son
Gone to be gone till the victory's won.

"I am the flag of The Service, sir;
The flag of his mother—I speak for her
Who stands by my window and waits and fears
But hides from the others her unwept tears.

"I am the flag of the wives who wait
For the safe return of a martial mate,
A mate gone forth where the war god thrives
To save from sacrifice other men's wives.

"I am the flag of the sweethearts true;
The often unthought of—the sisters, too.
I am the flag of a mother's son
And won't come down till the victory's won."

Dear little flag in the window there,
Hung with a tear and a woman's prayer,
Child of Old Glory, born with a star—
Oh, what a wonderful flag you are!

Memorial Day means more to us to-day than ever it did before. We meet to-day to pay tribute to our heroes who died on land and on sea.

In talking at Arlington Cemetery at the Maine memorial a year ago, where we gathered to pay a memorial tribute, I used these words in part:

We have gathered here to-day to pay a memorial tribute to our brave comrades of '98 who went down in Habana Harbor in the Maine.

He has come back home, asleep,
With the flag above his face;
With the starry fold to keep
Guard above his resting place;
And beneath blue summer skies,
Where he dreams below the sod,
But a single rosebud lies
Now between his heart and God!

They have gone to join the heroes who fought at Bunker Hill.
They have gone to clasp the hands of those who suffered at Valley Forge.
They have gone to live with those who fell at Monterey.
They have gone to meet those who died at Gettysburg.

This is not a new bereavement, but one which time, the healer of even the most severe grief, has softened. These are not new-made graves we garland, for over them all nature has already spread the memorials of her love. They have received the benediction of her sunshine and her tears, and above them her vines and grasses have spread the mantle of immortality.

Of the nearly 3,000,000 soldiers who "tented on the old camp grounds" in 1861 there now remains but a corporal's guard. The ranks of the brave boys in blue of 1861 who fought so gloriously at Mission Ridge, at Chickamauga, at Gettysburg, and hundreds of other glorious battle fields are now being rapidly thinned by Father Time; 20,000 or more have passed over the Great Divide to answer the last "roll call" during the past year.

Their marching line is now thinned to color bearers and file bearers. It is now only a specter army of gray-haired men, who once a year on Memorial Day keep step to the shrill of the old fife and the taps of the muffled war drums. To-day the worn blue line closes up the gap made upon it by another year; again it is marching to the "bivouac of the dead" to pay tribute to their old comrades, and beside the worn line of blue marches the thin line of the gray.

Those in the robings of glory,
Those in the gloom of defeat,
All with the battle blood gory,
In the dusk of eternity meet.
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day,
Under the laurel the blue,
Under the willow the gray.

From the silence of sorrowful hours
The desolate mourners go,
Loving laden with flowers,
Alike for the friend and the foe.
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day,
Under the roses the blue,
Under the lilies the gray.

As we attend each successive Memorial Day exercises we see fewer of the old familiar faces, and it will only be the space of a few short years when we will be called upon to attend the last rites of the last hero of the Civil War and hear our chaplain repeat these solemn words: "Earth to earth, ashes to ashes, and dust to dust."

When the last hero of 1861 has passed to his reward the veterans of 1898 will carry the good work onward until they, too, pass over the great divide; but until that time Memorial Day will be to us who were lucky or unlucky enough to have taken part in the Spanish-American War a sacred trust, bequeathed to us by the immortal heroes of the Civil War.

As I have said, in addition to honoring those who died on land and on sea in 1861 and 1898 we are to-day paying our memorial tribute to those who have died on land and on sea in this great war.

The first Americans to give their lives for their country were those who died on the Tuscania.

The boys who died when the Maine was blown up in Habana Harbor we honor as much as those who died at Gettysburg.

The boys who died on the Tuscania will be honored by us as much as if they died on the blood-stained fields of France.

These boys who died on the Tuscania died like Americans should die.

There was no panic. They stood at attention while the vessel sank deeper and deeper into the Atlantic singing "America" and "The Star Spangled Banner."

As has been well said: "America asks for the names of these lads—every one of them. Though the boys have perished, their names are not to die. Those names, humble or proud, will be inscribed upon no less august a page than the book of the history of human liberty; and the tears that fell upon the page will not be the tears of weakness.

"As surely as God reigns and keeps the flame of liberty burning in American hearts the murderers who ordered the death of these lads will be brought to justice. The lion looks after her whelps, and the tiger after her cubs; and the Eagle looks after her own."

Some day I hope to see a suitable monument erected to the memory of the brave boys who died on the Tuscania and hope that their bodies will lie at Arlington Cemetery near the bodies of the brave heroes of the Maine.

It took many years for the bodies of the Maine to be brought to Arlington Cemetery, and might still be in Habana Harbor were it not for the efforts of our hard-working comrade, Capt. J. Walter Mitchell, of this city.

Believing the boys ought to receive the same honors as those who died on the Maine, I have introduced a bill to give them equal honor, and hope sometime to see it a reality.

The Kaiser misunderstands the American people, the French people, and the British people. Acts of terrorism, like sinking hospital ships, drowning helpless men, women, and children, bombarding helpless women and children, did not drive nations into cries of peace at any price, but it did drive nations that might have remained neutral into the war on the side of the allies.

It took us a long time to "wake up," but the Eagle is thoroughly aroused now and will look after her own.

We did not start this fight; we were not looking for this fight; but we are going to finish it—and finish it right—and that is the absolute destruction of Prussian militarism.

FOOL'S PARADISE.

We have been living in a fool's paradise for many years.

We had an idea that because we wanted no trouble, that because we envied no other nation, because we had no desire for a quarrel with any other nation, and because we only asked that we be allowed to live our lives in our own way, that no nation would want to quarrel with us.

We thought because we wanted no fight that the other fellow would feel the same way.

We were further lulled into sleep by pacifists, most of them being paid to spread the doctrine of the Kaiser by so much per night, and by the statement that we could "raise a million men overnight, if necessary."

You can not make a farmer or a miner overnight; neither can you make a first-class fighting man by a mere call to arms.

I believe in peace; in fact, I want peace so much that I am willing to fight for it, if necessary.

My experience in life is that "turning the left cheek" when you get slapped on the right sounds all right, but it does not stop from having the blow repeated.

I never had much use for a pacifist, anyway; I have always agreed with the sentiment that "A pacifist was the first cousin to the ostrich." The one great difference between the ostrich and the pacifist is that when danger is nigh the ostrich knows enough to hide his head in the sand and keep his mouth shut.

The ostrich grows white and black feathers, while his relative grows only white feathers and has a yellowish streak running from the back collar button down the back to the base of the suspender. The pacifist idea of preparedness is to shuffle darning needles, drink weak tea, and eat prunes.

"Peace at any price" and "a soft answer turneth away wrath" is the pacifist yodel, but a mule does not give you a chance to whisper "peace" in his ear before he lets loose with a bushel of kicks. None of us want war, but, then, it does not hurt the other fellow, you know, when he is standing on your pet corn.

Well, to tell the truth—the real truth—about the average pacifist in case of war, my humble opinion is that you will generally find that he is the guy that gets shot in the back.

SO-CALLED PEACE SOCIETIES.

A few years ago this country was flooded with the so-called peace societies. Three years ago Memorial Day, at Ironwood and Bessemer, Mich., I said, in part:

Instead of spending time forming societies for the advancement of peace, we ought to spend our time for the advancement of patriotism as a primary ideal—yes; even ahead of peace. There is no use wasting time talking about the horrors of war; we all admit their horror. Why not spend some time in talking about the horrors of war which unpreparedness begets?

Yes; and if the Navy of Great Britain did not give us time to get an Army ready, we would be to-day experiencing all the horrors of unpreparedness for war.

I believe in peace; but we only want peace that means a permanent and lasting peace.

There is a vast difference between peace at any price and peace with honor.

It was the President of populous China and not the Emperor of tiny Japan who said:

Our rights in Manchuria have been grievously violated, but our weakness invited insult.

WENDELL PHILLIPS.

Wendell Phillips, of the Civil War times, believed in peace, but he believed in a peace that meant something.

He expressed the right kind of sentiment when he said:

In my view, the bloodiest war ever waged is infinitely better than the happiest slavery which ever fattened men into obedience. And yet I love peace; but it is a real peace that I love, not peace such as we have had; not peace that meant lynch law in the Carolinas and mob law in New York; not peace that meant chains around the Boston courthouse, a gag on the lips of statesmen, and the slave sobbing himself to sleep in curses. No more such peace for me; no peace that is not born of justice and does not recognize the right of every race and every man.

Not only was the country flooded with "peace" societies, but we were flooded with songs on the same lines as "I did not raise my boy to be a soldier," which really meant that you were raising your son to be a coward, and that in case you were attacked the son of some mother who raised her son to be a man—not a coward—will have to defend you.

It took a man whose own son died in France and lies in a grave there—but not a forgotten one—to give a suitable answer to that poem. The following verses were written by Dr. James D. Hughes, of Toronto, Canada:

God gave my son in trust to me;
Christ died for him, and he should be
A man for Christ. He is his own,
And God's and man's; not mine alone.
He was not mine to "give." He gave Himself that he might help to save
All that a Christian should revere,
All that enlightened men hold dear.

"To feed the guns!" O torpid soul!
Awake, and see life as a whole!
When freedom, honor, justice, right,
Were threatened by the despot's might,
With heart aflame and soul alight,
He bravely went for God to fight
Against base savages, whose pride
The laws of God and man defied;
Who slew the mother and her child,
Who maidens pure and sweet defiled.
He did not go to "feed the guns";
He went to save from ruthless Huns
His home and country, and to be
A guardian of democracy.

"What if he does not come?" you say;
Ah, well! My sky would be more gray
But through the clouds would shine
And sacred memories be mine;
God's test of manhood is, I know,
Not "Will he come?" but "Did he go?"
My son well knew that he might die,
And yet he went with purpose high
To fight for peace and overthrow
The plans of Christ's relentless foe.

He dreaded not the battle field;
He went to make fierce vandals yield.
If he comes not again to me
I shall be sad; but not that he Went like a man—a hero true—
His part unselfishly to do.
My heart will feel exultant pride
That for humanity he died.

"Forgotton grave!" This selfish plea
Awaked no deep response in me
For, though his grave I may not see,
My boy will ne'er forgotten be—
My real son can never die;
'Tis but his body that may lie
In foreign land, and I shall keep Remembrance fond, forever, deep
Within my heart of my true son,
Because of triumphs that he won;
It matters not where anyone
May lie and sleep when work is done.

It matters not where some men live;
If my dear son his life must give Hosannas I will sing for him,
E'en though my eyes with tears be dim.
And when the war is over, when
His gallant comrades come again,
I'll cheer them as they're marching by,
Rejoicing that they did not die;
And when his vacant place I see
My heart will fill with joy that he
Was mine so long—my fair young son—
And cheer for him whose work is done.

"PEACE" SOCIETIES.

As I said, we had all sorts of so-called "peace" societies—most of them being financed by the Kaiser.

They really wanted to keep us out of the war so that the allies would be defeated, and we receive our "licking" a little later—all this was done under the guise of "peace."

Every little while some new propaganda would start up, and those of us in Congress would be bombarded with hundreds and thousands of letters and telegram asking us to vote for "peace" and "keep us out of war," etc. They were more interested that we should do nothing to hurt the Kaiser than they were to keep us out of war.

Several times, so-called "peace" societies gave us to understand that if we did not vote "right" we would be defeated. Well, when I have to agree to vote against American rights in order to further the rights of some other country, I will not be in Congress.

"EMBARGO" RESOLUTION.

The first propaganda was what we called the "Embargo" matter. The "peace" societies claimed they were advocating it because they wanted the United States to remain "neutral" but when you examined the arguments—and some of the names—you wondered what the word "neutral" really meant, and if it (and the arguments) were not "made in Germany."

What it really meant was that every American port should be closed, our commerce would be absolutely destroyed, our goods would rot on our docks, our workmen would no longer work and our factories be closed, and why? Simply that the nations that had not brought on this war, who had not prepared, who had little or no ammunition or guns on hand should be at the absolute mercy of the nation which had been planning for many years to make itself the conqueror of the entire world.

But these "peace" societies said the "war would be over" if it was not for us. So it would, but I leave it to you, who would have won and if Germany had won—with the intense hatred of the Kaiser for us—where would we be, and what price would we pay for our unpreparedness?

M'LEMORE RESOLUTION.

Then came the McLemore resolution. We were to say "stay in America and we will protect you." "Go to any other country and we will forsake you."

We were to forbid our citizens to travel on vessels of commerce—in other words, we would become a hermit nation.

Personally, I have always approved of the sentiment, "wherever an American goes lawfully and observing the law, there the flag goes with him and there it must ever go. If the flag does not protect the citizen, when the time comes, the citizen will not protect the flag," and I was proud to vote against such an un-American resolution.

ARMED MERCHANT SHIPS.

The next propaganda was against a resolution to allow "American vessels under American registry," to be allowed to do what? "Arm for defensive purposes only"—against what—"unlawful attack"—and yet men in high places conducted a filibuster so that the bill did not reach a vote in the Senate although passing the House by a large majority.

Contrary to what many people believe, there was not a single French or British armed merchant ship that entered or left an American port until we entered the war; also contrary to what many believe there was not a single pound of ammunition carried on an American ship until we entered the war. True it is that we sold ammunition to the allies, but they either carried in on their own bottoms or on the bottoms of neutrals.

CONSCRIPTION BILL.

The next propaganda of the "peace" societies was against conscription—it was so un-American, you know. Well, we know the real reason was they were afraid it would be too effective in raising an army to defeat Prussian militarism that these "peace" societies so dearly loved.

We have had no propaganda lately, and I don't believe that I am violating any confidence when I say that we are getting so much "iron" in our blood day by day since our boys went to France that another propaganda by these "peace" societies will mean that the price of rope will be going up.

NO WAR MORE JUSTIFIED THAN THIS WAR.

No war—not even the Revolutionary War—was more justified than this war. In no war was there so much at stake. Our lives, the lives of our children, the lives and honor of our women, are all at stake to-day.

In 1776 we fought Great Britain because we were against "taxation without representation," but Great Britain had not cruelly and deliberately murdered our men, women, and children on the high seas.

In 1798, when France interfered with our rights on the seas, we sent our boats to sink, capture, or destroy every French boat on sight, and we kept this up until France agreed not to interfere with our rights; but France did not murder our citizens.

In 1812 we fought Great Britain a second time because she interfered with our rights on the seas, and this was by her claiming the right to take deserters from her boats off of ours. Great Britain had not murdered our citizens.

In 1861 we fought the South because she wanted to disrupt the Union; she had not murdered our innocent women and children.

In 1898 we believed that Spain was responsible for the sinking of the Maine and the murder of our citizens in Habana Harbor; we declared war against Spain; but Spain had not deliberately and repeatedly murdered our innocent women and children.

That remained for Germany—under the iron heel of the Kaiser—to do; and we would have been worse than cowards if we submitted to the disgrace.

Our boys have gone to France to fight for the freedom of America; but they are also fighting for the freedom of the entire world.

Not only are we fighting for liberty, but France and our allies are fighting for the same glorious cause.

As the patriotic Viviani so well expressed it:

Why do all these people fight? They fought to elevate all the world toward the ideal and toward liberty; they fought to make the world a place in which man could breathe freely, and they did not fail. I salute the hour of victory with the pious hope that the spirit of Washington will become your spirit. Lift your heads, citizens of America, lift them as high as your flag.

WASHINGTON—"ENTANGLING ALLIANCES."

Our pro-German friends state we have no right to be mixed up in this fight, and lay great stress on what Washington, the Father of our County, had to say about entangling alliances.

Well, let us see what he did say:

If we remain one people the time is not far off when belligerent nations will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation, when we may choose peace or war as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel. It is our policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world. Taking care always to place ourselves by suitable establishments in a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust ourselves to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies. Nothing short of self-respect and that justice which is essential to a national character ought to involve us in war.

If defending ourselves against violation of our women and maiming of our children, drowning of innocent men, women, and children, defending ourselves against a nation violating every rule of honorable warfare and every law of civilization is not what Washington called "extraordinary emergencies," then will our peace-at-any-price men tell us what they would consider "extraordinary emergencies"?

WHO ARE OUR FRIENDS IN THIS FIGHT?

Who are our friends in this fight, and what do they represent?

For the first time in our history we are on the same side as Great Britain and our Canadian cousins. Can we read of the heroic deeds of the Canadians and the British without thanking God that our boys are fighting side by side with men who have shown their heroism on many a bloody battle field?

This is not the first time we have fought side by side with France—France the nation that sent us Rochambeau, De Grosse, and the immortal Lafayette. We have not forgotten that were it not for France there would be no United States. We ought to be, and we are, proud to fight in the same glorious cause as heroic France—France, the land that they thought was dead and decayed; France that has astonished and received the admiration of the world by the bravery of her men and her women.

We are fighting on the same side as sunny Italy, the land of art and song; the land that sent us Christopher Columbus; Italy, the land of Garibaldi, Mazzini, and Cavour.

We are fighting side by side with the heroic soldiers of little Belgium, "bleeding Belgium," that little land that preferred to die rather than lose her honor. We are proud to fight on the same side as the gallant men of little Serbia, the brave; the men of desolate Poland; the men of gallant Greece; and the men of Montenegro and Portugal.

We all fight for a common cause—the liberty of the world. If the allies win, we win, and we will all be free men; if the allies lose, we lose, and with them we become slaves of the Kaiser.

If a man talks to-day against Italy, Serbia, Great Britain, France, or any of our allies, look out for him; he is a pro-German at heart and is just as much a traitor deep in his heart as if he talked against the United States.

If there is any doubt in the minds of anyone that the Kaiser and his tools are not more terrible than Attila and his Huns, let us bear the following facts in mind:

ATTILA, THE HUN, NEVER MADE WAR ON WOMEN, AS THE KAISER IS DOING.

Attila, the Hun, nor Nero, nor any other savage in the history of the world, ever made war on women, as the Kaiser has in this war.

Attila, the Hun, never imprisoned women in underground prisons, tethered for the use of their bodies by officers and men, and yet that is the fate of thousands of women in the occupied territory in northern France.

Attila, the Hun, never compelled women and men to salute their captors, and yet women in France are not only compelled to salute, but also to smile when saluting or go to jail.

Imagine if the Hun had come to this town, killed the fathers, brothers, and husbands, cut off the hands maybe of your son, and then every time that you met an officer your mothers, sisters, and wives, and daughters had not only to salute, but smile—and very graciously at that—or go to jail. But this is what is happening in France and Belgium every day.

That is not all. In captured towns where hunting was good and game plentiful but dogs scarce, girls have been used as hunting dogs, and when they refused have been imprisoned in cellars for each such refusal. Imagine our American women being used in place of hunting dogs; and yet why should our women receive any better treatment than women of France or Belgium?

Officers have not hesitated to horsewhip not only priests of 60 and over who did not salute, but have also used the horsewhip on women who refused to smile and salute. Imagine our American women being horsewhipped for refusing to smile and salute men responsible for the death of their dear ones.

Women in northern France have been compelled to work in the fields. That is not all. They have worked under the lash. When we fought the Civil War we thought we had abolished slavery for black men and black women, but to-day we find slavery for white men and white women.

When young you remember our hatred for the slave driver, Simon Legree, who used the lash on black men and women, but we never dreamed when men calling themselves civilized would make slaves out of white men and women and use the lash with even more ferocity than Simon Legree.

That is not all. These mothers, wives, and daughters are compelled to work close to the firing line; many times so close that their captors are afraid to stay with them.

More than that. Many a time when aeroplanes were sailing by, the keepers would run to cover, but the women, under penalty of punishment, were compelled to stay in danger.

Reputable witnesses have seen elderly women whose legs or arms have been broken by German officers.

Schoolboys have been taken out of school at St. Quentin and transformed into street sweepers.

In many places mothers have been torn from their children in arms and from sobbing and desperate little girls, who threw themselves upon their knees without avail, and sent far from home, to either work in the fields or be used for digging trenches.

If we want to see American women used as hunting dogs; if we want to see our mothers and daughters and wives working in the fields with German Simon Legrees lashing them with the whip; if we want to see American women kept in stockades for a punishment worse than death; if we want to see American women digging trenches; if we want to see our schoolboys used as street sweepers—then let us talk about peace on any terms; but if we want to see the old vicious Prussian military system wiped out—and its advocates with it—then let us resolve that there shall be no talk of peace until the allies and ourselves reach Berlin. We want our guns to do all the talking from now on.

This war can not be won by dropping peace messages on the foe—they do not understand that kind of language; dropping dynamite by the ton they will understand a little better; but the peace talk they will understand best of all is the soldiers of the allies and ourselves being quartered in the palaces of the Kaiser at Potsdam and Berlin.

WHAT WOULD HAPPEN IF THE WAR CAME TO AMERICA TO-DAY?

What would happen if the war came to America to-day? The war is not 3,000 miles away to-day, as some people think. In fact, if it was not for the British and French Navies it would be here to-day.

War came to Belgium not because Germany had any grievances against Belgium, but because Belgium refused to allow Germany to invade her territory for the purpose of attacking France from the rear.

Because Belgium was invaded, Great Britain entered the war, and Germany was surprised that Great Britain should enter a war because a treaty—a "mere scrap of paper," as Germany expressed it—had been violated.

Belgium has paid a heavy price for the defense of her honor—the Kaiser has taken possession of nearly all of her territory and subjected her people to the yoke of his brutal soldiers.

What would happen if this war reached our shores to-day?

Our people would be slaves of brutal officers and men.

They would extort vast sums from our peaceful villages and cities.

Many of our towns and cities would be burned, and many of our churches burned or destroyed by shell.

Our factories would be stripped of their machinery. Our raw material and machinery would be shipped to Germany.

American workmen by the thousands would be used as slaves, and our women as worse than slaves. Thousands of noncombatants—regardless of age or infancy or of womanhood—would be slain.

All of these things have happened in France, Poland, Serbia, and Italy and Belgium—what reason have we for thinking that we Americans would receive any special consideration? In all of these countries women have been violated by the tens of thousands, but has anyone heard of a German or Austrian soldier being punished for rape, or robbery, or murder?

If the war was in America to-day—in your city, for instance—you would see your mayor, your common council, and a hundred or so of your leading citizens as hostages.

You would see the women of Washington working in the trenches; you would see your sons used as street sweepers and diggers of trenches.

You would see your homes robbed of everything of value; your family driven into the street.

If some one fired a shot—your mayor, council, ministers, and many of your women would be shot or hanged.

Thousands I have said are the things that happened in Belgium, France, Italy, and Serbia, and are the things that will happen here. We must get all over the idea of this war being 3,000 miles away and look upon everything as if the war had reached the shores of America. Every one of us must do everything in our power to-day, because if we do not all these things and worse will take place in the peaceful villages and cities of America, as well as they have taken place in the peaceful villages of sunny France.

"OUT OF THEIR OWN MOUTHS"—THE TRIUMPH OF GERMANY REAL CAUSE OF WAR.

We claim that the only cause for the present war is the fact that Germany—not her poor sister, Austria—wants to dominate all Europe.

To prove that fact, I will only call one witness—the one man who knows—the Kaiser himself. In a proclamation in June, 1915, he used these words:

The triumph of the greater Germany, which some day must dominate all Europe, is the single end for which we are fighting.

Does anyone want any better evidence?

KAISER RESPONSIBLE FOR ALL OUTRAGES.

We claim that the Kaiser is responsible for all the outrages committed by his troops, and that all these outrages are according to a policy advocated by him many years ago.

We quote, to prove our case, his speech to his Chinese Expeditionary Force, July 27, 1900:

If you come to grips with him, quarter will not be given, no prisoners will be taken. Use your weapons in such a way that for a thousand years no Chinese shall dare to look upon a German askance. Be as terrible as Attila's Huns.

History proves that in China, as well as in this war, the Kaiser's soldiers were more terrible than the Huns of the terrible Attila.

INVASION OF BELGIUM VIOLATION OF INTERNATIONAL LAW.

We claim that the invasion of Belgium was a violation of treaty between Germany and Belgium, and as our star witness we quote Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg, in a speech to the Reichstag, August 14, 1914:

Our troops have occupied Luxemburg, and perhaps have entered Belgium territory. Gentlemen, that is a breach of international law. The wrong—I speak openly—the wrong we thereby commit we will try to make good as soon as our military aims have been attained.

GERMANY HAD NO GRIEVANCES AGAINST BELGIUM.

We claim that Germany had no grievance against Belgium, and we call as our witness the German minister of foreign affairs:

Germany has nothing with which to reproach Belgium, whose attitude has always been correct.

GERMANY'S SOLDIERS TAUGHT TO BE HARD AND CRUEL.

We claim that Germany's soldiers are taught to be hard and cruel.

Gen. von der Goltz says:

It is better to let a hundred women and children belonging to the enemy die of hunger than to let a single German soldier die.

Another witness, Gen. von Hindenburg, states:

The more merciless, the kinder it really is; because it will end so much the quicker.

We claim that noncombatants, innocent men and women, were used as hostages and shot without evidence or trial.

In a proclamation of Gen. von Bülow, Namur, Belgium, on August 25, 1914, he said, in part:

Every street will be occupied by a German patrol, who will take 10 hostages for the street. If an assault takes place in a street, the 10 hostages will be shot.

In other words, if a drunken soldier attempts to break into a house, or anything of this kind, then 10 innocent people will be killed without trial.

We claim that orders have been issued by German generals that no prisoners must be taken in the approaching battle. Was not Attila, the Hun, a piker?

I now present as witness Gen. Stenger, commander of the Fifty-eighth Brigade, who, in the order of the day to his men on August 26, 1914, used these words:

Beginning with to-day, no more prisoners are to be taken. All prisoners are to be put to death. The wounded, whether armed or not, are to be put to death. Prisoners, even where they are organized in large units, are to be put to death. No living man is to remain behind us.

This order was carried out to the letter in that battle. Examination of German prisoners showed by the blood on their rifles that many wounded Frenchmen had been clubbed to death by rifle butts.

We claim that their soldiers have carried out, in many cases, the orders "take no prisoners," made by Gen. Stenger and others like him.

A diary found on Under Officer Klemt stated in part:

A weird noise near me comes from blows that a soldier of the One hundred and fifty-fourth is raining upon the bald head of a Frenchman with a clubbed rifle. Very wisely he has appropriated for this piece of work the Frenchman's gun, for fear of breaking his own. Very soft-hearted men put the French wounded out of their misery with bullets; the others hew and stab whenever they can, but whether they are slightly or mortally wounded, our brave musketeers save the Fatherland the costly care of numerous enemies.

Under Officer Göttsche, Eighty-fifth Infantry Regiment, Ninth Army Corps, wrote in his diary:

The captain called us about him and said: "In the fort that is to be taken there are, in all probability, Englishmen. I do not wish to see a single English prisoner in the hands of the company."

And then Göttsche add:

A general shout of assent was the response.

In a letter to his wife to be, March 16, 1915, Johann Wanger said in part:

I have also bayoneted a good number of women. During the battle of Budenwiller I did away with four women and seven young girls in five minutes. The captain had told me to shoot these French sows, but I preferred to run my bayonet through them.

Another said in part:

Where before were peaceful people and a flourishing village is now a heap of ruins. Far indeed did the destructive fury of the Two hundred and thirtieth extend, and we can scarcely be looked upon as soldiers. When we are up at the front it is as if we were the greatest criminals. Thus it is we do our work of destruction in France. Picture to yourself how we live now, not like men, but like beasts. Far and wide there are no trenches, only bare fields and stumps of trees growing where once man plowed his field and worked for wife and child. That is our retirement and our part in it. My mind can not dispel the thought that I shall not return.

TAUGHT THAT "TERRORISM" IS RIGHT.

We claim that they state that any act committed by the recruit for the purpose of discouraging, defeating, and destroying the enemy is fully justified.

We quote Maj. Gen. von Disfurth:

No object whatever can be served by taking notice of the accusations of barbarity leveled against Germany by her foreign critics. We owe no explanation to anyone. Whatever act is committed by our troops for the purpose of discouraging, defeating, and destroying the enemy is a brave act and fully justified. Germany stands as the supreme arbiter of her own methods. War is war.

They call us barbarians. What of it? We scorn them and their abuse. For my part, I hope that in this war we have merited the title of "barbarians." Let neutral nations and our enemies cease their empty chatter, which may well be compared to the twitter of birds. Our troops must achieve victory. What else matters?

KING OF PRUSSIA UNRESTRAINED BY ANY LAW OR CONSTITUTION.

We claim that the King of Prussia is unrestrained by any constitution or law. The following proves our case: Several years ago one Kuepper, postmaster in the Prussian town of Wirmelkirchen, was charged with embezzling $7,000. Kuepper died in this country, and under the laws of Germany the King sued Kuepper's administrator in the State of Missouri.

The opening declaration reads as follows:

The plaintiff states that he is absolute monarch of the Kingdom of Prussia, and as King thereof is the sole government of that country; that he is unrestrained by any constitution or law; and that his will, expressed in due form, is the only legal power there known to exist as law.

KAISER CLAIMS TO BE INSTRUMENT OF GOD.

We claim that the Kaiser believes that he is the instrument of the Almighty God.

We quote the language that William II used on December 19, 1914:

Remember that you are the chosen people. I am the instrument of the Almighty. I am His sword—His agent. Woe and death to all those who oppose my will! Woe and death to all those who do not believe in my mission! Woe and death to the cowards!

KAISER DREAMED OF BEING EMPEROR OF THE WORLD.

We claim that for many years the Kaiser has had a dream of being ruler of the entire world.

We quote the language used by him sometime ago:

All my life I have been under the influence of five men—Julius Cæsar, Alexander the Great, Theodoric the Second, Frederick the Great, and Napoleon. These five men had their dream of world empire. They failed. I, too, have a dream of world empire. I shall succeed. When this war is over I will stand for no nonsense from the United States.

GERMANY CONTEMPLATED THIS WAR FOR MANY YEARS.

We claim that Germany has contemplated this war of conquest for more than 20 years.

As witness we call Admiral Von Goetzen, who said to Admiral Dewey in 1898 at Manila:

About 15 years from now my country will start a great war. She will be in Paris after the commencement of hostilities. Her move on Paris will be but a step to her real object—the crushing of England.

GERMANY DISLIKED THIS COUNTRY FOR YEARS.

We claim that Germany has hated this country for many years and intended to put our country "in its place."

We use the same witness, Admiral Von Goetzen, who also said to Admiral Dewey:

Some months after we finish our work in England we will take New York, and probably Washington, and hold them for some time. We will put your country in its place regarding Germany. We do not propose to take any of your territory, but we do intend to take a billion or so of your dollars from New York and other places.

OPPOSED TO THE MONROE DOCTRINE FOR MANY YEARS.

We claim that Germany has been opposed to the Monroe doctrine for many years.

We call the same witness, who said to Admiral Dewey:

The Monroe doctrine will be taken care of by us, and we will dispose of South America as we wish. Don't forget this about 15 years from now.

PRUSSIAN MILITARISM MEANS CLASS RULE.

We claim that Prussian militarism means class rule, and that private soldiers are treated like beasts of burden instead of men.

Contrary to the Swiss system and the Australian system, which means the training of free men to be able to fight as free men for the rights and liberties of a free land, the Prussian system means the absolute rule of the few.

We will prove this by the testimony of German soldiers.

In a trial in 1914, which was postponed on account of the war, many vicious acts by officers—noncommissioned as well as commissioned—were disclosed.

One witness stated that—

Recruits were made to sweep the rooms with toothbrushes, climb on wardrobes, slide under beds on their stomachs; were beaten with whips, particularly at night.

Another soldier stated:

Boxing of ears, blows, even with the sword and the riding whip, were daily occurrences.

Another soldier stated:

Lieut. Schmitt boxed a soldier's ears, then ordered all men to leave the room, and one heard only groaning and curses. The recruit was injured in such a manner that he had to be discharged, and received a pension for injury in the service.

A private testified:

Recruits were compelled to sweep the rooms of the noncommissioned officers from 9 to 11 at night with toothbrushes.

Another stated:

Noncommissioned officers compelled soldiers to lie in dirty ice water and dung water.

Still another testified:

In the Fourth Squadron of the Regiment Garde du Corps recruits were maltreated in the most brutal manner with ropes, snaffles, horse brushes, the sword, etc.

In the Queen Augusta Guard Regiment, No. 4, Sergt. Waske ordered a grenadier to lie down before a cuspidor and then called out, "Drink." The evidence at the trial showed that the grenadier did drink from the cuspidor quite obediently, which proves the fear the privates have of their officers.

The evidence showed that in the Guard Train Battalion "Noncommissioned Officer Hoffman ordered exercises which consisted in bending their knees, while the men had to hold a full manure box in their outstretched arms."

In the Fiftieth Infantry Noncommissioned Officer Poeselt, at inspection of their rooms, "ordered the recruits to take cuspidors in their hands, and he then threw the disgusting contents into their faces."

In the King's Grenadier No. 7, a recruit was also "ordered to drink the contents of a cuspidor."

If I had the time, I could relate many more incidents which were given at this trial by private soldiers.

MINISTERS TAKE OATH TO PREACH THE GOSPEL AS KAISER DICTATES.

We claim that ministers take an oath that they "will preach the word as his gracious majesty dictates."

In proof I offer the following:

When Rev. James D. Jeffery, of the Scovel Memorial Church, Detroit, Mich., said the following a few weeks ago, a peculiar quiet came over the crowded church:

PREACH AS THE KAISER DICTATES.

Let me read you the oath of fidelity which all who seek to enter the pulpit in Germany must take. It reads: "I will be submissive, faithful, and obedient to his royal majesty and his lawful successors in the government as my most gracious king and sovereign; promote his welfare according to my ability; prevent injury and detriment to him; and particularly endeavor carefully to cultivate in the minds of the people under my care a sense of reverence and fidelity toward the king, love for the fatherland, obedience to the laws, and all those virtues which in a Christian denote a good citizen, and I will not teach or act in a contrary spirit. I will preach the word as his gracious majesty dictates."

Does one need any additional evidence?

KAISER CLAIMED AMERICAN CITIZENS AS HIS SUBJECTS.

We claim that the Kaiser himself thought that the former Germans were still his subjects, and that he believed that they considered they owed first allegiance to him in preference to the United States.

In 1908 we find him decorating Herr Dr. Hexamer, then president of the German-American Alliance, decorating the distinguished "herr" and using these words:

If any man ever was worthy of decoration at my hands, it was Herr Dr. Hexamer, the president of the league, who may justly be termed by my grace the acting ruler of all the Germans in America in the United States.

Do you get that—"by my grace"? And while we were flattering ourselves that we were the freest of the free, Kaiser Bill was flattering himself that he had here, "by my grace," an "acting ruler of all Germans in the United States."

We claim that the Kaiser claims his soldiers are his, body and soul.

In support of our claim we quote his language to the Potsdam recruits:

Children of my guard, you are now my soldiers, body and soul. You have sworn to obey all my commands. From this day on you must know but one enemy, and that enemy is my enemy. And if I command you some day to fire upon your own relatives—your fathers and mothers, sisters and brothers, perhaps—remember your oath, and obey.

WHILE CLAIMING TO BE FRIENDLY CONSPIRING WITH MEXICO.

We claim that Germany while claiming to be friendly with us was trying to make a treaty with Mexico and Japan to invade our soil and take part of our territory.

We produce the note written by Undersecretary Zimmermann before we entered the war, written on January 19, 1917:

On the 1st day of February we intend to begin unrestricted submarine warfare. In spite of this, it is our intention to endeavor to keep the United States neutral.

If this attempt is not successful, we propose an alliance with Mexico on the following basis: That we shall make war together and together make peace. We shall give general financial support, and it is understood that Mexico is to reconquer the lost territory in New Mexico, Texas, and Arizona. The details are left to you for settlement.

The President of Mexico, according to note, was to offer to mediate between Germany and Japan.

It is hard for us living in America to believe that mothers and sisters and daughters and fathers do not raise up in rebellion at even an intimation that bodies of their loved ones are being "rendered down" to secure oil and other products; and yet if we believe what was said in the paper called Reality, it would seem as if this is happening. The article reads as follows:

THE GERMAN DEAD—AN ADMISSION.

The Germans are no longer taking pains to conceal the fact that their dead soldiers are being "rendered down" to secure oil and other products.

Herr Karl Rosner, the correspondent of the Berlin Lokalanzeiger on the western front, published on April 10 the first definite German admission. In a description of the battle field north of Rheims he wrote:

We pass through Evergnicourt. There is a dull smell in the air, as if lime were being burnt. We are passing the great corpse exploitation establishment (Kadaververwotungsanstalt) of this army group. The fat that is won here is turned into lubricating oils, and everything else is ground down in the bones mill into a powder for mixing with pigs' food and as manure.

Herr Rosner conveys this information with no comment but the remark that "nothing can be permitted to go to waste."

Here is confirmation of an article in the Paris Journal published on March 9. It quoted from the technical paper Chemische Zeitung (Chemical Gazette) of November 18 last this announcement:

Thermochemischer Verein Alcolsheim (Strassburg). On account of the departure of our manager, we require an engineer, free from military obligations, to direct, technically and commercially, our factory for the destruction of dead bodies.

The name of the factory (said the Journal) leaves no doubt respecting the nature of the work carried on in this thermochemical factory; that is to say, it is not solely destruction by heat, but it also comprises the chemical treatment and utilization of the bodies.

A statement on February 28 by the American consul who left Germany at the same time as Mr. Gerard is additional confirmation, if that were now needed.

"ON WHICH SIDE ARE YOU?"

Now that we are at war, we say to every man here, "On which side are you?"

To our adopted citizens we say, "Are you for the land that you were glad to leave or are you faithful to the oath you took when you renounced all other lands and all other rulers for this land?"

To our native born we say, "Are you going to be a patriot like Washington, and Lincoln, and Grant, and millions of others, or do you prefer to be remembered as another Benedict Arnold of unsavory fame and reputation? Choose ye this day whom ye will serve."

I know, judging from my own district, and thousands of others I have met, that the great majority of our people, adopted and native born, are for this country heart and soul.

I come from a district in which every man is either an immigrant or the son of an immigrant.

NO MORE BRITISH, IRISH, ETC., NOTHING BUT AMERICANS.

We used to talk of ourselves as Irish, Italians, Scandinavians, French, Cornish, and so forth, but when the war broke out we found that we were mistaken, that we were not Germans, Scandinavians, British, Finnish, Jews, and so forth, but Americans—100 per cent Americans at that—and that our pro-Germans were nearly nil.

I have had only one letter condemning my votes all through this trouble, and that was by a young fellow who seemed to think that working three months in a brewery made him more capable of looking after matters of state than the State Department.

Have had some letters from some other parts of the country, however. For instance, had a long letter from one Joe Smith, who underlined every word once, some twice, and some three times. About the mildest thing he said was, "I notice also that you have in Congress your wets and your drys, your proallies and your pro-Germans, your nuts and your peanuts, why not hire a jackass and make it complete?"

I wrote my friend, "Your application received and accepted. Come at once. Your country needs you."

MAJORITY OF AUSTRIANS AND GERMANS LOYAL.

Our Germans and Austrians volunteered the same as our other nationalities, and in fighting for this country they were but following the example of Washington, Hamilton, Nathaniel Greene, Israel Putnam, John Paul Jones, and thousands of other men of English blood or descent who proudly fought for this land against England, the land of their ancestors.

Washington expressed the sentiment of these English of seventy-six when he said:

Unhappy is it to reflect that a brother's sword has been sheathed in a brother's breast, and that the once happy and peaceful plains are either to be drenched with blood or inhabited with slaves. Sad alternative! But can a virtuous man hesitate in his choice?

The Germans and Austrians who are loyal to-day are following the advice of Washington, and the later advice of that loyal American of German birth, Franz Sigel, who said:

Politically I am an American and nothing else; but I am a German. I would consider myself less than a man were I to forget the tremendous sacrifices made by the immigrant Germans in defense of their new fatherland. Shall this blood have flowed in vain? Shall we now attack this America to which we gave all we had to give? This country is our country; our interests are its interests; here we are; here will our descendants be; here we shall stay; the Union, now and forever.

No American to-day is working harder for this country than the son of the man "he fought mit Sigel," than the son of old Franz Sigel—Franz Sigel, jr.

One of the best articles stating why Germans by adoption and ancestry should fight for this country was written by Bishop J. H. Darlington, bishop of Harrisburg, Pa. This was circulated among the Germans of Pennsylvania and adjoining States and had much to do with the change of sentiment there.

He expressed the sentiment of us all when he said:

Many in this country are joined by the strong ties of kindred and ancestral love to the German fatherland, but this should not blind them to the fact that right is right and that might is often the direct opposite of right. We should wish the right to win, so that peace may be soon and permanently "established upon the best and surest foundations." When the war party now in control in Germany and Austria is succeeded by the rational people taking their rightful leadership, there will be a lasting peace, which, pray God, may never be broken again in the world's history.

NO TIME TO PLAY "PETTY PARTY POLITICS."

My district is also a strong Republican district, but we believe up there that this is no time to play petty party politics.

The boys going to France are not Democratic soldiers or Republican soldiers; they are American soldiers. This war is not going to be won by the Republican Party or the Democratic Party; it will be won by a united American people.

No man being a Democrat should vote for a war measure for the sole reason that it is advocated by a Democratic administration; no man being a Republican should vote against any measure simply because it is being advocated by a Democratic administration. The only test should be, Is this the best bill of its kind that can be passed in order to help win the war?

The man in high position or low who attempts to play party politics these days is the best ally that the Kaiser and Von Hindenburg can have.

What has happened in my district is happening all over the country.

PATRIOTISM OF GREEKS, SERBS, AND CROATS.

I had the honor of talking at a mass meeting of several thousand Greeks at Pittsburgh some weeks ago on the ninety-seventh anniversary of the independence of Greece from the rule of the unspeakable Turk, and it was one of the most patriotic and American meetings I ever attended.

On April 21, at Detroit, and April 25, at Pittsburgh, I spoke at mass meetings of the Croats, Serbs, and Slovenes, on the two hundred and forty-seventh anniversary of the death of their national heroes, Peter Zrinski and Frankopan, and one could not see more patriotism or love of this country if oue had attended a meeting of Americans who boasted of their Pilgrim Father ancestry.

I found at all of those meetings that while proud of the lands of their birth they were far more proud of the land of their adoption and the fact that they were Americans.

NO MORE TALK ABOUT THE "SCUM OF SOUTHERN EUROPE."

By the way, we do not hear so much about the "scum of southern Europe," as they called the Greeks, Italians, Serbs, and Croats. We found when we entered the war what I have always claimed, "that they would fight for this country with the same devotion as the native born."

This war has taught us that the immigrant who recently landed—the poor "illiterate foreigner," as he was called—is as good an American and will fight as quickly and die as gladly as the men who boast that their forefathers came over in the Mayflower or the descendants of the early settlers in Virginia, Maryland, and the Carolinas.

To those few foreigners who are not loyal we say, "Do you think that the fathers of the Constitution ever intended that this land should be a haven of refuge for men to share our prosperity with us and not do their share in our days of adversity?"

We say, "Either fight for us or go back to the land you were glad to leave. We would rather have you over in the trenches shooting at us than here stabbing us in the back for the Kaiser you dearly love."

A traitorous American—adopted or native born—reminds me of a few other things. He reminds me of the flea, because the flea will bite the living or the dead. He reminds me of the fly, because a fly will blow corruption into anything with which he comes in contact. He reminds me of the magpie, because the magpie is always chattering and telling lies. He also reminds me of a side of bacon, because a traitorous American, like a side of bacon, can not be cured until hung.

KISSING THE FLAG WILL NOT MAKE A LOYAL AMERICAN.

I notice a growing tendency among some of our people to pollute our flag by making traitorous Americans and pro-Germans kiss it. I am against that. I would not defile the American flag by allowing traitorous Americans or pro-Germans to kiss it. If it is necessary for them to kiss something to prove their loyalty—disloyalty, rather—let them kiss the dirt in our streets.

I noticed out in Illinois the other day that they not only made a traitorous American kiss the American flag, but they put an American flag around his neck and told him to "keep it there." Well, I am against that, too. If it is necessary to put something around his neck, let us put something there legally, that he will not need to keep there so long.

SPIES.

When I read of spies going around this country doing all sorts of damnable deeds, and see that the only punishment is three square meals a day and sleep in a feather bed, safe from bullets and hunger, until the war is over, and then go back to Germany and be decorated by the Kaiser with the iron cross, and live on a pension from his grateful Government, I can not help but wish that we had a law here that would hang spies.

When old Israel Putnam found a spy, he wrote these words:

SIR: Nathan Palmer, a lieutenant in your King's service, was taken in my camp as a spy; he was tried as a spy; he was condemned as a spy; and he shall be hanged as a spy.

ISRAEL PUTNAM.

But even that did not suit a stern old patriot of the type of Putnam. He blotted that, went out and gave an order, saw that the order was executed, and came back and added these words:

P. S.—He is hanged.

One of our drafted men received 20 years for desertion; another who said in case he was sent to France he would not fight against Germany received 31 years; and the punishment should meet the crime.

One Franz Rintelen, however, who was guilty of treasonable crimes, conspiring to blow up ships with Americans on board, conspiring to blow up factories in which Americans were working, and conspiring to obtain passports to turn over to other spies, received about four years in jail and a fine of $2,000.

I was curious to know why he did not receive death, and found out that he was not tried as a spy, could not be given a sentence of death by being hanged or shot.

Wrote to the Attorney General and was advised by the Attorney General, Hon. T. W. Gregory, under date of March 8, 1918, that Franz Rintelen "was convicted in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York and sentenced to imprisonment for one year and six months and a fine of $2,000 for a violation of section 235 of the United States Criminal Code." I was a little curious to know what this was, and found it was part of the interstate and foreign commerce act, "shipping of explosives and other dangerous articles without proper marking."

Franz Rintelen also received a year for violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act, and one year and three months under section 37, United States Criminal Code, in connection "with a false and fraudulent passport."

Well, if my spy bill goes through—though very short—they will have some law under which he can be tried. In a bill that I introduced March 11, 1918, as an amendment to Thirty-fifth Statutes, page 1089, it reads as follows:

SEC. 9. Any person, resident in the United States or any place subject to its jurisdiction, who acts as a spy for any government with which the United States is at war or any ally of such government, and who seeks information with the intention of communicating it to the enemy shall, upon conviction thereof, suffer death by hanging by the neck.

It is very short, but very "expressive."

Have many, many strong recommendations of the bill—many from mothers and fathers who have sons in the Army, many in France. Many have come from governors. Among those received was one from Hon. W. H. Hays, chairman Republican national committee:

It is a dandy.

There is nothing political about hanging spies. Among the letters received was one from Judge Wescott, of New Jersey, the man who twice nominated President Wilson for President. Under date of April 15, 1918, he said in part:

Put the bill through. Unless we effectively eliminate the pro-German we will never be united for war purposes, and without perfect unity of purpose and effort it is doubtful whether we can win the war. Partisanship must for the time being disappear.

Another man that recommended the bill, and whether you hate him or love him, you must admit that he is a fighting man through and through, wrote as follows:

That's fine. I congratulate you on what you have done.
THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHAT ONE FATHER THINKS SHOULD BE DONE WITH SPIES.

Mr. L. F. McConihe, Tacoma, Wash., who has two boys in France, does not mince words when it comes to stating what ought to be done with spies. He says in part:

Two good meals or three a day (for spies), no work, and a good warm place to sleep in, while the boys we send to the front lie in the mud and sleep anywhere in hell, that is made in Germany. The people are patriotic and will give their last dollar, their sons, and all, but they want the Hun spies lined up against a stone wall and shot, and left to lie there until they swell up and stink, like the boys in No Man's Zone, to show the rest of the Huns what is coming their way sure. I have two boys in France, like thousands of other good boys, and we should back them up here, regardless of the Hun vote this fall and two years from now.

Personally I would rather have the spy hanged, as I think that is the most appropriate death, but hanged or shot, so long as they do not have an opportunity to wear an "iron cross," I do not care.

The following is written by Capt. George Steunenberg, United State Army:

I wonder how long we'll continue to be a health resort for spies
And other industrious gentlemen that the people criticize?
The place for an agent of Kaiser Bill is six feet under the sod.
I want to hear some corporal yell, "Fall in, the firing squad!"

Do we get cold feet at the thought of blood? Have we lost our old-time grit?
If we haven't the nerve to kill a spy, we'd better lie down and quit.
Do you think you can tame these animals by the method of "spare the rod"?
Forget it! Come on with the corporal in command of a firing squad!

If we riddled a few incendiaries, the industry would decline;
If we plugged a couple of profiteers, the rest would stand in line,
And a lot of these devilish anarchists would get in and carry the hod,
If a few of their leaders went over the range to the tune of a firing squad.

"Discharged," "Interned," or "Out on bail," it's ever the same old song.
And we lay the paper aside to remark: "How long, O Lord, how long!"
We've seen enough devilment this past year to arouse the wrath of God,
Then what is it that we are waiting for—come on with the firing squad!

WE MUST INSTILL PATRIOTISM IN OUR CHILDREN.

We must not only be patriotic ourselves, we must instill the same patriotism in our children. Let us teach them that loving their country and their flag is essential as well as loving their God.

And for your country, boy, and that flag, never dream a dream but of serving her but as she bids you, e'en though that service leads through a thousand hells. And no matter what happens to you, boy, and no matter who flatters you or abuses you, never look upon another flag, and never let a night pass that you do not ask God to bless that flag. And remember, boy, that behind officers and Government and people, even, is the country herself, your country, and that you belong to her as you belong to your own mother. Stand by her, boy, as you would stand by your own mother.

FATHERS AND MOTHERS ARE HEROES ALSO.

I never see the boys marching down our streets but what I think of the fathers and mothers who stay at home and hope against hope, sometimes, that their boys will come back to them safe and sound.

Now that he ain't here no more
Ma and me just glance
Up at that old coat he wore
'Fore he went to France.
Nights when all the doors is shut,
'Fore I go upstairs,
Touch its sleeve and find it wet
Ma's been crying there—
Somethin's matter my eyes, too,
Have to wink 'em tight,
When I whisper "proud of you,"
"Good night, lad, good night."

I never see the little wife, trying hard to keep back the tears as she bids farewell to the man who goes to do the fighting, but I think that she is as much a patriot as the man who does the fighting.

For liberty you're going, man,
And honor—therefore go!
But oh, my man, come back, come back,
Because I need you so!

One man in ten must fall, they say;
Each hour my fervent prayer
Will seek its heavenward way to plead
That God may guard you there.

I know the horrors you will see;
I hear the bursting shell;
But, man o' mine, you'll do your part,
And do it more than well!

'Tis such as you they want, my man,
To stem the tyrant's greed;
But oh, my man, come back, come back—
My love, my strength, my need!

—Gertrude Stewart.

MOST CRITICAL TIME IN OUR HISTORY.

My friends, this is the most critical time in the history of the world.

To-day, as Gen. Haig stated a short time ago, we are "with our backs to the wall," but, like Napoleon's drummer boy, we do not know "how to beat a retreat."

It is said that only once in his life did Napoleon lose his courage. This was at the Battle of Wagram.

Believing the battle lost, he said to his drummer boy, "Beat a retreat." He replied:

Sir, Marshal Denny never taught me to beat a "retreat," but I can beat a "charge"; I can beat a "charge" that will bring the dead into line. I played it at the Pyramids, I played it at Lodi, and Austerlitz, and Marengo, and I can play it here.

Napoleon told him to beat a "charge," and he won one of his greatest victories.

So to-day, dark as things may seem, we know not the word "retreat," and right will in the long end defeat and crush might.

When the British Admiralty wanted to take Quebec, they said to the oldest general, "Will you take Quebec?" He replied, "It will be a difficult task." They said "Stand aside." One after another of the generals were called and each gave an evasive answer until the very youngest was reached, and they said, "Gen. Wolfe, will you take Quebec?" He replied, "I'll do it or die." He did both.

So to-day when Gen. Foch believes the time has come for a counterattack he will say to our men and the allies, "Will you march to Berlin?" and they will say, "We'll do it or die." And, like Wolfe of old, they will not fail.

HARMONY IS NECESSARY ON "OUR TEAM."

When I played baseball years ago I was taught that it was more essential that you have harmony and teamwork on your own nine than it was to create dissension on the opposing team.

JACK MAGYAR.

If the captain was to come around and say that his second cousin told him that his brother-in-law had told him that the left-handed pitcher for the Germantowns, Jack Magyar, was sulking, and with a little soft talk he might be gotten to throw the game, I would say that I did not take much stock in that kind of a pitcher, even if the story was true.

JIM AUSTRIA.

If he said he also heard that Jim Austria, the right-hander, was also sore on the management, I would tell him that I did not believe it, because the captain of the Germantowns and Jim Austria had been in too many dirty deals together to separate them.

I would further suggest that, knowing the captain of the Germantowns and Jim Austria as I did, I would rather think that all the talk was to make our team overconfident, so that they could win an easy victory.

TOM BULGAR.

As to Tom Bulgar, the first baseman, trying to get away from them and sign with us, I would state that Bulgar always was a disturber and was the man who broke up the Balkan League by his backbiting and dirty work.

"YOUNG" TURK.

Neither would I place much confidence in the report that Young Turk, their shortstop, was looking for a new berth. I would further suggest from what I have heard about Young Turk and his treatment of the young Syrians, Armenians, and Jews in his neighborhood that he was not the kind of man we would want on our team, anyway.

The score, to use a baseball expression, is about 3 to 1 in favor of Germany to-day.

PENNANT FLYING OVER THE HOME GROUNDS.

If we want to see the pennant fly over the home grounds with the word "Victory" on it, we will have to play the game so that there will be the utmost harmony on our side. Never mind about the talk of dissension on the side of the enemy.

We want to play this game so that Young America will be able to make a home run, with three men on bases, in the last inning, and win the game. That can be done by harmony and nothing else.

"LET US HAVE PEACE" CAN ONLY BE WON BY FIGHTING FOR IT.

"Let us have peace" can only be won by fighting for it. It can not be won by weeping; the other side is not playing that kind of a game.

When I am willing to admit that Judas Iscariot and not Jesus Christ was the Savior of the world, then I am willing to admit that there is a chance of Austria breaking away from Germany.

When I am willing to admit that Benedict Arnold and not Washington was the father of our country, then I am willing—but not until then—to admit that there is a likelihood of Bulgaria and Turkey wishing to conclude a separate peace.

ANY PEACE NOW "MADE IN GERMANY."

Any peace now will not only be "made in Germany" but also made by Germany.

Ask the women in Belgium and France and in northern Italy if they wish that kind of a peace.

Ask the parents of the boys of Belgium and France whose hands have been cut off by the enemy if they want that kind of a peace.

Ask the boys in the trenches, who have seen their comrades with their throats cut after a trench raid, what they think of that kind of a peace.

Any peace now means that we would receive the same ignoble terms as Russia and Roumania.

Any peace now means the same treatment of our women as the women of France and Belgium, and northern Italy and Serbia.

THE ONLY TERMS OF PEACE.

Yes, we want peace, but we want it on the terms of a lasting and a permanent peace.

When we have pushed the enemy foot by foot out of bleeding Belgium; when we have pushed them back foot by foot out of heroic France; when we have driven them out of northern Italy; when we have driven every Hun out of brave Serbia and Montenegro; when we have pushed them back on German soil; seen them burn and destroy their own fields as they have destroyed the fertile fields of France and Belgium; when the flag of Belgium, the tricolor of France, the Union Jack of Great Britain, the flag of Italy, the flag of little Serbia, and our own glorious Red, White, and Blue float proudly in the breezes as we march toward Potsdam; when the Kaiser is willing to expiate his sins on some desolate island; when the terms of peace will be "made in Germany," but made by men favoring a permanent peace, then we will talk peace, but by the Great Jehovah no red-blooded American wants any talk of peace until that glad day comes.

"Life and Character of Theodore Roosevelt"—Address Delivered at Clarksburg, W. Va., on February 9, 1919, by the Hon. William R. Wood, of Indiana.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STUART F. REED,

OF WEST VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 10, 1919.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address of Hon. WILLIAM R. WOOD, of Indiana, delivered at Clarksburg, W. Va., on February 9, 1919.

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS BY HON. WILLIAM R. WOOD, OF INDIANA.

When the news was flashed throughout the country on the morning of January 6 that the greatest American of his time, and by far the world's greatest private citizen, was dead, every person who heard it was profoundly shocked.

While the immediate friends and relatives of ex-President Roosevelt knew that he was a sick man and had been in failing health for a long time, yet the public, so accustomed to seeing and reading in the public press almost daily some word of patriotic counsel or advice addressed to his countrymen by this wonderful genius, was not in the least prepared for this loss to the Nation.

We now know that ever since his return from his South American expedition he had been suffering from the insidious, deep-seated effects of the jungle poison that he there contracted, and no doubt it was this, with other causes, that brought about his untimely demise.

After his return from this South American trip, Col. Roosevelt was almost constantly in the care of a physician, but the public did not know this, and whenever by chance some notice was given of his ailment he sought to belittle it and to minimize it as being trifling and only temporary.

This attitude with reference to his bodily affliction was characteristic of the man; it was characteristic of his combative nature and his unwillingness to yield to the forces that opposed his desire to do things, and because of this characteristic he lived as he wished to live, always active, and he died as he wished to die, in the harness.

ROOSEVELT'S FAMILY.

The life of Theodore Roosevelt affords a paradox in the lives of American citizens.

How many families once prominent in the affairs of the Nation can you recall that continued prominent by reason of the acts or deeds of their descendants through three or more generations? They are very few, indeed. It is also lamentably true that we have had very few men—sons of rich parents—that have made an indelible impress on the affairs of our country.

To discuss the reasons for all this would be out of place. I refer to the fact only for the purpose of showing that the life of Col. Roosevelt is a wonderful exception to this rule.

The Roosevelt family was one of the first to make permanent settlement on Manhattan Island. The family on this continent was founded by Claes Martanzoon van Rosevelt as early as 1649. In the course of time the spelling of the family surname was changed by dropping the "van" and adding an extra "o."

Members of this family almost immediately became prominent in the affairs of the island, and remained so from that day to this, covering a period of 270 years.

A Roosevelt has filled almost every position of trust and honor in the Colony and in the State of New York from town alderman to State assemblyman, from Congressman to Supreme Court justice, and finally President of the United States.

Not only were Col. Roosevelt's ancestors prominent in the public affairs of the State, but they accumulated great wealth, and at the time of his death Theodore Roosevelt, sr., was rated a very rich man, but in this case the riches of the father did not prove the curse of the son.

It would have been a very easy matter for him to have lived a life of ease and luxurious idleness, had such been his choice. He could also, by reason of his family standing and connection, have been a prince in the social circle, had this been his desire, but none of these for him. He always looked upon life and its possibilities as most serious propositions, as assets that should not be wasted or frittered away in doing small things; so, from the beginning to the end, his was a life of devotion to work and accomplishment.

IMPORTANCE OF RECREATION.

However, he believed that recreation was not only essential to good health, but a healthy and active mind as well. He therefore devoted much time to recreation, but at this he worked also, and entered into it with all the zest of his being. This trait of his he very forcibly expressed on one occasion, when he said:

> Of course, what we have a right to expect of the American boy is that he was born to be a good American man. Now, the chances are strong that he won't be much of a man unless he is a good deal of a boy. He must not be a coward or a weakling, a bully, shirk, or a prig. He must work hard and play hard. He must be clean minded and clean lived and able to hold his own under all circumstances and against all enemies. It is only on these conditions that he will grow into a kind of a man of whom America can really be proud. In life, as in a football game, the principle to follow is: Hit the line hard—do not foul and do not shirk—but hit the line hard.

All the world knows that in his many-sided life he practiced what he preached.

To make of himself, however, an exemplar of this teaching a wonderful transformation had to be made, and he made it himself. As a boy he was a weakling, puny and sickly. In consequence there was born in him self-distrust and want of confidence. To be of any consequence in the world and its affairs he knew that these weaknesses must be overcome. With an indomitable will and determination he set about to overcome them, subjecting himself to severe hardship and privation in order to do it. So well did he succeed that when in his prime he was looked upon by those who came in contact with him on the hunt or in the athletic field as almost physically perfect.

With the perfection of his physical make-up came the courage and self-confidence that made him one of the most remarkable leaders of men that the world has ever produced.

In his autobiography Col. Roosevelt has told the story of his physical and mental reformation:

> When a boy I read a passage in one of Marryat's books which has always impressed me. In the passage the captain of some small British man-of-war is explaining to the hero how to acquire the quality of fearlessness. He says that at the outset almost every man is frightened when he goes into action, but that the course to follow is for the man to keep such a grip on himself that he can act just as if he was not frightened. After this is kept up long enough, it changes from pretense to reality, and the man does in very fact become fearless by sheer dint of practicing fearlessness when he does not feel it. (I am using my own language, not Marryat's.) This was the theory upon which I went. There were all kinds of things which I was afraid of first, ranging from grizzly bears to "mean" horses and gun fighters; but by acting as if I was not afraid, I gradually ceased to be afraid. Most men can have the same experience if they choose. They will first learn to bear themselves well in trials which they anticipate, and school themselves in advance to meet them. After a while the habit will grow on them and they will behave well in sudden and unexpected emergencies which come upon them unawares.

What a splendid thing it would be if all the boys and young men in this country would emulate this example of Col. Roosevelt's!

GRADUATE OF HARVARD.

He was a graduate of Harvard University, graduating at the age of 20, and the number that he occupied in his class of 140 was 20. In some of his studies he excelled, in others he did not do well. It seems that he and arithmetic never got along well together, and it proved one of the very few obstacles encountered by him that he could not overcome.

He early developed a specialty for history—history of men and of animals and of inanimate things. His ambition was to become a naturalist. While he was yet a student he planned a trip to go to Greenland to study the fauna of that country. He also made preparation to go to India to hunt big game and to study natural history. These dreams of his student life became actual realities in after years.

LIFE ON A RANCH.

Soon after his graduation he went to the Northwest and lived for quite a period the life of a ranchman. When he arrived in that wild and woolly country he was the butt of many a joke and the subject of a great amount of ridicule by those who looked upon him as a fledgling tenderfoot fresh from an eastern society hothouse, but he was not long in convincing his new associates that he was made of sterner stuff. He asked for no favors and shirked no duty, no matter how laborious or menial. He took delight in helping to break the bucking mustang and never whimpered when he was catapulted from its back.

The western bully who thought he could overawe him by profanity and braggadocio soon found out to his sorrow that for this purpose it took more effective means. He never sought a personal encounter and he never ran away from one, and whenever occasion required it he made a good showing in the art of self-defense.

The experience that Col. Roosevelt had among the cowboys proved most valuable to him in after life. It was there that he learned how to judge men and to acquaint himself with their strength and their weakness of character. He was given an opportunity of close and intimate contact with human nature undisguised and unadorned, and the knowledge he there acquired stood him in good stead when it became his duty to act as a leader of men on the field of battle and as a dispenser of patronage as President of the United States.

If ever there was a natural-born politician, it was Theodore Roosevelt; and when I refer to him as a politician I wish to use that term in its highest and best sense—the sense of service to State and to country; to the betterment of conditions for the uplifting of man.

From the time he entered Harvard University down to his latest breath he was interested in this character of politics.

Within less than a year after his graduation he was elected a member of the New York State Legislature. So fast did he rise in the estimation of his fellow legislators, and so soon did they recognize his ability, that within less than two years he was the Republican leader in the lower house, and he succeeded in passing over bipartisan opposition a resolution forcing an investigation of the crooked machine government in the city of New York. He became chairman of the investigating committee himself, and when his report was made the abuses that he uncovered were so glaring that he compelled a recalcitrant legislature to pass wholesome laws reforming many of the abuses that had been practiced in municipal government of the city of New York for many years. He served three terms in the legislature.

He was a delegate to a national convention when he was 24, and was one of the leaders of the State of New York in the fight to prevent the nomination of James G. Blaine. Blaine was nominated in spite of this opposition. Roosevelt supported him at the election, refusing to join with George William Curtis, Carl Schurz, and their followers, who left the Republican Party for the purpose of defeating Blaine.

After this experience Roosevelt made up his mind to quit politics and to return to his first love, literature, and devote his life to natural research and to writing. Not long, however, was he permitted to remain with this determination. In 1886 he was nominated for mayor of New York while he was absent on his ranch. He returned, accepted the nomination in a rousing speech, setting forth in strong, terse language what his policies would be and what might be expected of him if he was elected. His platform of principles did not appeal to those who had been in the habit of conducting affairs of New York City for their own benefit, and Roosevelt was defeated. He received, however, more than 60,000 votes in a three-cornered fight.

When Gen. Harrison was elected President of the United States it was Roosevelt's desire to become Assistant Secretary of State, feeling that he was fitted for this position by reason of the study that he had been giving to our foreign relations during and since his college days. Blaine had been selected as Secretary of State, and it was still fresh in his mind how Roosevelt had opposed his nomination for the Presidency but a short time before. He knew that Roosevelt had a mind of his own and was fearful that he would not be content to stay well within the limitations of what is expected of an Assistant Secretary. Blaine opposed his appointment, and Harrison yielded to his opposition.

Roosevelt was, however appointed civil-service commissioner by this administration, and to him more than any other single individual may be attributed the success of this branch of our Government. I was told a few days ago by Secretary Doyle, who was secretary of the Civil Service Commission then and is now, that at the time Roosevelt became one of its commissioners they moved all the effects of the office at one load in a handcart. There were but a few thousand on the civil-service rolls at the time; but at the expiration of Roosevelt's term there were more than 40,000 on the list, and while the Civil Service Commission at its creation met with universal scorn of the so-called practical politicians, there are few now who have the temerity to contend that its service has not been a valuable acquisition in our machinery of Government.

From civil-service commissioner Col. Roosevelt was called to act as police commissioner of the great city of New York. This afforded him an opportunity that he had long been looking for. He was given a chance to enforce the laws that he had written upon the statute books while a member of the legislature.

It is generally admitted that he cleaned up the police department of this great metropolis as it never had been cleaned up before and as it has never been cleaned up since.

His next office was that of Assistant Secretary of the Navy. Here he was given opportunity to show his initiative and, to a certain degree, his breadth of practical vision. He had long been watching the attitude of Spain, and he looked with abhorrence upon the practice of that country, with reference to her dependent colonies. His sympathies naturally went out to Cuba, who had been suffering under the tyrannical yoke of the mother country for more than three centuries. He believed that this must come to an end and that the day was not far distant when the United States would have to be the instrument used to bring it to an end.

Our Navy was without a commander of consequence and our gunners were unpracticed in the art of shooting. In order to prepare for the fateful day so rapidly approaching, Roosevelt set out immediately to select a commander that he felt equal to the coming task. He also began without delay a system of target practice that would make efficient the gunners in our Navy when the time arrived for action.

The time came, and with it Dewey, the selection of Roosevelt, as the hero of Manila Bay, and the wiping out of the Spanish fleet through the efficiency of our sailor marksmen without the loss of a single man or any of our ships.

This battle was then, and will long remain, the marvel in the naval history of the world.

But this is not all the service that was rendered by Col. Roosevelt during the Spanish-American War. He was a man of action, and he soon grew restless sitting in a swivel chair in a bombproof position as Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

The Rough Rider Regiment was formed by him. He was the choice of the men for colonel, but he felt that he was not competent to fill the position, and, at his suggestion, his lifelong friend, Leonard Wood, in whom he had the greatest confidence, was selected in his stead. Most willingly did Roosevelt become the lieutenant colonel of this regiment and succeeded to the colonelcy in a very short time by Wood's promotion to the staff of the commanding general.

When all the other incidents of that brief war are forgotten, the memorable charge of Roosevelt over Kettle Hill and on to San Juan will still remain as an inspiration to all those who admire intrepidity and daring.

The popularity gained by this campaign made Roosevelt governor of New York. He entered upon the duties of this position with the full determination to bring about reforms throughout the State that he knew to be needed, and which had long been delayed through the inaction of his predecessors. It was his desire to succeed himself for the accomplishment of this purpose. On the other hand, it was the desire of those who wished to thwart his purpose to get him out of the way, and they determined the best way to do this was by seemingly promoting him to the Vice Presidency. Roosevelt fought this attempt with all his might and beseeched his friends that they not permit him to be thus sacrificed, but so strong was the demand from the delegates of other States, who were sincere in their purpose, that he finally acquiesced, and he was nominated for Vice President at the Philadelphia convention in 1900 and subsequently elected.

It has often occurred to me that a peculiar fate attended Roosevelt's political career and ofttimes denied him desired place in order that he might be permitted to get higher positions, and ofttimes apparently sacrificing him to the desire of his political enemies only to give him opportunity for still higher honors.

By way of illustration, if he had been elected mayor of New York in 1886, in all probability he would have been a candidate for renomination and reelection, and, whether successful or defeated, he would not have been Civil Service Commissioner in 1889; if he had been appointed Assistant Secretary of State in 1889, as he wanted to be, instead of Civil Service Commissioner, he would have been so obscure and opportunity offered him of such little moment to do things that his service would have attracted but little public attention.

As Civil Service Commissioner, however, he was given a great opportunity to show his initiative and to do things on a large scale, and he did them.

When he was Assistant Secretary of the Navy, it was his desire to go into the Spanish-American War as a member on the staff of Gen. Fitzhugh Lee, but for some reason or other this was denied him. Had he gotten this position he never would have formed the Rough Riders, and in consequence would not have been given the opportunity to win the laurels that he did as the leader of this famous fighting force. Again, if he had had his way and had been permitted to run for a second term as governor of New York, in my opinion, he never would have been President of the United States.

In his election to the Vice Presidency this same peculiar hand of destiny seemed to be with him, and by the tragic ending of the life of the gentle McKinley Col. Roosevelt was elevated to the Chief Magistry of our country, serving out the remainder of McKinley's term, a period of more than three years, and was then reelected by the largest popular majority, up to that time, ever accorded to a presidential candidate.

President Roosevelt's administration was unique in many respects; its accomplishments were vast and important. The reforms in Government and governmental agencies were greater in number than during the administration of any of his predecessors or successors. Some of the most wholesome laws for the benefit of all the people were enacted during this period. I will not take the time to recount them.

There are three or four master strokes, however, that stand out boldly as accomplishments of this administration to which I wish briefly to refer.

It had been the dream of the ages that an interoceanic waterway would be built connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific. England had tried to project a scheme for this purpose and failed. France attempted it and miserably failed. It remained for American genius to accomplish it, and was made possible in our generation, at least, by the quick and decisive act of President Roosevelt in recognizing the Republic of Panama.

I know that much criticism was heaped upon him by those who were ever ready to find fault with his administration, and even by some of his conservative friends. Many thought that there was a conspiracy entered into, to which our Government contributed, to bring about the revolution in Panama, but there was no warrant of truth for this belief. Roosevelt did not aid or encourage it. He had done everything in his power to bring about an amicable settlement between Colombia and Panama. Colombia had been offered the price agreed upon for a strip of land on which to construct the Panama Canal, but those who were controlling the affairs of this little country thought that by intrigue they could get a larger sum. President Roosevelt would not submit to blackmail himself and he would not submit to his country being blackmailed while he was presiding over her destinies. The people in Panama, realizing that their fondest hopes were again to be blasted if the Government of Colombia persisted in the course they were pursuing, knowing full well that President Roosevelt would not yield to their unreasonable demands, felt it the time to strike, and strike they did.

The revolution was a success. President Roosevelt simply took advantage of the opportunity as the instrument that came voluntarily to his hands to bring about the world desired result and the building of the Panama Canal was thus made possible, and the dream of the centuries became an accomplished fact, and we are all thankful that the man who made it possible for this thing to be lived to see it completed.

In 1902 occurred the great anthracite coal strike that lasted for months and months, and it appeared that there was but little chance of the contending forces settling their differences. Winter was fast approaching and Roosevelt knew that unless something was done to settle this controversy there would be untold suffering throughout the country. He took upon himself the task of being the peacemaker. He summoned the contending leaders to Washington. He was patient in hearing both sides of the case, and without attempting to decide who was right or who was wrong in the contention he presented the cause of the people whose representative he was, using all the power of his vigorous personality in impressing on the minds of these opposing forces what the effect on the country would be if they persisted in the course that they were pursuing.

The coal strike was declared off, and a way was soon found after this to settle the differences existing between the miners and the operators.

For President Roosevelt's prompt action in this case he received the grateful thanks of all the people of the United States.

Soon after his inauguration in 1905 he had the opportunity to perform what many of our statesmen believe to be the most important act of his career.

The peace commissioners of the Russo-Japanese War were sitting at Portsmouth endeavoring to agree upon a treaty of peace between these two nations. The differences between them were so great and the disposition of each power not to recede from its positions so pronounced that it seemed impossible for an agreement ever to be reached.

The welfare of the world, especially in trade relations, depended much upon the completion of this treaty. The convention was on the point of adjourning and its delegates returning to their homes when President Roosevelt volunteered his good offices as a mediator to the convention. The delegates agreed to hear his proposals, and here again the striking personality of the man and the absolute fairness of his suggestions proved to be the happy medium that ended the struggle between these contending forces, and the peace treaty was signed.

So great was this service considered to be that he was awarded the Nobel prize, which is given annually to some person who has done the most during the year to promote the peace of the world. This prize consisted of $40,000; but President Roosevelt personally never used a cent of it. He placed it in trust under a commission authorized by act of Congress, where it remained inactive until the present session of Congress, when a resolution was introduced showing that nothing had been done with it and it was serving no good purpose and authorizing that the same be returned to Col. Roosevelt that he might make such disposition of it as he saw fit. This bill passed the House and Senate without division. Roosevelt took the money and within less than a week he gave it away in various sums to the different charitable organizations of the country engaged in war work. He did this because he felt that this money was given to him on account of his service rendered for the peace of the world, and that it should be spent in this, the most trying hour of the world's history, for the same purpose.

There is another incident of President Roosevelt's administration which was fraught with more importance to the world and the world's peace at the time than our people generally appreciated.

You will remember when the United States fleet went around the world there was much speculation as to why this was being done. I dare say that the vast majority never did see any good reason for this expedition. Most of them looked upon it as purely spectacular and without any real practical purpose. The fact, however, is that the peace of our country was then in danger. Japan was in a great ferment because of the action of the authorities in California in excluding Japanese children from free participation in the public schools and also legislation concerning the right of Japanese to own the fee in real estate. President Roosevelt heard the rumbling of war, and it was for the purpose of averting this that he made this remarkable demonstration with our armed fleet.

At the same time our fleet was encircling the globe he sent a private representative to England, to France, to Germany, and to Russia, to see what the attitudes of those countries would be in the event of war between the United States and Japan. This fact is now an open secret in the Department of State, and the result of the mission is likewise an open secret. England gave our representative no satisfaction whatever as to what her attitude would be. Germany promised to remain neutral. France answered the query by saying, "We have no treaty with Japan, but we have one with the United States and we will respect that treaty." That was a very sufficient answer. Russia, still smarting under her defeat at the hands of the Japanese, readily promised us her assistance in the event of war. But war with Japan, for the time being at least, was avoided, and in all probability its avoidance was due to the statesmanlike vision of Theodore Roosevelt and his prompt action in letting the belligerent party of Japan know that we were prepared and preparing for the fray.

The greatest and most crucial test of Col. Roosevelt's power among men and the hold that he had on the political party responsible for all of his political success came after he had left the White House and had retired, as he believed, to private life. It came with the presidential campaign of 1912. With the stirring events of that campaign we are all still familiar. It does not matter, however, whether we agree or disagree with his action in becoming a candidate before the Republican convention of that year; it does not matter whether we agree or disagree with his action in becoming an independent candidate for President after failing to get the Republican nomination; it does not matter whether we agree or disagree with the cause that prompted him in becoming an independent candidate, but, upon this fact, we can all agree that the campaign that ensued, with all its factional bitterness, with all its criminations and recriminations, was well calculated to destroy not only the Republican Party for the time being, and possibly forever, but also to completely destroy the political influence and prestige of the man who was primarily responsible for it.

I think that most people will also agree that there was no man living except Roosevelt who could have done what he then did and survived political oblivion. But, instead of this, he lived to see all the bitterness then engendered disappear; he lived to see the political party that he rent asunder reunited, purged of many of the things that he had fought bitterly. He lived to see the personal animosity which he had created for the most part wiped out and the reestablishment of a cordial friendship between the different factions and between himself and the man who then stood as spokesman for the things that he (Roosevelt) wished to destroy. He lived long enough to see himself rehabilitated as the generally accepted and unchallenged leader of that same political party. This could have been no mere accident and could not have been brought about by any stroke of chance. It was done by reason of the wonderful and abiding faith and belief that the American people, regardless of political affiliation, had in his honesty, in his sincerity, and in his integrity of purpose, and in his intense patriotism and love for his country.

President Roosevelt was the most democratic of all of our Presidents except Lincoln. The pomp of power and the glamour of place had no attractions for him. He brought the same simplicity to the White House that had characterized his private life. He recognized that he was temporarily called as the chief servant of the American people. He felt it his duty to be responsive to their wish, and in order to be responsive he realized that he must keep in close touch with the throbbing heart of the public. To do this he invited the high and the low, without distinction, to sit and give him counsel and advice, and his door was closed to no one who came to see him. A mistaken idea has been entertained by many with reference to President Roosevelt in this respect. Many have thought that it was his habit to ride roughshod over everyone who sought to oppose him or to oppose any of his proposals. On the contrary, he was a wonderfully patient listener and readily yielded his opinion when convinced that he was mistaken, and was free to acknowledge his mistake when so convinced.

"Uncle Joe" CANNON, who has served longer in the House than any man ever served and who has had direct contact with more Presidents than any man ever had, is a splendid witness to the truth of this assertion. Mr. CANNON was Speaker during the time Roosevelt was President, and in giving an estimate of the character and public service of Roosevelt Mr. CANNON stated a few days ago that in all his experience he never knew a President as approachable as Roosevelt was or who sought with open mind the advice of those whose advice he felt worth while as freely as Roosevelt sought it. That there was scarcely a week during all the time that Congress was in session but what he was consulted by the President, and that on many an occasion when the President was advised as to the true situation of pending legislation he immediately changed his mind and attitude with reference to the same.

We have had but few Presidents of which this may be truthfully said.

Roosevelt while President would often call temporary sojourners, whom he learned were in the city, to the White House in order that he might be informed first hand as to the opinion of the people in different sections of the country upon public measures.

I heard George Ade, the Indiana humorist, relate that on one occasion when he was in Washington on private business of his own he was called to the White House, and he could not understand what it was for. He did not even know that the President knew he was in the city; but it did not take him long to find out the purpose of the President after coming into his presence. There was some great public question pending, and the President wanted to know what the people of Indiana were thinking and saying about this particular question. By means of this character he was always seeking to get as close and remain as close to the people as he possibly could.

To my mind, one of the greatest evidences of President Roosevelt's character was his simplicity. This with him was inherent. It is a virtue hard to acquire and more difficult to assume. He practiced it naturally in private as well as in official life. He disliked veneers; he disliked pomp and abhorred ceremony. While he had plenty of money to supply himself with all the luxuries of life, he did not waste it in this way. He would rather spend it for books and things that were essential. His home was a home in fact, and was made such by the simplicity of its appointments and its furnishings, and everyone who crossed its threshold felt at home because of the homelike atmosphere therein. He loved the companionship of men and loved to commingle with them, touching shoulder to shoulder, and it did not matter to him whether their positions were high or low, just as long as he was discharging his duty as a man. He had as much respect for a section hand as he had for the president of the railroad, and gave him his proportionate consideration.

I witnessed a beautiful demonstration of this characteristic myself. During the campaign of 1900 Roosevelt was making a speaking tour throughout our country. He was on his way from Chicago to La Fayette, Ind., my home. A committee of our citizens accompanied him on this trip. We stopped at almost every station, and the whole surrounding country, it seemed, turned out to hear him. We did not remain at any one place but a few minutes, and opportunity was given him to make only a few remarks. Finally we reached the yard of the Monon Railroad, on the outskirts of the city of La Fayette. It was just 12 o'clock, and the employees in the railroad shops all came running down to where our train had stopped for the purpose of changing engines. We were there for 5 or 10 minutes; and, instead of making a speech, Roosevelt got down on the ground where this great crowd of workingmen were surging and commenced to shake hands with them right and left. The hands of most of these laboring men were covered with grime and grease, and they shrunk from giving their hand. I will never forget what he said to them:

Boys, never mind your hands if your hearts are all right. I would be ashamed to take your votes if I were ashamed to take your hands.

And he did not say this for political effect. It was his honest expression of feeling, direct from his heart, of sympathy for his fellow men.

There were many sides to Roosevelt's character, and his accomplishments are so diversified and in so many fields of endeavor that it is impossible in the short time that I have even to mention many of them.

I heard Speaker CLARK, of the House of Representatives, state, when I first entered Congress some years ago, and repeat it again when he heard of Roosevelt's death the other day, that he knew more about more subjects than any man living or dead.

Now that he is gone and only the things that he did are to live, we will begin to realize more and more that this estimate of Speaker CLARK'S is correct.

We all know that he was a success at everything he undertook, and that everything he undertook was benefited by reason of his efforts. His fame would have been secure had he never entered politics. It would have been pronounced had he confined himself to his first inclination—literature.

But few people realize the extent of his writings and the variety of subjects concerning which he has written, and those who do realize the extent of this work are amazed and wonder where he found the time, amid all his other activities, to do the subjects he has treated upon the justice with which he treated them. He was the author of books enough to make a very respectable library in themselves.

He commenced his literary pursuits before he was out of college, and gave to the country his first book soon after his graduation, "The Naval War of 1812." This work took rank immediately as an authority and has remained so ever since. His treatment of this subject was so eminently fair to both the nations immediately concerned that England asked him to write a chapter on this war to be inserted in the "Royal Navy."

He did this, and it has been accepted by the British students as being most accurate.

He was also the author of the following interesting and instructive volumes: "Hunting Trips of a Ranch Man," Biographies of "Thomas Hart Benton," "Gouveneur Morris," and "Oliver Cromwell," "Ranch Life," "On the Hunting Trail," "The Winning of the West," which is a wonderful history of the settlement of the Northwest Territory and all of our country west of the Mississippi River, "The Wilderness Hunter," "New York," "The Rough Riders," "American Ideals," and "The Strenuous Life." In addition to these he has written many essays on various subjects, political and otherwise, and has contributed to almost every first-class periodical and many of the first-class newspapers of the United States.

Some discussion has been had and no doubt will be had in the future with reference to the religious affiliation and belief of Col. Roosevelt, but there is no trouble in settling both of these questions. He joined the Dutch Reformed Church, to which his father and grandfather had belonged, when he was 16 years of age, and remained continuously a member of this church until he died. He was too broad and too liberal in mind to be circumvented by any creed or narrow dogma. Like St. Paul, he was "persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

Best is his faith declared in his own words with which he said:

The true Christian is the true citizen, lofty of purpose, resolute in endeavor, ready for a hero's deeds, but never looking down on his task because it is cast in the day of small things; scornful of baseness; awake to his own duties, as well as to his rights; following the higher law with reverence: and in this world doing all that in him lies, so that when death comes he may feel that mankind is in some degree better because he lived.

With this as the test, who can say that Theodore Roosevelt was not a Christian?

No man ever lived who was more completely obsessed with love of country than Col. Roosevelt. With him this was a living burning passion, actuating all that he did or said. Never was there a time, from the beginning of his public career to the end, when he would not have willingly effaced himself for what he believed to be for his country's good. He was ever willing to sacrifice reputation, health, yes, his life itself, for Americanism and anything that stood for its preservation or betterment.

It was this, and this alone, that caused him to enter, with all of his soul, the forum during the last three years of his life to arouse our people to a sense of their danger in the great world conflict which we all hope is now happily ended. Among the toll exacted by this war may be counted the life of Theodore Roosevelt, for had it not been for the superhuman effort he made for its final and victorious determination, there is no doubt in the world but what he would have been spared to us, and for us, for many years. He literally worked day and night, ever unmindful of his physical condition and in defiance of his medical advisers. He burned the candle at both ends until that fateful moment when he bade the servant to "put out the light, please," and this proved to be the signal for putting out the light of America's greatest defender.

When the storm cloud broke over Europe he was the first man in our country who had the vision to see that sparks were flying on our shores, and was the first to warn our people that we would, sooner or later, be included in the general conflagration.

In October, 1915, he said:

This war will be a stalemate at best for the allies unless America gets into it. I don't say that Germany can win the war, but I do say that the allies can not. They may, and probably will, check the Germans and hold them. I do not expect to see more. We will have to get into it or engage later on in what will be a far more serious contest for us. It is only a question whether we will go in now, when we can have allies, or try it alone in the near future.

Later in the same year he further said:

It may be that this country can not be made into a nation until it is shot over. That is the menace we invite by being indifferent now. We've got to face this situation as one people, with one determination, with one national viewpoint, and not with 48 viewpoints.

These were the convictions that prompted him in his endeavor to arouse the people of his country and the Congress of the United States of the necessity of preparing for the inevitable. Had we accepted and acted upon his good counsel then many American soldiers boys whose lifeblood was spilled on the soil of France and Flanders would have been saved to the Nation, and much of the sorrow that is spread broadcast throughout the land would have been obviated.

When at last our Government declared that a state of war existed between our country and the Imperial German Government Col. Roosevelt was among the first to unsheath his sword and volunteer his services on behalf of his country. He begged the War Department to permit him to raise a body of troops, and said:

In such event I and my four sons will go. I do not want to be put in the position of saying to my fellow countrymen, "Go to war." I want to be in the position of saying "Come to the war; I am going with you."

Most characteristic of this brave man.

This privilege was denied him, and no doubt it was the greatest disappointment ever suffered by him in his eventful life. But he did not permit this disappointment to turn him aside from the work at hand. He was not permitted to go himself, but he sent four of his sons and a son-in-law. Not into bomb-proof positions did they go, but into the very thick of the fray. Two of them received wounds which they will ever carry as badges of honor for the heroic parts they performed. Another gave the last full measure for the cause that he loved and that his father loved so well. His name is enshrined on two continents, in the hearts of all who love heroism.

Not until the day the armistice was signed did Col. Roosevelt cease to give all that was in him for the better prosecution of the war that it might be the more speedily and victoriously ended.

It has been suggested that it was a most fitting time for him to die; that he died in the fullness of honor and in deeds accomplished, but with this those who know what he had yet to perform, and felt it his duty to perform, can not agree.

Peace has its problems no less important than the problems of war. The United States has confronting her to-day the greatest problems in all her history, and the future weal or woe of this fair land depends upon the manner in which they are solved.

The goodly counsel and far-seeing vision of a Roosevelt is needed for their solution.

A short time before his death he said:

I am interested in awakening my fellow countrymen to the need of facing unpleasant facts. I am interested in the triumph of the great principles for which with all my heart and soul I have striven and shall continue to strive.

We need some one now to iterate and reiterate this sentiment. We need some one to preach in every town, village, and hamlet "Americanism." We need somebody to preach the value of liberty when protected by law. We need some one to preach the lesson George Washington left us in his Farewell Address. We need somebody to call our attention to the danger of foreign entanglements. We need somebody to check the socialistic tendency of the hour. We need somebody to stamp out the spirit of bolshevism, that is all too rapidly gaining a foothold in this country. Who have we among us that could do these things as Col. Roosevelt could do them? Who have we among us that could get the ear of the people like he could do it? Who is there in all the land to whom they would listen as they would listen to him in this crucial hour?

He did a wonderful work, and did it well, but his work was not finished. The work of such a man never is finished. It will be a long time before we find some one to take his place and complete it.

But let us hope that the Government for which he gave so much and the country that he loved so dearly will be protected against these insidious and evil influences that he would have plucked like thorns from the body politic, and that the old flag that he loved so well may continue unsullied and untarnished from within as it has thus far remained unsullied and untarnished from without. To him the flag meant all that Riley has had it say that it means:

By the driven snow white and the living blood red
Of my bars, and their heaven of stars overhead—
By the symbol conjoined of them all, skyward cast,
As I float from the steeple or flap at the mast,
Or droop o'er the sod where the long grasses nod—
My name is as old as the glory of God.

I can not refrain from quoting the thought that occurred to Henry L. Stoddard, who was one of the closest and most confidential friends of Col. Roosevelt, and which he expresses as follows:

As I watched the flag-draped coffin borne slowly down the aisle of the little church the words came to me irresistibly, "Dear old flag; you have lost something to-day. Your stars are all there and your stripes are all there, but a great spirit of patriotism has gone out and a brave defender has left you. You enfold him now, do it with the tenderness, the love he had for you."

In every mountain range there are a few lofty peaks that tower high above all other surrounding peaks. Since the beginning of the human race every age has produced a few characters with such transcendent genius in literature, statesmanship, art, or invention that their names will never be forgotten, and their influence will be as lasting as time.

In the history of this age, to be written in some after-day, when all the animosity of the time is forgotten and only the ideal is recorded, the fame of Theodore Roosevelt will appear like one of the lofty mountain peaks to which I have referred, and his name will be written among the first of the few immortals that will survive with the age in which he lived and wrought in so many ways for his fellow men. Monuments of stone and of bronze will be erected to perpetuate his memory, but after the last of these have crumbled into dust and rusted into decay the virtue of his deeds and the goodly influence of his life will remain imperishable as long as men love liberty and as long as the world remains devoted to the principles of patriotism.

Cease Wasting the People's Money Paying Unmeritorious Private Claims, Rapidly Depleting Treasury.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS L. BLANTON,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 10, 1919.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I secured this indulgence of my colleagues for the purpose of vehemently protesting against the existing loose method of wasting the people's money in indiscriminately paying unmeritorious private claims out of a Treasury fast nearing depletion.

When placed upon the Committee on Claims at the beginning of this Congress I found the following situation existing: The committee was subdivided into six subcommittees of three members each, to which subdivisions a proportional one-sixth of the hundreds of private claims against this Government was submitted. Any member at will could submit to the full committee a favorable report on any bill referred to his subcommittee, and it seemed to be expected that the committee would adopt such member's report without question.

With over 20 years' active experience as a lawyer, 8 years being spent as a trial judge on the district bench, I learned that the allegations in a claimant's petition rarely ever stated the real facts, and that in many instances the testimony of the claimant's witnesses was absolutely destroyed by cross-examination or the rebuttal evidence offered by the party sued. In many cases I had heard one bunch of skillful physicians assert that the claimant was seriously injured permanently, and that such injuries were the proximate result of some tort or force occasioned by the negligence of the defendant, and then have heard another bunch of equally skillful doctor men testify, either that the claimant was not hurt at all but was merely simulating injury, or that his condition was not occasioned by the alleged act of the defendant but was the result of some disease from which the claimant had for years prior to such act been suffering. And then after collecting his judgment given by an overly sympathetic jury, I have seen the crutches thrown away and the enriched claimant resume his former activities and pleasures.

With such experience, I was astonished to learn that with the Committee on Claims the ex parte statements of claimants and their witnesses would be accepted as the absolute truth, without any investigation whatever of the real facts, with no cross-examination of such evidence, and without any attempt whatever to have the Government's side of the case presented. I therefore gave notice right in the beginning that I expected to make a personal investigation of each and every claim upon which there was sought to be made a favorable report before I gave my vote on the case. My colleagues contended that such action would be impossible, as I would never be able to give that much time to the work of this committee. Nevertheless I have carefully investigated each and every claim reported out of the committee, and in reaching a conclusion thereon, I have absolutely ignored friendship for the colleague who introduced same, the personnel and standing of the claimants, and every other matter except the one inquiry, Is the claim a just one, and should the Government, morally and in good conscience, pay it?

I have succeeded in convincing the committee of the injustice of certain claims concerning which prior to my investigation a favorable report had been suggested. Illustrating such claims, I call attention to my adverse report adopted by the committee on the following claim, to wit:

[House Report No. 1014, Sixty-fifth Congress, third session.]

P. J. CARLIN CONSTRUCTION CO.

Mr. BLANTON, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following adverse report:

In the Sixty-fourth Congress bill H. R. 4537 was introduced to pay $16,712.44 to the P. J. Carlin Construction Co. This claim is now reduced to $12,612.44, but we respectfully submit that not $1 is justly due, and the entire claim should be disallowed.

On September 22, 1910, the Supervising Architect advertised for bids on drawings and specifications for the construction complete (except elevators) of the building to be occupied as a United States post office and courthouse at San Juan. That special excavation, with substantial pilings to be sunk, was deemed vitally necessary for a stable foundation is clearly shown in the following portions of the specifications, to wit:

"All work is to be executed in strict accordance with specifications * * *. The pilings are to be of local wood and have concrete cap. The piles shall be perfectly straight and free from defects and all bark shall be removed. The upper end shall have wrought-iron ring at least ½ by 2½ inches, and all piles must be provided with approved metal points. They shall be driven in the same manner as is required for concrete pile, using the following formula for ascertaining the safe carrying capacity: In which P equals a safe carrying capacity of 15 tons; w, the weight of the hammer in tons (which shall be between 2,000 and 3,500 pounds); h, the height of the fall of the hammer in feet; and S, the average penetration of the pile under the last five blows.

"Four permanent piles shall be tested to 25 tons during the progress of the work, the locations for such tests to be selected by the superintendent, who shall report settlements for each five tons loading. The settlements for the 15-ton and the 25-ton loads shall also be reported after having been allowed to stand for 24 hours.

"All excavations shall be kept practically free from water during the placing of the concrete and until after the concrete is set.

"The concrete footings or pile caps shall be composed of one volume of Portland cement, three of sand, and five of 2-inch stone or gravel aggregate, and it shall be reinforced by two thicknesses of metal fabric, etc."

On November 21, 1910, the claimant submitted a bid proposing to construct the work complete according to specifications for $374,000, which was accepted, and on December 12, 1910, the Government executed a written contract with claimant agreeing to pay the said $374,000 for the said construction complete. The contract provided that the building was to be completed by November 1, 1912, and—

"It is expressly covenanted and agreed by and between the parties hereto that time is and shall be considered as of the essence of the contract, and in the event that the contractor shall fail in the due performance of the entire work to be performed under this contract by and at the time herein mentioned, the said contractor shall pay unto the Government as and for liquidated damages the sum of $50 for each and every day the said contractor shall be in default," and the Government reserved the right to deduct said damages from the consideration price.

The Government did not propose any change in specifications, but it was the claimant which sought to substitute its judgment in the place of the contract specifications, and contended that the soil without piling would furnish a stable foundation, and proposed to eliminate the piling and to deduct $5,478 from the contract consideration, stating:

"It is respectfully pointed out that a saving of time in the driving of these piles could be effected from three to five months," and further stating:

"We believe, therefore, that it would be to the best interests of this work, both as to time and to cost, if piling can be eliminated."

Following this proposal, an incompetent representative of the Government, Mr. Stierle, wired claimant as follows:

"Your proposal May 13 accepted, to deduct $5,478 your contract San Juan post office for omission piling. Should changes in foundations be necessary hereafter they will be settled upon contract unit basis."

Upon such telegram claimant constructed the foundation upon native soil, without driving down the specified pilings, and after building several walls the structure began to sink and crack, and it was then ascertained that, after all, pilings would have to be sunk in order to get a stable foundation.

Contractor then proposed to remedy the evil by then doing what it should have done at first, make the foundation stable, but it demanded $36,000 extra pay. It will be remembered that for eliminating the pilings demanded by the contract the contractor deducted only $5,478 from its pay, but when forced to put the pilings in, instead of doing it for the $5,478 it had deducted it demanded $36,000 for doing its duty.

In its extremity the Government agreed to pay this $36,000 extra, and on May 14, 1912, the contractor, with his sureties, executed a written contract with the Government to satisfactorily construct said foundation and complete said building according to specifications for not to exceed $36,000 additional. In this the Government was more than liberal and considerate.

The report of Secretary McAdoo, of date February 18, 1916, shows:

"The contracting company was found to be responsible for seven months' delay, after making due allowance of time for the extra foundation work and for weather conditions."

The Government not only did not charge the contractor up with this 210 days' delay at the agreed liquidated damage of $50 per day, which would have amounted to $10,500, but it waived it all and paid to the contractor the full $374,000, and also paid it the full $36,000 additional, and then besides paid to it an additional $7,354.51 for extra good measure, as is shown by the attached letter from Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Hon. James H. Moyle, of date June 11, 1918, stating that the total amount paid by the Government to the P. J. Carlin Construction Co. on this contract is $417,354.51.

We must not go behind these contracts and dig deeper down into the Treasury of the United States by taking $12,612.44 more of the people's money and put it into the pockets of this contractor, which had to make two contracts before it would perform its agreement. Are we to say to the world that a Government contract means nothing—the contractor will be paid the $374,000 contracted for, and will also be paid $36,000 additional compensation demanded, and also will be paid $7,354.51 extra for good measure, and then Congress is asked to step in and set all contracts aside and eight years after the date of the original contract make an entirely new contract for the claimant and the Government by paying the contractor a special reward of $12,612.44 extra for his bad judgment, which resulted in the Government getting an inferior building with a patched-up foundation?

We respectfully submit that it would be an outrage to allow one cent on this claim, and it is respectfully recommended that it be disallowed.

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

At our first meeting this year the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE], though ready to make a favorable report on his bill H. R. 12018, kindly agreed to giving me time to investigate it. As this bill involved $66,736,387.60, I spent much time in carefully investigating the claim, and at our meeting on January 24, indicated my readiness to report on same, but the author of the bill being absent action was postponed. At our meeting on January 31 I reported verbally, giving my conclusions reached on the bill, but no final action was taken by the committee, as the author again was absent. After the committee met on February 7 all members present unanimously adopted my written adverse report as the report of the committee, as follows:

CLAIM OF THE ESTATE OF JOHN SEVIER AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BLANTON, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following adverse report:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 12018) for the relief of the estate of John Sevier, having considered the same report thereon with a recommendation that it do not pass.

This bill (H. R. 12018), if allowed, would pay to Emmetta Humphreys, as administratrix of the estates of John Sevier, sr., and John Sevier, jr., the enormous sum of $66,736,387.60, being principal sums aggregating $8,447,644, together with 6 per cent interest thereon for over 115 years.

There are really three claims embraced in the above amount, the first and principal one of which is for the value of 174,474 acres of land originally within the boundaries of the State of North Carolina, surveyed and granted to John Sevier, sr., in the years 1794 and 1795, under an act of the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina in 1783.

In 1785 the United States entered into the treaty of Hopewell with the Cherokee Indians by which certain described lands then in North Carolina were set apart to them for hunting grounds.

In February, 1790, the State of North Carolina ceded her western territory, embracing the lands allotted to the Cherokee Indians, to the United States with certain conditions expressed.

In 1791 the United States entered into the treaty of Holston, by which the boundary between the citizens of the United States and the Cherokee Indians was established.

The said surveys and grants of land to John Sevier were included within the boundaries of the said territory theretofore set apart to the Cherokee Indians, and were not made until 1794 and 1795, subsequent to the said treaties of Hopewell and Holston, and subsequent to the cession to the United States by North Carolina of these lands out of which the State of Tennessee was afterwards created.

By the act of February 18, 1841, the State of Tennessee was authorized to settle claims against said lands, but required that all land warrants should be satisfied, either by location of the land within one year or by their presentation for payment at a price of not less than 12½ cents per acre within two years, or the holders of such warrants should be forever barred of all further claim or right.

When this case was submitted to the Court of Claims for a determination of the facts, in the opinion of the court filed February 28, 1910, it found:

"There is no evidence to show whether the claimant's decedents, or their heirs or legal representatives, complied with the terms of the above act; presumably they did not."

And, further, the court found:

"Nor is there any evidence to show that John Sevier, sr., and John Sevier, jr., did not receive the benefit of said lands or the value thereof, as provided by the said act of February 18, 1841, nor does it appear that the United States ever received any benefit therefrom."

Claim No. 2 involved 50,000 acres of land deeded to John Sevier in 1797 by one Cox, attempting to act for the "Tennessee Company," out of lands granted by the State of Georgia to the "Tennessee Company," reciting a consideration paid by Sevier of $5,000, which, with other lands, afterwards became the "Mississippi Territory," out of which the States of Alabama and Mississippi were created.

On April 24, 1802, the State of Georgia ceded to the United States the said "Mississippi Territory," Georgia to be paid $1,250,000 out of the first sales, and, if a balance remained, reserving 5,000,000 acres to satisfy and compensate claims.

On March 3, 1803, Congress passed an act requiring all such land claimants to perform certain acts before March 1, 1804, on penalty of becoming forever barred for nonperformance, and further providing that all claims must be exhibited to the Secretary of State and recorded by January 1, 1804.

In passing upon this claim the Court of Claims, on February 28, 1910, held:

"Whether the claimant's decedent ever complied with the provisions of said act does not appear."

On March 31, 1914, Congress passed an act providing for commissioners to pass upon all claims based upon said "Tennessee Co." lands, to whom John Sevier submitted his deeds from Cox and executed releases to the United States, and said commissioners ruled against said claims, holding that Sevier had failed to show proof of any authority in said Cox to act for said company, and on February 28, 1910, the Court of Claims found:

"That it did not appear that the United States had received any benefit whatever from said land."

The third claim involved 5,000 acres of land granted August 14, 1786, to John Sevier by the General Assembly of the State of Georgia for acting as a commissioner appointed by said assembly, which land was afterwards located and patented to the heirs of John Sevier in 20 patents on June 12, 1828. Said heirs failed to take possession of same, but permitted individuals to hold possession of same adversely until they have lost their title by limitation. The United States is not to blame for such laches. The Court of Claims found:

"It is not shown that the United States at any time received any benefit therefrom."

John Sevier was the first governor of Tennessee, was a man of good judgment and strong political influence, and it is to be presumed that he received the benefit of the warrants involved in claims 1 and 2. When his estate was inventoried even the most insignificant articles of minutest value were itemized, yet no mention was made of such warrants.

There is no merit in this claim; hence it is disallowed.

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

After the committee had unanimously adopted the above report, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] appeared, requesting the committee to rescind its action and give him, as author of the bill, further time to consider the case, which was done.

As this session of Congress is drawing to a close and in its last hours, it is always usual to have rules suspended and bills considered and passed out of their regular order. I am taking this method of apprising my colleagues in advance of the demerits of quite a number of bills against which I have filed minority reports, hoping to enlist their aid in assisting me to prevent their passage.

The following letters will indicate my conclusions reached on the Killeen and Wreidt cases:

SEPTEMBER 6, 1918.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: At your request I have carefully investigated the claim of Mr. George Killeen against the Government and regret to state that the record discloses very little merit.

Claimant contends that in 1896 and 1897, over 20 years ago, under a contract with one Carver, a private citizen having no connection with the Government, he was excavating dirt at the base of the hill in Georgetown from M to Prospect Street; that one Goslin, an employee, and whom he thinks was a draftsman and engineer or assistant engineer in connection with the Quartermaster's Department, verbally gave him directions to dump the dirt in making such fills, which he claims was a beneficial and necessary work for the Government, and asks that he be paid $35,000 for such work under the bill introduced by you for his remuneration.

Claimant does not contend that any official of this Government authorized to make such contracts induced him to perform such work. He is shown to have been at the time an experienced and active contractor in such line of work and is presumed to have known that he could not expect pay from the Government unless directed to do the work by an authorized official. Not until March, 1902, over five years after the completion of the work, did Mr. Killeen take any steps toward making a claim or procure any affidavits supporting same. The probative force and effect of all of these affidavits merely tends to show that affiants knew of Mr. Killeen dumping more or less dirt in making the fills at the Aqueduct Bridge, and that such fills were beneficial, and in their judgment they believed that Mr. Killeen should receive pay for same.

It is well known to every business man that in numerous instances in making required excavations the party moving the dirt is glad indeed to find a near-by dumping place for same and in many cases charges nothing whatever for the dirt but considers himself fortunate indeed to get rid of it.

Mr. Killeen has furnished no affidavit or statement of any kind whatever from this man Goslin.

In his petition to Congress for reimbursement, sworn to on November 23, 1912, 15 years after the completion of the work, Mr. Killeen states that he was verbally requested to dump this dirt by Col. Owen, and that after performing the work he had several conferences with Maj. C. F. Humphrey, depot quartermaster, relative to his pay, and was delayed in prosecuting his claim because of the absence of Maj. Humphrey from this country; but in the record is a copy of a letter from Mr. Killeen to Maj. Humphrey, of date March 17, 1902, wherein Mr. Killeen seeks to remind Maj. Humphrey of the said conferences and states emphatically that the person who told him to dump the dirt in said fills was a Mr. Goslin (who was an employee, or draftsman, or engineer, or an assistant engineer in the Quartermaster's Department), and he nowhere makes any reference to a Col. Owen.

Moreover, Mr. Killeen has attached to the record no statement whatever from Col. Owen or from Maj. Humphrey, or from any other person claiming to have had authority to bind the Government.

I regret very much, indeed, to report that under the record, in its present condition, I do not believe that there is any merit in Mr. Killeen's claim.

Very sincerely, yours,

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

APRIL 1, 1918.

Hon. S. D. FESS,
House Office Building.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: At your request I have carefully considered the claim of Mr. E. A. Wreidt for $102 and regret very much, indeed, on your account, that I can not approve same.

First. Mr. Wreidt put in a claim for $254 for Shirley Wootten, hired as a stenographer, covering following: One month's pay from April 29 to May 28, $150. From May 29 to June 1, 4 days, at $5 per day, $20. Also, 84 hours overtime during above period, at $1 per hour, $84, making in all the $254. Of the above the auditor allowed and paid Mr. Wreidt $249, and only disallowed $5, covering an imaginary extra day which the law does not recognize. After paying this stenographer $150 per month, and then paying him for 84 hours extra time at $1 per hour during said period, it does seem that the stenographer was exacting to contest for this $5 disallowed. (Sec. 6, act June 30, 1906.)

Second. Mr. Wreidt claimed $42.50 for Charles F. Warren, to cover 42½ hours work at $1 per hour. At this time Mr. Warren was a regular employee of the Government, drawing a regular salary fixed by law, from the Department of Labor, and the payment to him of any additional compensation for any services was specially prohibited by law. (See sec. 1765 R. S. and 20 Comp. 223.)

Third. Likewise for the same reason it was contrary to law to pay George M. Depue $29.50 for 29½ hours, at $1 per hour, as he was then a regular employee of the Government on salary.

Sincerely, your friend,

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

Of the number of claims against which I have filed minority views, where the committee favorably reported payment, the following will illustrate the kind, class, and variety of such claims, and the utter want of merit in them:

HUGH CAMERON (H. R. 5576).

Mr. BLANTON, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following minority report:

I respectfully submit that this is not a just claim against the Government, and that not a dollar should be paid to the claimant.

After carefully investigating the accident, the Quartermaster General on December 17, 1913, made the following unfavorable report, to wit:

"In view of the fact that it appears Mr. Cameron sustained injury on account of his own neglect, it is recommended that the bill be not favorably indorsed.

"HENRY G. SHARPE,
"Brigadier General, Quartermaster Corps,
"Acting Chief, Quartermaster Corps."

On December 20, 1913, the Judge Advocate General, after reviewing the case, gave an unfavorable report, to wit:

"Affidavits are submitted which show that the injury was slight and due to Cameron's negligence. * * * In view of the statement of the constructing quartermaster and the accompanying affidavits, to the effect that the injury was slight and due to Cameron's own negligence, the War Department should recommend that this bill be not favorably considered.

"E. H. CROWDER,
"Judge Advocate General."

On December 22, 1913, the War Department refused to approve this claim by the following unfavorable report, to wit:

"The department concurs in the opinion of the Judge Advocate General of the Army, expressed in the preceding indorsement.

"HENRY BRECKINRIDGE,
"Assistant Secretary of War."

I want to call special attention to the report made by the constructing quartermaster, under seal, together with the evidence he submitted, which he also sent under seal, to wit:

"CONSTRUCTING QUARTERMASTER'S OFFICE,
"UNITED STATES MILITARY PRISON,
"Fort Leavenworth, Kans., January 5, 1912.

"Hugh Cameron was employed as a stonemason on September 1, 1908, by the day at a daily compensation of $3.20. He was employed as a mason at the same rate of pay on December 1, 1908. He received pay only for the days on which he worked. He was employed under the provisions of paragraph 12 of section 1 of schedule A of the civil-service rules. All other mechanics that work on the new prison work are so employed; this for the reason that it is necessary from time to time to change the mechanics, due to the changes in the classes of work which are involved in the construction of the new prison. All these mechanics are paid from the appropriation for the new prison.

On August 8, 1911, Cameron was at work on the foundation of wing 3 of the new prison, putting in concrete. An eyebeam had been previously placed across the northwest tower of wing 3, as shown on blue print herewith, for the purpose of putting the end of a concrete board on it when putting in concrete in the tower. The concrete board had been moved to the position shown in full lines on the print as of date of August 8. The beam was lying across the tower foundation for no purpose. It appears that Cameron walked out on this beam for no purpose in connection with the construction work. He fell off the beam to a point about 6 or 7 feet below and injured his ankle. So far as this office is informed, the injury was slight.

The injury to Cameron was accidental and due to his own neglect. For this reason the injury was not reported to the Quartermaster General. Statements of First Sergt. Frederick W. Jackson, Second Prison Company, United States Military Prison Guard, and Foreman Carpenter Fred Hall are herewith inclosed.

Hugh Cameron was discharged on account of reduction of force and his position has not been filled. It is the intention of this office to make a further reduction in the force of skilled mechanics on this work.

UNITED STATES MILITARY PRISON,
Fort Leavenworth, Kans., January 4, 1912.

On August 8, 1911, I was at work as foreman carpenter in charge of the mechanics in the construction of the new prison. About 4.15 p. m. I was informed by First Sergt. Jackson that Mr. Cameron had fallen in the ditch. I immediately went down there to the building and found Mr. Cameron sitting on the bank. He said he did not think he was very much hurt and would be up to work to-morrow. He had fallen from a 6-inch eyebeam, which had been laid across the northwest tower of wing 3 for the purpose of supporting a concrete board when concreting in the tower. The concrete board had previously been permanently removed from that place, and the eyebeam was there for no purpose in connection with the construction work. Mr. Cameron had fallen from the eyebeam down to the concrete footing below, a distance of about 7 feet. I had more than once cautioned Mr. Cameron about walking on such places, and told him to keep off of them. He had gone out on the eyebeam for no purpose in connection with the construction work on which he was employed. His fall was accidental and due to his own neglect.

UNITED STATES MILITARY PRISON,
Fort Leavenworth, Kans., January 12, 1912.

I was working on August 8, 1911, about 4.15 p. m., mixing concrete on the first wing on the west side. The concrete board was back toward the end of the building. An eyebeam was placed for the concrete board to rest on when the concrete board was working there. The concrete board was moved away from there, and the eyebeam was no longer used. I saw Mr. Cameron walk out on the eyebeam, pointing down at the prisoners in the ditch tamping concrete opposite the concrete board. He lost his balance and turned around and grabbed with his hands and caught the eyebeam, and seemed like his weight was too much for his arms and he let loose and fell on his feet. He limped over and sat down on one of the foundations, then a couple of men took his shoes off and put his feet in water. He limped, and it looked like his ankle was sprained. He sat around until the whistle blew and then walked out the gate with a stick.

UNITED STATES MILITARY PRISON,

On August 8, 1911, about 4.15 p. m., I was working on a concrete board on cell wing No. 3. Mr. Hugh Cameron was the civilian mason. The concrete board had been supported while working on one of the towers by an eyebeam. The concrete board had been moved away and the eyebeam was still there, but of no use. I was at work, and I saw Mr. Cameron walk out on this eyebeam and motion with his hands and he fell off into the ditch below. It was a habit of Mr. Cameron to walk around that way, and he had been cautioned lots of times about doing it. There was no necessity for him to walk on the eyebeam. Mr. Cameron bathed his foot in a bucket of water and went home at quitting time. He did not seem to be much hurt; just a sprained ankle.

UNITED STATES MILITARY PRISON,
Fort Leavenworth, Kans., January 4, 1912.

On August 8, 1911, I was in charge of the fourth gang on the new prison site. About 4.15 in the afternoon I was informed by a convict that Mr. Cameron had fallen in the ditch. As I was standing near by I went down the bank and saw Mr. Cameron, having his foot in a bucket of water. He told me at the time that he did not think he was hurt much. He had fallen off an eyebeam placed across the ditch of the northwest tower of wing 3. The eyebeam was used to support a concrete board when throwing concrete in the tower wall. The concrete board was not in use there that day and the eyebeam was not there for any use that day. As Mr. Cameron fell off the eyebeam he went out there for no purpose in connection with the construction work on which he was employed. His fall was accidental and due to his own neglect. I had heard Mr. Hall, the foreman in charge, several times caution Mr. Cameron to keep off of such places.

[SEAL.] FREDERICK W. JACKSON,
First Sergeant, Second Prison Company,
United States Military Prison Guard.

Cameron was hurt on August 8, 1911, and did not consult a physician until August 9, 1911. All eyewitnesses state that after the accident Cameron stated that he was not hurt much, but would be back for work the next day, and if he hadn't been discharged the next day on account of reduction of force he probably would not have filed this claim. Both the constructing quartermaster, Thomas H. Slavens, and the foreman carpenter, F. E. Hall, state that the eyebeam out upon which Cameron walked and from which he fell was in disuse, and not used for any purpose about said work, and this Foreman Hall states:

"I had more than once cautioned Mr. Cameron about walking on such places and told him to keep off of them."

At the proper time I expect to offer an amendment to strike out the enacting clause of this bill, for I believe that such action should be taken.

[House Report No. 464, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session.]

PAUL GUENTHER (H. R. 8509).

Mr. BLANTON submitted the following minority report:

I can not approve this claim, for the following reasons: The only evidence submitted to the committee is the unsworn statement submitted by claimant's attorney in the way of a brief, seven pages of which form the majority report. As above stated, this is neither signed nor sworn to, and, if untrue, would attach legal liability to no one.

According to claimant's own statement, the bookkeeper did not get sick until February 26, which was only three days before the report had to be filed, and claimant then waited until February 28 before addressing a letter to the collector at Newark, N. J., requesting additional time, he knowing full well at that time that the collector would not receive this letter in time to answer it until after the date for filing the report had expired. His action in thus waiting was both careless and negligent. This bookkeeper, Mr. Paquette, did not sign the report, and his signature was not necessary to either report.

It is highly important that all income and revenue-tax reports should be filed within the time specified by law, and where there is a careless failure to comply with the law it would vitiate its penal provisions for Congress to interfere. The language used by Deputy Commissioner Fletcher is based only on unsworn correspondence and is but a polite, conciliatory conclusion, courteously used in disallowing the claim. I submit that this claim should not be allowed.

[House Report No. 465, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session.]

J. B. PATTERSON (H. R. 2013).

Mr. BLANTON submitted the following minority report:

I can not agree to the policy of approving claims of this character until conclusive evidence has been presented establishing both the justice and bona fides of same.

The only evidence in this case is the ex parte affidavit of the claimant, according to which, on February 26, 1914, thieves entered his post office at Lacon, Ala., and robbed him.

The Post Office Department shows that, according to the claimant's own statement, the stamps were taken from an unlocked drawer; that leaving such stamps in such an unprotected place was in direct violation of section 361 of the postal laws; that at the time said postmaster had a safe in his office, but claimed that it was full of books of account and money, and the Postmaster General sums up the case as follows:

"The postmaster's failure to keep the stamps which were stolen in a locked receptacle, as prescribed by the regulations, was considered negligence within the meaning of the act cited, and, following the established practice of the department in such cases, his claim was accordingly disallowed."

In view of the fact that hardly a month passes during which there is not a default by some postmaster somewhere in the United States, I submit that in a case of this character conclusive evidence should be submitted to the committee of the robbery, other than by the ex parte affidavit of the claimant himself, before such claim is favorably considered. And I further submit that where inexcusable negligence, such as we find in this case, exists, we should not override and disturb the action of the Postmaster General in disallowing the claim.

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

[House Report No. 484, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session.]

ARTHUR WENDLE ENGLERT (H. R. 2207).

Mr. BLANTON submitted the following minority report:

The record shows that the claimant filed upon the 40 acres of land in question on August 1, 1911, and, after complying with formalities, on October 3, 1911, went upon the land and remained thereon in actual peaceable possession thereof, using, occupying, cultivating, and enjoying the same in open, notorious, and undisturbed possession thereof until March 27, 1916.

So far as the record discloses, no adverse claimant ever set up any claim to the land or made any demand for possession, but in February, 1916, claimant had an abstract of title made to the land, same then disclosing for the first time that the land had been patented to another on June 1, 1880, and that the claimant, without any demand being made upon him, on March 27, 1916, filed a relinquishment of his claim to the land with the Government and requested the return of the $62 he had paid out in fees.

I understand that under the laws of California, if an attempt had been made by the prior patentee to eject him, claimant could have recovered from the patentee the value of all of the improvements which in good faith he had placed upon said land, and in justice and good conscience said prior patentee should have paid for such improvements made in good faith, for in six more months the title of claimant to said land would have been perfected by the five-year statute of limitations existing in California.

But without any demand being made upon him by anybody, claimant voluntarily relinquished his title back to the Government and abandoned said land which he had occupied for four and one-half years, and left all of his improvements which he claims to have been valuable and made in good faith as a present and gift to an unknown prior patentee named Dallas, who, so far as the record shows, had never asserted any claim to the land after 1880. I do not think that he should be paid more than the said $62 by the Government.

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

[House Report No. 498, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session.]

YNCHAUSTI & CO. (H. R. 9018.)

Mr. BLANTON submitted the following minority report:

I can not agree to a favorable report of this claim. To make the United States Government liable for the torts of its employees would establish a precedent both unwise and dangerous.

The Court of Claims, composed of eminent jurists, after hearing all of the evidence in the case, rendered the following conclusion:

"Upon the foregoing findings of fact the court concludes that the claim herein is neither a legal nor an equitable one against the United States."

If we should pay for this tort, we would likewise have to settle for every other tort committed, grave or casual, serious or ridiculous. Should a janitor negligently leave some snow at the entrance of a public building, we would have to liquidate the damages of every pedestrian who may have unfortunately slipped down thereon. Every time any one of our numerous postal carriers happens to run over a calf, pig, or chicken, or should wound the feelings of some patron by answering them abruptly and insultingly, the Government would be called upon to pay the price. Should any one of the thousands of Government employees wrongfully engage in a fisticuff with some citizen and inflict upon him bodily injury, serious or otherwise, according to precedent we would have to pay. I am in favor of deciding this case according to law and equity, by not disturbing the judgment of the Court of Claims.

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

[House Report No. 520, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session.]

J. PH. BINZEL CO. (H. R. 7985).

Mr. BLANTON submitted the following minority report:

I can not approve this claim. When one has valuable merchandise sent him by ordinary mail, without being registered or insured, it is sent at his own risk. Notice was printed on each order for stamps that unless purchaser ordered same registered, insured, or sent by express, they would be transmitted by ordinary mail at the risk of the purchaser. And this was understood by all brewers.

Binzel Co. ordered the stamps sent by ordinary mail. By paying a small fee it could have had protection by registering, insuring, or expressing. It preferred to take chances. The collector promptly filled the order by properly addressing the stamps in an envelope 7 by 10½, sending by ordinary mail as ordered. This being done, the obligation of the Government ceased. To approve this claim would guarantee safe delivery of ordinary mail to Binzel Co., where no other citizen is so guaranteed. If Binzel Co. had ordered $311 worth of jewelry, or postage stamps, or bank notes, sent by ordinary mail, would it not be at his own risk? Would it ask the Government to make good such a loss?

Moreover, no court would permit R. P. Binzel to swear, as he has attempted to do in his affidavit, that no member or employee of Binzel Co. ever received the stamps. He could only swear that he didn't himself, and only what he knew himself, but couldn't swear what others did or didn't do in his absence. Then, again, Carrier Finch is what I would call a willing witness, when on February 4, 1918, he attempts to relate positively what occurred on November 3, 1916, when from time to time he had delivered other packages of stamps, and this particular piece of mail was an envelope 7 by 10½. We can not establish a precedent for making good every loss in the transmission of ordinary mail, neither registered nor insured.

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

I join in the foregoing minority report.

ALVAN T. FULLER.

[House Report No. 588, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session.]

WILLIAM WOOSTER (H. R. 914).

Mr. BLANTON submitted the following minority report:

This bill as introduced proposes to pay to William Wooster $7,442.39 additional to the amount he is entitled to and has received from the Government under the plain provisions of his contract. I can not approve of the habit we are fast acquiring of going behind every contract and granting the contractor additional compensation whenever he happens to sustain a loss, but at the same time letting the Government take its medicine in the thousands of contracts executed every year where compensation is paid out of all proportion to the services rendered. Hence I can not approve the favorable report made by my colleagues.

After making a successful competitive bid under advertisement, Wooster entered into a contract with the Government to haul freight between Holbrook, Ariz., and Fort Apache during the year commencing July 1, 1905, and ending June 30, 1906, for which he was to be paid 93 cents per 100 pounds, and was not required to make more than 9 miles per day, and should the Government require him to make 13 miles per day he would be paid $1.11 per 100 pounds, and his contract required him to receive and haul freight at any time during said 12 months upon having five days' notice of such delivery.

The record shows that during the preceding year, under contract with the Government, John R. Hulet delivered all such freight from July 1, 1904, to June 30, 1905, for only 80 cents per 100 pounds.

And the affidavit of Wooster shows that after executing his contract he hired freighters to haul this freight for him with their own wagons and teams for only 80 cents per hundred. And it is to be presumed that they were able to make a living at it. Wooster owned no wagons or teams, and after executing the contract acquired no equipment whatever. He was a merchant, and many people in the country were his debtors, and he expected to collect his store accounts by hiring the freighters who owed him to perform his contract by hauling the freight at 80 cents per hundred, and at the same time make a profit of 13 cents per hundred by collecting 93 cents from the Government for such service. The plan materialized without a hitch until unprecedently bad weather set in during December, and these debtor-freighters were not so anxious to pay their debts by hauling freights through snow and freezing mud for only 80 cents per hundred when their shrewd creditor was receiving 93 cents in yellow gold from the Government for such service, and they struck for higher pay. On December 18, Wooster having failed to furnish transportation facilities after proper notice, the Government was forced to pay a freighter $2 per hundred to haul 22,970 pounds, and again on December 26 (the day after Christmas festivities) the Government was again compelled to pay a freighter $2.50 per hundred for hauling 19,768 pounds. And this falling down on his contract, and the resulting emergency compensation the Government in its dire necessity was forced to pay, set a precedent, and has caused the Government each year since then to pay a higher price for this transportation.

Mr. Wooster contends that the Government should have delivered the freight to him in good weather and before the winter set in. He did not so contract. The written, explicit contract does not so provide. The very reasonable distance of only 9 miles per day he was required to make was a bad-weather schedule and not a good-weather one. In reporting on this matter Maj. H. S. Bishop, Fifth Cavalry, states:

"As to Mr. Wooster's claim, I have no remark to make, as not only he but all freight contractors in that part of Arizona know the conditions before making the bids to haul Government freight."

Without any equipment whatever and without putting one single dollar into the investment or business, Mr. Wooster entered into this contract with the Government, hoping to collect all of his bad debts due him by freighters and men who owned wagons and teams by getting them to haul at 80 cents per hundred, which price the former contractor had received from the Government during the preceding year, and that at the same time in addition he would make a clear net profit of 13 cents per hundred by being paid 93 cents per hundred by the Government. Bad weather, which he could have contemplated, spoiled his pipe dream, and now he asks the Congress to make for him a new contract and require the Government to make good his losses by taking the people's money out of the Treasury and put it into his pocket. In this particular kind of a case I believe that the old doctrine of "As a man binds himself so shall he remain bound," should apply, and at the proper time I shall offer an amendment to strike from the bill its enacting clause.

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

[House Report No. 589, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session.]

EUGENE FAZZI (H. R. 637).

Mr. BLANTON submitted the following minority report:

The bill as introduced proposes the payment of $5,000 to Fazzi for injury he received on March 8, 1916, within a few days after entering the employment of the United States. It is admitted that this claim is not covered by the compensation act of May 30, 1908, and to grant Fazzi compensation it would be necessary to make the act of September 7, 1916, retroactive. Were it not for establishing the dangerous precedent of making retroactive the provisions of this last-mentioned act, which Congress saw fit not to do when passing it, I would be in favor of allowing Fazzi one year's salary of $720. But there are probably thousands of such claims antedating the passage of the act of September 7, 1916, and if we allow compensation to Fazzi we shall be forced to treat all alike and make the provisions of said act retroactive by compensating all claims which may be raked up during the ages past. I therefore submit that no compensation should be allowed, but that the recommendation made by the Quartermaster General, to wit, "That Mr. Fazzi be appointed telephone operator, by Executive order, at $660 per annum, at the Philadelphia depot," be approved by this committee and that it shall recommend and insist that the above or some better position be given to Fazzi.

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

[House Report No. 618, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session.]

F. W. SCHULTZ. (H. R. 746.)

Mr. BLANTON submitted the following minority report:

I must protest against reporting this bill favorably. All of the evidence placed before our committee to establish it is contained in the printed report (No. 108) made to the Sixty-fourth Congress, and which the majority has adopted as its report, this report being the only evidence offered.

Postmaster F. W. Schultz was at the time of the alleged robbery cashier of the State Bank of Junius, and he left the entire management of the post office to his assistant, L. Q. Caldwell. He was charged with knowledge of the requirements of section 356, paragraph 4, Postal Laws and Regulations, which provides:

"Where stamps and funds are kept in iron safes with combination locks, such safes must be carefully and completely locked at night or when the office is left without occupants for any considerable length of time. The common practice of closing safes with what is termed a 'day lock' and 'day combination' affords no protection against experienced burglars, and in case of loss resulting therefrom no credit will be allowed."

Mr. Schultz was presumed to know that if his assistant, Caldwell, did not completely lock the safe at night he himself would sustain loss.

The safe was opened without any force whatever being applied to it, and such safe undoubtedly was not locked in accordance with postal requirements. This claim should not be allowed.

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

[House Report No. 619, Sixty-fifth Congress second session.]

GEORGE F. WEAVER. (H. R. 985.)

Mr. BLANTON submitted the following minority report:

I regret that I can not agree with my colleagues in favorably reporting this bill. I feel constrained again to call attention to the very meager and inclusive evidence upon which claims are allowed. I have made inquiry of the clerk of this committee whether there has been filed with the committee any evidence not contained in the regular jacket containing the papers of this claim, and he advised that there is no evidence filed with the committee other than the printed Report No. 1461 in the Sixty-fourth Congress, which was adopted by the majority as its favorable report.

Hence, so far as this committee is concerned—and it is its report upon which it is asked that Congress shall take money out of the Public Treasury and put it into the pocket of Mr. Weaver—no evidence of any probative weight and force whatever has been offered to establish the justness of the claim. Without such evidence I shall never agree to favorably report any claim.

According even to the unauthenticated allegations in this old report Weaver has not established a claim against the United States. He asks Congress to pay him $2,369 for alleged damages he claims to have sustained in efforts to purchase public lands, of which $1,260 is to cover loss of 14 months' wages, at $90 per month, $500 for clearing and maintenance of himself and family for one year, and the balance embracing items for alleged expense in going to and from Olympia, attorney's fees, etc.

Under the law Weaver was entitled to file on only 160 acres as a homestead entry. Simply because one Doelz had a superior claim to about 50 acres of the tract he filed on did not give Weaver the right to perfect his title to his 110 acres and then file on an additional tract of 118 acres, as he was entitled only to his complement, which, added to his 110 acres, would make his complete homestead entry of 160 acres. The Government did not owe him and his family a living while he was acquiring a home on public lands. His experience was similar to that of hundreds of other men attempting to acquire public lands both of the United States and of States. One file would infringe upon the file of another, and the senior file would prevail in taking the land in conflict.

Weaver did acquire title to 110 acres of what is known as the Montrose homestead, and simply because he lost the remaining 50 acres in conflict, which he had used and had the benefit of its occupancy for 14 months along with his own 110 acres, it was ridiculous for him to ask the Government to pay him $90 a month for the 14 months he used this land, simply because he had been drawing a salary of $90 per month as a baker when he decided to acquire a home on public land. Ignorance of the law excuses no man, and he should have known that the Government would not permit him to file on 118 acres additional.

I respectfully submit that this claim should be disallowed.

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

[House Report No. 620, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session.]

MARION BANTA (H. R. 11689).

Mr. BLANTON submitted the following minority report:

I can not approve of the action of my colleagues in favorably reporting H. R. 11689. There has not been one scintilla of evidence presented to the Committee on Claims even tending to establish the justness of this claim.

The report from Secretary McAdoo shows conclusively that Marion Banta made a bid on a Government contract, and that he voluntarily forfeited his earnest money rather than perform the contract. Simply because he made a lower bid than some one else and would have lost money in performing his contract is no good reason why he should be relieved of his contract. In making his bid he had the same opportunity for investigation as J. H. Kippling and the Grohne Decorating Co., for they all bid upon the same advertised specifications. Banta knew at the time he sent in his certified check to insure the performance of his contract that it would be forfeited to the Government if he did not perform the services required.

Secretary McAdoo states the following:

"On September 7, 1911, the representative of this department, who was directed to take charge of the work, reported that Mr. Banta, instead of commencing the work, had told the custodian that he would forfeit his contract, and had left with the custodian a written statement to that effect."

If we take money out of the Treasury to pay this claim, there will be no further use of any department of Government requiring a deposit or guaranty for the performance of contracts, for the precedent would be set, and Congress could not refuse to hold such guaranty void.

THOMAS L. BLANTON,

[House Report No. 624, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session.]

WILSON M. DENT (H. R. 744).

Mr. BLANTON, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following minority report:

I can not agree to a favorable report on H. R. 8093, which is a bill to pay to Wilson M. Dent the sum of $1,000 for castrating two colts running loose on the range.

Mr. John E. Daugherty, superintendent, certifies to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs under date January 9, 1913, the following:

"It is customary in these round-ups to castrate all young male stock of lessees along with the same stock belonging to the Indians, on the open range, which procedure is a proper and constructive measure."

On December 28, 1912, Mr. Van Kennedy made affidavit before a notary, in which he swears "that in the month of May, 1910, affiant was told by the superintendent of the reservation to inform the said Wilson M. Dent that there would be the beginning of a round-up of the Indian horses the next day, and if said Dent wanted to be there to come in person or to send a representative."

The claimant, Wilson M. Dent, swears "that he was informed by Van Kennedy, who on a Friday evening in May, 1910, called on me and stated that the Indian agent had that day requested him to see me and tell me that the general round-up would begin the following Monday, and that they were castrated the next day, Saturday, and that said stallions were full 2 years old when castrated."

The weight of the evidence indicates that Dent had notice of the round-up. He did not have a lawful right to permit 2-year-old stallions, old enough for range service, to run at large, especially when he knew of the general custom to castrate all of same in round-ups, as "a proper and conservative measure." It is awfully easy to get opinions expressed as to values and damages to benefit a neighbor, especially when it comes out of the Government.

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

[House Report No. 638, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session.]

FAXON, HORTON & GALLAGHER (H. R. 2958).

Mr. BLANTON submitted the following minority report:

I can not approve this bill (H. R. 2958) to pay Faxon, Horton & Gallagher, $888, Long Bros. Grocery Co. $197, A. Rieger $327, Rothenberg & Schloss $441, Riley, Wilson & Co. $466, and Van Noy News Co. $866, for alleged loss of internal-revenue stamps during high water.

After having this case submitted to it for determination, the Court of Claims reached the following—

"CONCLUSION.

"Upon the foregoing findings of fact the court concludes that these claimants named in the first finding have neither legal nor equitable claims against the United States, and any payment thereof rests in the bounty of Congress."

Suppose this loss had occurred by fire. The party whose property burned would have been unfortunate, but would Congress be expected to make his loss good? These revenue stamps were of value. It cost to engrave them. It cost to sell and distribute them. Suppose, again, the place of business had been burglarized and these stamps had been stolen, would Congress be expected to make good the loss?

The question of how many revenue stamps any given dealer has on a stock of tobacco and cigars, which suddenly is destroyed by fire, water, or burglary, is so very uncertain and indefinite that its total, after all, is largely an estimate and guess; and its sum is determined only by the party at interest. The Government has no means of offsetting such testimony. If we set a precedent in paying such claims of loss, it will open to many avenues of fraud against the Government, and fraud, too, which the Government has no way of circumventing.

I respectfully submit that, in accordance with the conclusion reached by the Court of Claims, this claim has not been legally or equitably established; that it be disallowed. I regret, however, to be forced to disagree with my colleagues who have favorably reported this bill.

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

[House Report No. 652, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session.]

CLARA KANE (H. R. 1623).

Mr. BLANTON, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following minority report:

This is a case where my colleagues on the committee, through the favorable majority report, seek to pay to claimant $69.12 more than she asks. Under the law she is entitled to nothing, and has no legal claim against the Government. Whether she is paid anything depends entirely upon the Government's bounty. She asks for only $480. The bill (H. R. 6406) was introduced in the Sixty-fourth Congress to pay her $480. In her letter dated February 28, 1916, addressed to Congressman WILLIAM S. VARE, she (Clara Kane) states:

"William Yenser, the deceased, contributed an average of a little over $10 per week, but I returned to him sufficient to buy his clothes, from the amount he contributed, leaving a net balance of $480 for the past year. As you will see, this shows that he spent about $50 or $60 for clothes, and I did not feel that I was entitled or should ask for that which he had spent on his clothes, and confined myself to the actual net amount received.

"Trusting this will be satisfactory, I am,

"Very truly, yours, MRS. CLARA KANE."

William Yenser received only $1.76 per day. If he spent $50 or $60 per year on clothes he could not have contributed even $480 net per year to Mrs. Kane, for he had to have food, and a year's food must have cost him or Mrs. Kane something.

But in the face of the above evidence the committee, with that liberality with which it is noted, recommends that Congress pay more than the claimant desires, and that she be given $549.12 instead of the $480. Mrs. Kane was related to William Yenser neither by affinity nor consanguinity. I respectfully submit that this allowance should be reduced to $480, the full amount asked for.

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

[House Report No. 653, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session.]

MRS. ANNIE M. LEPLEY (H. R. 1446).

Mr. BLANTON, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following minority report:

The favorable report of the committee on this claim, H. R. 1446, is to allow the postmaster at Plymouth, Cal., $2,055.83 as the alleged amount of stamps, money, and money orders lost by burglary on March 13, 1915. I must dissent from the action of my colleagues and protest against the allowance of this claim, for it is clearly against provisions of the law.

Section 361, Postal Laws and Regulations of 1913, provides in part, as follows:

"4. Where stamps and funds are kept in iron safes with 'combination locks,' such safes shall be carefully and completely locked at night or when the office is left without occupants. No credit will be allowed for losses from safes fastened only with what is termed a 'day lock' or 'day combination.'

"5. A postmaster upon taking charge of his office shall immediately change the combination on every safe therein; and where at any time a safe is procured, either new or secondhand, he shall immediately change the combination. Failure to make such change shall be considered as prima facie evidence of contributory negligence on the part of the postmaster in any case where claim is made for credit for money or other property stolen from such safes which have been opened without resort to violence."

The above sections 4 and 5 of said postal laws are both reasonable and just and protect the Government from fictitious and fraudulent claims of loss. In order to blow open a safe locked by combination the risk of attracting attention by the incident noise is taken, and the regulation requiring the combination to be changed when installed or upon assumption of office is to insure this very contingency, namely, that when Government funds are taken from that safe it is after the noise of an explosion has occurred and a safe is left demolished, excluding the idea of a simulated burglary. These regulations are clear and explicit, are understood by all postmasters, and, for the protection of the Government, must be complied with. Where an honest postmaster negligently fails to comply with same it is better that he should suffer loss than to establish a precedent that would nullify important provisions of our postal regulations and open the avenue of fraud to the thousands of post offices throughout the country.

The Government has no way of denying the amount of loss claimed by a postmaster. He could say that he had a thousand dollars in his safe when he didn't have a dollar; hence before any claim is ever allowed the postmaster should show that he complied with the rules and that the alleged loss was not the result of his own negligence.

The report of the Postmaster General shows that the alleged funds were taken from the safe without the use of force; that both the postmaster and the postmaster's daughter admitted that the inner door of the safe had not been locked; and that the combination of the safe had not been changed since its purchase. His conclusion is:

"The postmaster's failure to completely lock the safe in which stamps and funds were left at night and to change the combination, as required by regulation, was considered negligence within the meaning of the above-cited statute, and, following the established practice of the department, this claim was disallowed."

I respectfully submit that we should not repeal this law by allowing this claim.

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

[House Report No. 718, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session.]

MARIAN B. PATTERSON (H. R. 6486).

Mr. BLANTON, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following minority report:

Although all of my colleagues on the committee have voted to favorably report H. R. 6486 and pay to Marian B. Patterson $20,963 out of the Public Treasury, I regret that my duty as I see it under my oath of office will not permit me to do otherwise than to protest their action, and at the proper time I shall move to strike from the bill its enacting clause. I sincerely believe that if any Member will give this case the same careful study and investigation which I have given to it he will inevitably reach the conclusion I have formed, that the Government is not due one single dollar on this claim, and that it would be a great injustice to the people of the United States to take their money out of the Treasury and put it into Mrs. Patterson's pocket.

I submit that no evidence whatever of probative force has been filed in this case showing that Gen. Patterson suffered any loss. He was entitled to a salary of $5,000 per annum. He served about nine years, to wit, from some time in May, 1897, until about July, 1906. During that time he had in his custody funds of the United States from fees collected to the amount of $62,048.46, and the statement of the Government auditor from the Treasury Department, which I have just procured and will incorporate hereafter, shows that out of said Government funds Gen. Patterson retained for his salary the sum of $42,423.22, and the record further shows that in the beginning of his service, while receiving instruction and in transit, he received for salary the further sum of $1,928.34, and that in addition thereto he drew a draft on the Government for $1,115.70 to cover salary while under instruction prior to January 1, 1898, making a grand total of $45,467.26 received by him as salary for the little over nine years' service. In addition to the above the auditor shows that Gen. Patterson further retained $6,956.80, as compensation due him on agency fees collected; hence altogether he received from the Government as compensation for a little over nine years' service the sum of $52,424.06. And the auditor shows that during this time in Calcutta, the purchasing value of the rupee, at its commercial exchange value, upon which basis Gen. Patterson collected the fees and retained his salary, was 100 cents on the dollar, the same as if he had retained his pay in gold dollars. The record further shows that during said time the Government allowed Gen. Patterson the sum of $21,044.76 for contingent expenses, clerk hire, and relief of seamen.

[House Report 905, part 2, Sixty-fifth Congress, third session.]

ESTATE OF MOSES M. BANE.

Mr. BLANTON, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following minority views:

My colleagues on the Committee on Claims have favorably reported bill S. 2885, by which it is sought to pay out of the United States Treasury the sum of $1,080 to the heirs of Moses B. Bane, for money alleged to have been paid for office rent in Salt Lake City, Utah, during the years 1877–1879.

On January 11, 1882, the Commissioner of the General Land Office wrote to said Bane, among other things, the following:

"By reference to the records of this office it is found that no allowance has been made you for the office rent during the time specified, and your expenditures for that purpose were therefore unauthorized. Being unauthorized, you have no claim against the United States that this office can recognize, and I therefore have to decline to recommend the amount to Congress for appropriation as a claim for the fiscal years specified."

On February 4, 1882, the Secretary of the Interior rendered the following adverse decision against this claim:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 4, 1882.

SIR: I have received your report of the 1st instant on the claim of M. M. Bane, Esq. (presented by James H. Mandeville, Esq., of this city, in his letter of the 25th ultimo), for office rent as receiver of public moneys at Salt Lake City, Utah Territory, amounting to $1,080.

It appears that there was no allowance made by your office for such rent, and in the absence of such allowance Mr. Bane had no reason to suppose that it would be paid. There is no fund out of which it could be paid, and the claim can not be entertained by the department. You will so inform Mr. Mandeville and return to him the papers transmitted herewith.

Very respectfully, S. J. KIRKWOOD, Secretary.

In giving the facts connected with this case on January 23, 1909, Hon. James R. Garfield, then Secretary of the Interior, stated the following:

"Moses M. Bane was receiver of public moneys at Salt Lake City, Utah, during the calendar years 1877, 1878, and the first quarter of the calendar year 1879. During said period no allowance was made to the register and receiver at Salt Lake City for office rent. The appropriation for contingent expenses of land offices for the years named was not sufficient to pay rent for all the land offices and meet other necessary expenses of clerk hire, furniture, etc. The practice appears to have been to apportion the appropriation to the several land offices, allowing clerk hire in offices in which the compensation paid to register and receiver amounted to the maximum allowance of $3,000 each per annum, and rent in offices in which the compensation did not exceed $2,000 for each officer."

Under the regulations at that time, office rent was allowed only where the compensation received did not exceed $2,000 per annum. Where the compensation amounted to $3,000 per annum, expenses of clerk hire were allowed, but no amount was allowed for office rent, and it was incumbent upon the receiver to furnish his own office.

The following letter from the Interior Department shows conclusively that during this time said receiver, Moses M. Bane, drew compensation of $3,000 per annum, and during 1877 was allowed $1,750 for clerk hire, and during 1878 was allowed $1,400 for clerk hire; hence, under the law, was not entitled to any allowance for office rent:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 16, 1919.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: Reference is had to your letter of January 6, relating to a bill pending before Congress to pay to the heirs of Moses M. Bane the sum of $1,080 to cover certain money he was alleged to have paid out of his private funds for office rent at Salt Lake City, Utah, during the years 1877 and 1878, while receiver of public moneys. You submit four questions for answer, and they will be answered in the order submitted.

1. The records of the General Land Office show that Mr. Bane received $3,000 as compensation for each of the years ended December 31, 1877, and December 31, 1878.

2. This $3,000 was the total amount received for each year, and it was made up of $500 as regular salary and $2,500 allowed as fees and commissions received at the office.

3 and 4. An amount of $1,750 was paid as clerk hire for the year ended December 31, 1877, and an amount of $1,400 was paid as clerk hire for the year ended December 31, 1878.

The records do not show how much of the amount paid for clerical services was paid for service to the receiver separately from that rendered to the register. The amount paid was for necessary services rendered at the land office.

Cordially, yours,

ALEXANDER T. VOGELSANG,
Acting Secretary.

Moreover, this case was submitted to the Court of Claims, which on July 11, 1884, rendered the following adverse opinion:

"The conclusion of the court is that the claimant has no legal claim on the Department of the Interior for reimbursement of the money paid by him for office rent; and it is ordered that a copy of the finding of fact and of this opinion be transmitted to that department for its guidance and action."

I respectfully submit that this claim is without merit, and that not a dollar should be paid thereon.

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

[House Report No. 1042, Sixty-fifth Congress, third session.]

F. M. BARFIELD (H. R. 7253).

Mr. BLANTON submitted the following minority report:

I can not agree with my colleagues on the committee in favorably reporting this bill. From the report of Hon. Otto Praeger, Acting Postmaster General, dated May 18, 1916, concerning the payment of this claim, I call attention to the following:

"The evidence shows that the outer door of the safe in said post office was opened without the use of force. * * * The postmaster stated to the inspector he believed that he had locked the safe on the night before the burglary, but was not positive enough to make affidavit to that effect. He recalled several occasions on which he had failed to lock the safe, from the fact that he had found it open in the morning when he arrived at the office. It appears further that the postmaster purchased this safe at second hand, and that he never changed the combination of the lock, as required by section 356 of the Postal Laws and Regulations of 1902, which reads in part as follows:

"5. A postmaster upon taking charge of his office shall immediately change the combination on every safe therein, and where at any time a safe is procured, either new or second hand, he shall immediately change the combination. Failure to make such change shall be considered as prima facie evidence of contributory negligence on the part of the postmaster in any case where claim is made for credit for money or other property stolen from such safes which have been opened without resort to violence.

"The postmaster's failure to change the combination of his safe was considered negligence within the meaning of the statute cited, and for that reason, together with his inability to certify definitely that the safe had been locked, his claim was disallowed under date of January 18, 1910."

On December 19, 1918, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, bottom page 705, I made the following observation:

"I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that during the past fiscal year there were 664 claims made in the Post Office Department by 664 different postmasters, aggregating $98,966.40, which were allowed by the Postmaster General and paid, not claims made and disallowed but claims made and allowed by the Postmaster General."

If during the past fiscal year the Post Office Department approved and paid off claims of this character aggregating $98,966.40 made by 664 different postmasters, we can understand that when the Postmaster General disapproves and refuses to pay a claim, he has a very good reason for it.

In this particular case the postmaster was clearly guilty of negligence in two respects: First, in not changing the combination after purchasing his secondhand safe; and, secondly, in not closing the outside door with combination such as it would have required force to open it.

If we establish the precedent of allowing this claim, we can not refuse to allow hundreds of other claims made by postmasters that the Post Office Department has turned down because of a noncompliance with rules.

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

I respectfully submit this is my only means of getting these minority reports before the attention of my colleagues. It is well known that on Private Calendar day practically all Members leave the House, except the ones interested in some private bill and one who expects to get his bill passed hestitates to vote against another's bill, hence anyone who starts a fight against a bill on that day has his case tried by a stacked jury. On such bills only 200 copies of the report are printed, one-half going to the Senate, hence it is impossible to send a copy of a minority report to Members. By watchful attendance upon proceedings up to this time I have succeeded in preventing such bills from being taken up through unanimous consent and none of the bills against which I have filed minority reports has thus far passed.

I also desire to call attention to H. R. 4015 seeking to pay $1,000,000 to the McClintic-Marshall Construction Co. An attempt was made a year ago to favorably report this bill simply because it had been approved by Gen. Goethals.

Illustrating the fact that even great men may occasionally err in judgment, I call your attention to the bill H. R. 2913, which our great Secretary of the Interior had drawn and introduced April 13, 1917, as a war measure, asking Congress to give him $5,000,000 to farm with on behalf of the Government. Mine was the only dissenting vote in the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands against it, and since the bill is now dead and this $5.000,000 is saved no Member will now contend that it was a wise measure. I call attention to the following portion of my minority report against same:

[Report No. 107. July 14, 1917.]

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

Mr. BLANTON submitted the following minority views:

From the birth of this proposed legislation, I have fought in the committee a single-handed fight against certain of its features and provisions as being unwise, unnecessary, wasteful, extravagant, nonproductive of good, and wholly uncalled for even in the present war emergency.

To understand fully the merit of the objections to this bill it is necessary to review its history, and incidentally to remember that it is offered solely as an emergency war measure, and unless it is such it clearly has no standing.

In the form in which the original draft of this bill was first discussed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior it contained only two provisions for which an appropriation was deemed necessary; one to permit said Secretary to have cultivated all uncultivated public lands within reclamation projects, and the other to permit said Secretary to commandeer the private lands of individuals, forcibly take possession of same, where located within irrigation projects, and grub, clear, level, ditch, fence, improve, and cultivate the same on behalf of the Government, paying to the owners of such lands whatever compensation therefor as said Secretary should deem reasonable, and in the end charging the expense of all improvements to the owners, and holding their lands until the same was paid. For these purposes the original draft of the bill when first discussed in said Secretary's office provided for an appropriation of $2,000,000 to be reimbursed by the reclamation fund.

Before presenting the proposed measure to Chairman Taylor for introduction, however, Director Davis, of the Reclamation Service, without consulting the Secretary of the Interior or anyone else about it, on his own motion raised the proposed appropriation from $2,000,000 to $5,000,000, and thus the bill was introduced on April 13, 1917, as House bill 2913.

Director Davis considered the necessity for immediately enacting such provisions into law so urgent that on April 16, 1917, before the minority members of the committee had been officially named and the committee regularly organized, a few members of the committee were called together to give Director Davis a hearing on the bill before he left on a trip, and at this meeting it was agreed not to require the reclamation fund to reimburse the Treasury for said appropriation of $5,000,000.

Realizing the many obstacles that would certainly beset the Secretary of the Interior in any effort he might make to farm successfully at long range on behalf of the Government, from the beginning I obstinately fought these provisions of the bill.

* * * * * * *

I respectfully submit that this is no time for the Government of the United States to make such costly experiments or investments. * * *

I have heartily supported President Wilson in all of his war plans, and I intend to continue to heartily support him in all of his plans and policies for bringing about a successful termination of this war; but it can not be claimed that this is a plan or policy of the President, for up to the time this bill was reported out of the committee the President knew nothing of its provisions. It even can not be said that it is a plan or policy of the Secretary of the Interior, for, as above stated, all provisions requiring an appropriation were stricken out of said original bill, House bill 2913, and the sections now in the present bill requiring an appropriation were suggested by Dr. Mead as a means of expending the $5,000,000 appropriation left in the bill at the time said original idea of the Secretary was stricken out.

It is well recognized that the first and most substantial equity which a farmer of limited means obtains in raw land is the labor he expends in improving same—the grubbing, clearing, leveling, ditching, fencing, breaking—something he and members of his family in most instances accomplish by the sweat of their brow and without finances. * * *

Just now the United States is in debt. Each day it is growing deeper and deeper in debt. The people are soon to be taxed more heavily than ever dreamed of before in the history of our Nation. Thousands of people are now unable to make ends meet. For every five million here and five million there it will be necessary for us to add a greater burden upon the people who are patiently relying upon Congress to protect them. In such times it pays a Government, just as it does an individual or business establishment, to pause and ask the practical question, "Is it absolutely necessary?"

It must be kept in mind that the hearings before the committee developed the fact that from such lands practically no crop can be expected as a result of the first year's cultivation, that a very small crop may be expected the second year, and a still larger one the third year of cultivation.

* * * * * * *

By expending one-fifth of this proposed amount, in constructing the Red Bluff project on the Pecos River in New Mexico, several hundred thousand acres of fertile lands in the Pecos Valley of New Mexico and Texas would be made productive—not three years hence, but next year—and would be cultivated by willing farmers who are amply prepared to clear, cultivate, and improve the lands and harvest their crops without any special sugar coating on the part of the Government.

* * * * * * *

The people living in the Pecos Valley are prepared to demonstrate conclusively to the Reclamation Service that this proposed reservoir will hold like a jug, and that by constructing this dam and project it will redeem and reclaim several hundred thousand acres of fertile lands in the Pecos Valley in Texas and New Mexico which are now nonproductive merely for the want of water, and that during flood time ample water would be impounded to answer all requirements.

By using another one-fifth of this proposed appropriation in constructing a dam and project on the Colorado River in Mitchell, Coke, or Runnels County several hundred thousand acres more of fertile lands could be made productive, with ample labor, ready and willing, to cultivate and harvest bumper crops that would be certain with such water assured, and it would be wholly unnecessary for the Government to spend $5,000,000 such as is proposed by this bill.

If another one-fifth of this proposed appropriation were expended in constructing a dam and project on either the Concho, San Saba, or Llano River several hundred thousand more acres of fertile Texas lands could be made highly productive, with ample labor ready and willing to cultivate and harvest crops, and no $5,000,000 sugar coating by the Government would be necessary, as all on earth these good people ask is water. And we could then keep the remaining $2,000,000 in the Treasury.

Congress should see to it that during this war emergency at least all unnecessary waste of public money should stop. Our constituents have confidence in us and are relying upon us. They are going to demand an explanation from us next year.

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

I am indeed glad to note that Secretary Lane has expressed his approval of a plan to reclaim our semiarid lands by the erection of dams and irrigating systems and conserving the flood waters. It will mean much to western Texas.

Getting back to the McClintic-Marshall Construction Co. claim, after giving this case careful investigation I ascertained there was no merit in it. I requested a special hearing on it, and now quote a portion of the examination of one of the main representatives of the claimant from the printed committee hearings, to wit:

MCCLINTIC-MARSHALL CONSTRUCTION CO. CLAIM.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS,
Friday, May 3, 1918.

The committee met at 10 o'clock a. m., Hon. HUBERT D. STEPHENS (chairman) presiding.

The CHAIRMAN. We will now take up the McClintic-Marshall case.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, there are a few question I would like to ask.

The CHAIRMAN. Whom do you desire to interrogate first?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Sterrett.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENT OF MR. W. M. STERRETT.

Mr. BLANTON. Your company is not claiming anything more than the terms and provisions of this contract which they signed and executed would warrant, are they?

Mr. STERRETT. You mean claiming any more than was claimed before the committee?

Mr. BLANTON. Let us get our minds away from the committee and get back to the contract. Your company executed a contract with the commission to do certain work on Panama locks, did they not?

Mr. STERRETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Under that contract you were paid all that your contract provided for, were you not?

Mr. STERRETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Under the terms of the contract; and how much more were you paid by the Government?

Mr. STERRETT. I do not think any more.

Mr. BLANTON. Do you not know that your company was paid approximately $300,000 in cash more than the amount that the contract provided for by the Government?

Mr. STERRETT. No, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, that is a fact. If you will investigate it, you will find that is a fact, as shown by the warrants which your company has received and which are now in the Treasurer's office. Then, you are asking for approximately $1,000,000 here, now, more or less. If what I have said is true, then you are asking for that much money more than you have now been paid under your contract. Is that the fact?

Mr. STERRETT. I can not answer your question. I do not think that is correct.

Mr. BLANTON. On investigation you will find it is correct.

Mr. STERRETT. What I might say is that the contract was on a weight-price basis. Certain weights were assumed at the start, and on the basis of those assumed weights a lump sum was worked out, but we were paid later on the actual weight.

Mr. BLANTON. Do you not know that the contract provides for a weight basis, and that any weight of parts over and above that basis is to be paid for at the same rate of compensation as provided for in the contract? Do you not know that to be a fact?

Mr. STERRETT. Yes; that is in the contract.

Mr. BLANTON. And do you not know that the contract further provides for a certain percentage of weight over the weight provided for in the contract for which there is to be no extra compensation—weight of the various parts? That is a fact, is it not?

Mr. STERRETT. There is a provision in the contract that we can not vary beyond a certain percentage.

Mr. BLANTON. And that up to a certain percentage there shall be no extra compensation?

Mr. STERRETT. That is true.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not a fact that under the terms of that contract your company was to finish certain locks at a certain specified time? For instance, the Gatun Lock and the other two locks were to be finished at a certain specified time, were they not?

Mr. STERRETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not a fact that with respect to those locks and the time specified time was of the essence of that contract? You know what is meant by that legal term, do you not, essence of the contract?

Mr. STERRETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Time is of the essence of the contract?

Mr. STERRETT. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Time was of the essence of that contract with respect to the completion of those certain locks; is not that the fact?

Mr. STERRETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Do you not know it to be the fact, with respect to every single lock, that your company was behind to a considerable extent beyond the time specified in the contract? Was not that true in the case of every single one of them?

Mr. STERRETT. With the original contract that is correct.

Mr. BLANTON. So far as every contract is concerned, the original contract and every single supplemental contract, that is true, is it not?

Mr. STERRETT. No, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. It is not true?

Mr. STERRETT. No, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Have you investigated that lately and looked through those matters?

Mr. STERRETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Do you not know it to be a fact that this commission found that to be the fact?

Mr. STERRETT. No; it did not.

Mr. BLANTON. You say you did not?

Mr. STERRETT. I say they did not.

Mr. BLANTON. They did not?

Mr. STERRETT. They did not.

Mr. BLANTON. Of course, that is your opinion. Then, if, as a matter of fact, the commission did find that to be true, you are incorrect in your statement?

Mr. STERRETT. I suppose that I am.

Mr. BLANTON. That is a logical conclusion. Mr. Sterrett, is it not a fact that this Government, under its contract, acting through the Isthmian Commission, reserved the right to delay any single part or all of this work whenever it deemed it necessary?

Mr. STERRETT. I think there was a provision to that effect.

Mr. BLANTON. There was a specific provision with reference to that matter with only this reserving clause: That for whatever time the Government delayed any matter that time of delay was to be added to your time within which the work was to be completed?

Mr. STERRETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Did not the contract provide that there should be no damages whatever claimed by your company for the delays on the part of the Government in making investigations?

Mr. STERRETT. I can not answer that.

Mr. BLANTON. Are you not sufficiently familiar with your contract to answer that question?

Mr. STERRETT. I do not remember.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not a fact that this Government in this contract which you signed provided that it should have the right to make any change which its chief engineer deemed necessary at any time? Is it not a fact, and also that you should charge no extra compensation for any such change unless you at the very time that change was proposed, and before the work was done, should make a claim and have it understood and agreed upon by the Government at that time? Did not the contract provide for that?

Mr. STERRETT. That is correct.

Mr. BLANTON. And did not the contract further provide that unless you saw fit to exhaust your remedy provided for in the contract that you waived any claim for damages by reason of any change? Does not the contract specifically provide for that?

Mr. STERRETT. I do not know whether it says we waive it, but we are allowed no claim.

Mr. BLANTON. You make a claim here for certain material which you say is a better class of material than you were obligated to furnish. Is not that the fact?

Mr. STERRETT. No; there was no claim about the class of material. The claim was about the class of workmanship.

Mr. BLANTON. Are you sure that part of your claim does not embrace the charge that you furnished material of a better class than was provided for in the specifications?

Mr. STERRETT. No, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. But you do say that you furnished a better class of workmanship?

Mr. STERRETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Do you not know it to be the fact, Mr. Sterrett, that this contract provides that this Government is to have everything about this transaction first class, of the very best quality possible?

Mr. STERRETT. They are to have first-class workmanship.

Mr. BLANTON. There are two different clauses in the contract which specifically provide for that, for the very best.

Mr. STERRETT. First-class workmanship.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not that mean the best?

Mr. STERRETT. If they agree to pay for that.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the contract call for the best?

Mr. STERRETT. No, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. It does not?

Mr. STERRETT. No, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not want you to feel that I am antagonistic to you or your company, because whatever in this investigation the facts show the company is entitled to I expect to vote to the very last dollar and cent. I am merely trying to get the facts, and I want you to feel I am not antagonistic to you or your company, but am doing it merely from a sense of duty, and do not want to be in an attitude of trying to confuse you in any way.

Mr. Sterrett, is it not a fact that all along through this work from month to month certain changes did occur that were required, and did not your company at that time make any claim for extra compensation and by supplemental agreements such compensation was agreed to then and there, and they received payment for them from time to time?

Mr. STERRETT. No, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. There was nothing like that occurred? There was never any agreement as to any change in that contract for which you claimed and did receive compensation?

Mr. STERRETT. I do not remember.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I want to ask you why it was the Government paid, and you received, $300,000 more than the contract called for?

Mr. STERRETT. I explained that to you.

Mr. BLANTON. How?

Mr. STERRETT. On account of the weight running more than the original estimates.

Mr. BLANTON. Then you claim, if I understand you correctly, that all of this $300,000 that your company received more than the contract price was for extra weight of material? Do you claim that?

Mr. STERRETT. That is my remembrance of it. Of course, this is a pretty big contract, and there may be some changes I do not remember about, but I do not remember of any change in the contract. I think that is correct.

Mr. BLANTON. If you will study it carefully, you will find that you were incorrect about that. I just merely state that for your benefit. Is it not a fact that on no item which is embraced in your claim under consideration at this time did you at the time claim extra compensation and have it thrashed out at that time? Is not that a fact?

Mr. STERRETT. No; I think that is not correct.

Mr. EDMONDS. Make your question different.

Mr. BLANTON. I understand you to say, Mr. Sterrett, that there are some weight estimates in your claim under consideration where at the time you did claim compensation then and there, for which you have received no compensation?

Mr. STERRETT. Yes, sir; there are.

Mr. BLANTON. Please state to this committee what they are; please enlighten us on that question.

Mr. STERRETT. The water stops.

Mr. BLANTON. You did take them up at the time with the engineer and have an agreement and understanding in accordance with the specifications?

Mr. STERRETT. You did not ask that; you asked whether we claimed——

Mr. BLANTON (interrupting). I mean whether you complied with the terms of the contract by thrashing it out and having it understood at that time. Are there any points embraced in your claim that that occurred in connection with?

Mr. STERRETT. I think not.

Mr. LITTLE. What is the crucial point?

Mr. BLANTON. The contract provides that this company, where it claims extra compensation for any change made, or for any matter in connection with the construction of these locks, before it shall be entitled to any compensation other than that provided in the contract, must at the very time make a charge for extra compensation and damages to the chief engineer and have it thrashed out and agreed upon at that time; otherwise it shall be waived.

Mr. LITTLE. And that is in the contract?

Mr. BLANTON. And that is in the contract.

Mr. LITTLE. Do you claim that he concedes that he let that moment go by?

Mr. BLANTON. He says none of these items were claimed at that time and thrashed out.

Mr. LITTLE. Was there not in their opening statement some explanation of why that was done; and if so, I would like to have him explain that?

Mr. BLANTON. This is a very voluminous contract, but I would like to read certain portions of it into the record, to be taken in connection with this interrogation. This is the main contract that was signed and executed. It provides:

"It is further understood, covenanted, and agreed that the commission may delay the commencement of the erection of any or all of the gates and fixed parts for the reason that it has not completed the masonry or the fixed ironwork, or for any other reason it may deem sufficient to justify such action; and, if at any time the commission shall deem it necessary so to do, it may suspend the work of erection on any or all of the gates and fixed parts covered by this contract, in which case the contractor shall, without expense to the commission, properly cover over, secure, and protect such of the work as may be liable to sustain injury from the weather or otherwise. The commission may also direct the order in which the different gates and fixed parts in a given lock shall be erected, and it may require that any gate and the fixed parts necessary for same in any twin flight of locks shall be completely erected on or before a date fixed herein for the erection of any other gate in such twin flight of locks, and in such case the provisions of this contract relative to liquidated damages for delay shall subsist, take effect, and be enforceable in the same manner and to the same extent as if the date thus fixed was originally specified herein."

In that connection, is it not a fact that your company agreed that, for every day's delay over and above the time specified in the contract on any of these locks, they should respond to this Government in liquidated damages, so much for each day's delay?

Mr. STERRETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. It goes on:

"Provided, That in all such cases the contractor shall be granted an extension of time within which to complete the erection of any or all gates so delayed in erection, equal to the period of any delay caused by any such delays in the commencement of erection, suspension of work, or change of dates, but he shall not be entitled to any payment as additional compensation or as damages on account of any such suspension of work, delay in commencement of erection, or change in time or order of erection of gates."

The whole compensation was to be an extension of time in which he was to complete the work.

"ART. III. It is further understood, covenanted, and agreed that all materials and workmanship"—

Both materials and workmanship, mind you—

"used and applied under this contract, in details and finish, shall be first class and of the very best quality."

I want you to catch that, members of the committee, that everything, material, workmanship, everything shall be first class and of the very best quality.

Mr. MERRITT. What does it say right after that?

Mr. BLANTON. I will read all of it. It says:

"And that all materials, both in the form of raw materials, and at every stage of manufacture, and all workmanship shall, from the beginning to the end of the work, be subject to the inspection of the chief engineer of the commission, or his authorized representative, and that the commission's inspectors shall have free access at all time to any works where any raw materials or manufactured parts covered by this contract are located for the purpose of examining such raw materials or manufactured parts, and for the purpose of witnessing any and all processes of manufacture, and they shall have free access at all times to any and all parts of the erecting plant and all other parts of the work on the Isthmus."

There is a whole lot about inspection that you do not care about.

"It is further understood, covenanted, and agreed that the commission's inspectors may at any time reject any or all work or material not in accordance with this contract, and the right to reject any and all defective work or material shall continue until final inspection and acceptance and payment for material and work herein provided for, regardless of any prior inspection, payment, or act of the commission, and such defective or unsatisfactory material or work shall be promptly removed, remedied, or replaced by the contractor without expense to the commission."

Then there is a penalty for the contractor refusing to do that.

"ART. IV. The contractor shall prepare and submit to the commission in duplicate all necessary working drawings"— and so on. Then it says:

"The approval of such drawings shall be taken as certifying only to the general agreement of the working drawings with the contract plans as to arrangement and sizes of the principal members, but shall not relieve the contractor from full responsibility for the correctness of his shop drawings, for errors in details, such as rivet spacing, clearances, packing of plates, etc., which might interfere with either the strength or appearance of the finished work or with accurate and speedy erection.

"The contractor shall be solely responsible"— and so on. There are two other clauses:

"The commission, however, reserves the right to make any minor changes it may see fit to make in the original contract drawings, the working plans, and specifications for material and workmanship prior to the final acceptance of any part of the finished material: Provided, however, That for any extra expense incurred by the contractor for material furnished or ordered, drawings made, or work executed prior to the time of receiving notice of such change, the contractor shall be reimbursed at reasonable rates to be fixed, in any case, by agreement between the contracting parties."

Notice particularly this clause:

"Any claim for such changes shall be made by the contractor at the time of the change or no allowance will be made or money paid on account of the same. The contractor shall also furnish the commission"— and so on. That is brought forth in an additional article in this contract specifically:

"ART. X. The contractor agrees to make no claim for compensation for any work, labor, or materials over and above that specified or called for in the contract, specifications, and plans, unless same shall have been agreed upon in writing by the parties to the contract before such work shall have been commenced or the labor or materials furnished."

Mr. BLANTON. I want to give you an opportunity to get yourself right in the record, because I do not want to take advantage of you in your absence when we take the matter up. You stated in answer to my question that all of this $300,000 extra compensation was for extra weight in parts, and that at no time did you make extra claims, and that they have been adjudicated and agreed upon and you have received compensation for them. I want you to get right on that. I have here before me copies of supplemental agreements certified to Mr. J. L. Baity, who is Auditor for the War Department, which are probably familiar to you, and some of them are known as supplemental contract, dated June 15, 1911. This contract was dated June 21, 1910?

Mr. STERRETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Here is a supplemental contract of June 15, 1911, a year after the original contract. Here is another of December 16, 1911, which is nearly a year and a half after the original contract. Here is a supplemental agreement of February 7, 1912; here is another of June 13, 1912; here is another of January 14, 1913; here is another one of May 20, 1913, nearly three years after the original contract. Do you still maintain before this committee that you did not raise claims and have supplemental agreements and receive certain extra compensation under those? Do you still maintain that before the committee, after I call your attention to these?

Mr. STERRETT. The best I can say is that I have answered as far as I know. I think Judge Harrah can answer that.

Mr. BLANTON. Judge Harrah is supposed to represent the Government, and I am asking you as one of the interested parties whose claim we have up before us for consideration. You are asking us to take a million dollars of the people's money in time of war out of the Treasury and pay you on the contract, and I am interrogating you about that claim.

Mr. STERRETT. All I can tell you with reference to those supplemental agreements is what I have answered.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not believe under the terms of this contract that this company is entitled to one single dollar. I think that when they were paid the $300,000 they were paid more than the contract price, and they were paid every cent that was due them.

The full contract compensation was $5,374,474.82, the compensation provided for in the contract, the amount certified to by J. L. Baity, Auditor for the War Department, who says:

"In compliance with your indorsement of the 23d instant, on letter of Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON, M. C., of the Committee on Claims, dated April 22, 1918, received at 2 p. m., the 24th instant, and which is returned herewith, requesting statement of total amount paid the McClintic-Marshall Construction Co. by the Isthmian Canal Commission under contract dated June 21, 1910 (W. O. 23444), for constructing lock gates for the Panama Canal, and supplemental contracts thereto, and copies of the contracts and circular, I have the honor to report that the total amount paid the contracting company under said contracts as shown by vouchered payments in this office was $5,753,725.63, from which may be deducted for one shipment lost, which was refunded and later replaced, $77,538.66, leaving net amount paid on this contract of $5,676,186.97."

Now, taking the contract consideration of $5,374,474.82 from the net amount paid on this contract of $5,676,186.97, there is a balance of $301,712.15 over and above the contract consideration that was paid.

I shall endeavor to prevent any of the above claims being passed, and I will appreciate my colleagues giving same their careful consideration, so that they may vote intelligently upon such bills should they be called up for passage.

Omnibus War-Claim Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM GORDON,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 10, 1919.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, under the unanimous consent granted to me I print in the RECORD the following correspondence relative to the omnibus war-claims bill, and also the following decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in relation to the same subject, found in Two hundred and sixteenth United States, page 494:

CLEVELAND, February 6, 1919.

Congressman WILLIAM GORDON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: There will be introduced in Congress in the near future a bill affording relief to contractors who had contracts for the erection of Federal buildings in different parts of the country at the time war was declared against Germany. Because of war conditions work on these buildings was seriously interfered with by the Government, and they were completed, or are being completed, at a heavy financial loss to the contractors.

This work was considered nonessential; and as restrictions were placed upon all building materials by the War Industries Board for so-called nonessential work, progress on this work was impossible.

In addition to this, many of these buildings were adjacent to the large cantonments, nitrate plants, shipyards, etc., which was necessary construction brought on by war conditions, requiring all available labor.

The object of the bill is to reimburse these unfortunate contractors for actual increased costs occasioned by the activities of the Government during the war, and is not intended to allow them any profit that might have accrued under ordinary conditions.

The Government is receiving these buildings, even if the relief is granted, at a greatly reduced cost, and the relief may save many reputable contractors from bankruptcy.

We would ask that you, in the interest of all contractors and the construction industry as a whole, consider this bill most seriously. We believe that the extensions granted to contractors involved in this work are only fair and equitable. The contractors came to the support of the Government in the war emergency most loyally and handled the problem put to them in a way that excited the admiration of the entire country. Those who were not employed on Government work did not quibble because of their total inactivity, due to the total stoppage of all nonessential work by the Government.

The Government looks to the building industry first to secure a resumption of peace-time business. The efforts of every locality are now devoted to stimulate building construction.

The building industry always has been the thermometer of the condition of the country. An industry of such importance is worthy, we feel, of your support and assistance, required now because of the development of conditions absolutely unforeseen.

Very truly, yours,

THE CROWELL-LUNDOFF-LITTLE CO.
A. R. MCCREARY,
Vice President and General Manager.

FEBRUARY 9, 1919.

The CROWELL-LUNDOFF-LITTLE CO.,
Euclid Avenue at Fifty-seventh Street,
Cleveland, Ohio.

GENTLEMEN: I have your letter of the 6th instant, in which you say that a bill will be introduced affording relief to contractors on Government work who have been interfered with by the Government since war was declared against Germany.

The bill will receive my careful consideration, but I would not be entirely frank with you if I did not say that in my judgment no legislation on such a subject of the "omnibus" variety, that is, covering all Government contracts, ought to be enacted by Congress, and in my opinion each case of the kind referred to by you ought to be presented in a separate bill and the facts and circumstances surrounding it considered on their merits.

The principal reason, which will readily occur to those familiar with our form of Government, is that there is no legal basis for any such claims, and a law which would be just to the contractor and to the Government in one case might be wholly inappropriate and unjust in another; furthermore, blanket authority to settle and adjust such claims would involve the delegation by Congress to some executive department or to some commission or person a function which belongs only to Congress and might result in payment out of the Public Treasury of large sums in damages resulting from the exercise of unauthorized, arbitrary, or unlawful powers by executive officials and others assuming to act in their name or behalf.

Not all loss and damage resulting from war can properly be made the basis of a claim against the Public Treasury.

The House of Representatives recently rejected by a vote of more than 3 to 1 one of these omnibus bills authorizing one of the executive departments to settle, adjust, and pay alleged claims of some citizens who had engaged in the business of opening and operating mines for the production of certain minerals. It appeared that one of the departments, anticipating a shortage in these minerals, called a convention last summer of those owning or controlling lands upon which they could be found, and as a result of this conference legislation was recommended and enacted by Congress authorizing the President, upon a finding by him that a shortage actually existed in any of these minerals, to contract for the opening and operation of mines for their production, and authorized the appropriation of $50,000,000 for the purpose.

No shortage was ever found or proclaimed by the President to exist, and for that reason the legislation never became operative; but a large number of claims have been presented for producing, or attempting to produce, these minerals, and it was proposed to give blanket authority to one of the executive departments for the allowance and payment of these claims.

Some of them may be meritorious, and if they are the claimants may present them on their merits by separate bills, and they will no doubt be allowed and paid; but no general legislation ought to be enacted to permit the payment of claims of this character.

In the case of the United States against Behan (110 U. S., 338) the Supreme Court of the United States announced the correct and only safe policy of those who assert a contract with or claim against the Government in the following words:

> It is the duty of persons dealing with public officials to inform themselves of the power of such officials to bind the Government.

Last summer the War Department caused the arrest of many thousands of citizens in the United States in a general man hunt for persons who had evaded the draft law by failing to register. A few hundreds of them were found to have violated the law, but all were imprisoned and detained until they could prove their innocence.

These arrests were in direct violation of the Constitution of the United States, which prohibits the seizure and imprisonment of a citizen except upon warrant, supported by oath or affirmation to facts showing probable cause. Every person, with the possible exception of the soldiers used, connected with these unlawful arrests, including the officials who ordered, procured, or induced them to be made, is liable in damages on a suit for false imprisonment to these thousands of citizens so unlawfully arrested and imprisoned. Would anyone seriously contend that damages to these citizens, so unlawfully arrested and imprisoned, should be paid out of the Public Treasury because men holding public office ordered or were concerned in them?

The Government is not liable, either legally or morally, for the unlawful acts of public officials; and to condone such official misconduct by the payment of damages out of the Public Treasury to the persons injured would lend aid and encouragement to violence and public disorder on the part of public officials, and would be contrary to public policy.

The political party which will come into power in both branches of Congress on March 4 next has a very strong predilection for the creation of commissions. When men in public office desire to evade official responsibility for neglect or misconduct affecting the public interests they usually appoint a commission to absorb and divide the odium.

Resort to commissions is generally usual when it is desired to pay out public money on doubtful legal ground, and damage claims arising out of a state of war are the fruitful source of these commissions, and I am very much opposed to them and to the delegation of official authority generally.

For these reasons and others not enumerated I shall oppose any bill conferring authority on any commission or person to allow and pay war claims against the Government.

If necessary to ascertain the facts in a given case, it may be sent to the Court of Claims, created by Congress for that purpose.

Yours, truly,

WILLIAM GORDON.

[William Cramp and Sons Ship and Engine Building Company v. United States. Appeal from the Court of Claims. No. 92. Argued January 19, 20, 1910. Decided February 28, 1910.]

Executive officers are not authorized to entertain and settle claims for unliquidated damages.

The Secretary of the Navy had power under the acts of June 10, 1896, c. 361, 29 Stat., 378, authorizing the building of the Alabama, and of August 3, 1886, c. 849, 24 Stat., 215, to make a change in the terms of the contract requiring a final release to be given so that such release should not include claims arising under the contract which he did not have jurisdiction to entertain, and under a proviso in the release to that effect the contractors are not barred from prosecuting their claim before the Court of Claims for unliquidated damages.

In this case a provision in a Government contract having been treated by both parties as impracticable and therefore waived, the Secretary had power to change the terms of the release required by the contract, and leave the claims of the contractor to be presented to the Court of Claims. (Cramp & Sons v. United States, 206 U. S., 118, distinguished.)

Under the Tucker Act the Court of Claims has jurisdiction of a claim for unliquidated damages under a contract for building a war vessel, where a release had been given by the Secretary of the Navy with a proviso that it does not include claims arising under the contract other than those of which the Secretary has jurisdiction.

43 C. Cl. 202, reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James H. Hayden, with whom Mr. Robert C. Hayden was on the brief, for appellant.

The contract did not obligate the claimant to relinquish the claim in suit, or any other claims that might accrue to it for breach of the contract by the United States. The contract itself was not a release of such claims. The acceptance by the claimant of the last payment did not create a bar to the claimant's right of action for the breach committed by the United States.

Performance by the Government of its covenant to supply armor failing, the builder's agreement to release went with it. "If part of the consideration agreed on be not performed, the whole accord fails." (City of Memphis v. Brown, 20 Wall., 289; Bank v. Leech, 94 Fed. Rep., 310; 1 Smith's Leading Cases, 5th Am. ed., 445.)

The elaborate and tautological expressions contained in the fifth paragraph of the release do not overcome the particular words of limitation contained in the proviso, which limited the operation of the release to claims which the Secretary of the Navy had jurisdiction to entertain. (Texas &c. R. Co. v. Dashiell, 198 U. S., 521.)

The Secretary of the Navy and the Cramp Company were correct in the opinion expressed by the former and acquiesced in by the latter that the claim being one for unliquidated damages is of a kind the department has no authority under the law to entertain. By the saving clause which was finally included in the release they adopted apt words to carry out their purpose to leave the claim in suit open and unsettled. Executive officers of the Government can not entertain such claims, even when they grow out of contracts made by them. (Op. Atty. Gen., ed. 1841, 882. See also McKee v. United States, 12 C. Cl., 514, 555; Power v. United States, 18 C. Cl., 263, 275; McClure v. United States, 19 C. Cl., 18, 28; Brannen v. United States, 20 C. Cl., 219, 223; Pneumatic Gun Carriage Co. v. United States, 36 C. Cl., 627, 630.)

To give the release or the claimant's acceptance of the last payments the effect claimed for them by the Government and given them by the court below would be to use them in a way not justified by the terms of the release or intended by the parties and would allow the Government to commit a fraud. (Parmlee v. Lawrence, 44 Illinois, 405, 409; Fire Ins. Assn. v. Wickham, 141 U. S., 564, 576, 582.) If the terms of the release were obscure, which they are not, it would have to be interpreted in such a way as to carry out the intent of the parties, to be ascertained from the correspondence which passed between them. (United States v. Peck, 102 U. S., 64; Merriam v. United States, 107 U. S., 437, 441; United States v. Gibbons, 109 U. S., 200, 203; Chicago &c. R. Co. v. Denver &c. R. Co., 143 U. S., 596, 609; Nash v. Towne, 5 Wall., 689, 699.)

The Secretary had legislative authority to make a contract for the construction of the vessel in question, and while this was limited in some particulars, it was broad. He was as free to exercise his judgment in the modification of the contract as to the release as he was to make the contract in the beginning. (United States v. Barlow, 184 U. S., 123; Solomon v. United States, 19 Wall., 17; Redfield v. Windom, 137 U. S., 636.) This case is not governed by United States v. Wm. Cramp & Sons, 206 U. S., 118, known as the "Indiana" case.

It was the builder's right and obviously it was for the best interest of the United States, as well as its own, to proceed with the work as best it could, complete it, and sue for damages caused by the breach. (2 Parsons on Contracts, 679; Clark v. United States, 6 Wall., 543; United States v. Speed, 8 Wall., 77; United States v. Behan, 110 U. S., 338, 344; Figh v. United States, 8 C. Cl., 319; Myerle v. United States, 33 C. Cl., 1; Cornwall v. Henson, 2 Ch. (1900), 298, 300; Hudson on Building Contracts, 1907, 303, 524; Stubbings Co. v. Exposition Co., 110 Ill. App., 210; Nelson v. Pickwick Co., 30 Ill. App., 333; Del Genovese v. Third Ave. R. R. Co., 13 N. Y. App. Div., 412; S. C., 162 N. Y., 614.)

Mr. Assistant Attorney General John Q. Thompson and Mr. Franklin W. Collins for the United States:

The proviso is not sufficient to confer upon appellant right of recovery.

The failure of the delivery of the armor by the Government within the times and in the order required to carry on the work properly had been fully provided for in the contract in other ways and had nothing whatever to do either as consideration or otherwise with the release which was required by the contract. While the contract itself may not be a release of such claims as those in suit, it nevertheless provided for a release of all claims growing out of the contract. (Texas &c. R. Co. v. Dashiell, 198 U. S., 521.)

While the Secretary of the Navy may have power to direct the modification of a contract during the progress of the work, he has not after his discretionary powers have ceased and only a plain ministerial duty remains. The Secretary was clothed with authority to close the contract in a prescribed manner. He could not make the final payment until a full and final release of all claims was given by the contractor, neither could he modify or change the form of release required by the contract; but this does not conflict with the exercise of his discretionary powers in respect to changes and modifications while the work was in progress.

The courts will not assume to make a contract for the parties which they did not choose to make for themselves. (Morgan County v. Allen, 103 U. S., 515; Hudson Canal Co. v. Penna. Coal Co., 8 Wall., 276; Gavinzel v. Crump, 22 Wall., 308; Robbins v. Rollins, 127 U. S., 633; Culliford v. Gonillo, 128 U. S., 158); nor is the court at liberty either to disregard words used by the parties or to insert words which the parties have not made use of. (Harrison v. Fortlage, 161 U. S., 63; Calderon v. Atlas Steamship Co., 170 U. S., 280.)

Contracts are to be construed according to the intention of the parties as expressed therein, and the courts will disregard the motives, the purposes, or the expectations of a party thereto if these are not in harmony with the plain import of the words used. (See 54 Texas, 65; Clark v. Lillie, 34 Vermont, 405; Noyes v. Nichols, 28 Vermont, 159; Conn v. Lewis, 15 Kentucky, 66; Hildreth v. Forrest, 27 Kentucky, 217; Shultz v. Johnson, 44 Kentucky, 497; Salmon Falls Mfg. Co. v. Portsmouth Co., 46 N. H., 249.)

Mr. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion of the court.

On September 24, 1896, the appellant entered into a contract with the United States for the building of an ironclad, afterwards known as the Alabama. The contract was authorized by act of Congress of June 10, 1896, c. 399, 29 Stat., 361, 378. Under this act and that of August 3, 1886, c. 849, 24 Stat., 215, to which it refers, the Secretary of the Navy was charged with the duty of supervising the contract on behalf of the United States. After the completion of the vessel and the payment of the stipulated amount there was something asserted to be due to the building company as unliquidated damages on account of extra work caused by the United States, for which it brought suit in the Court of Claims. That court found the amount to be $49,792.66. Relying upon the decision of this court in a case between the same parties for also the building of an ironclad, the Indiana (United States v. Wm. Cramp & Sons Co., 206 U. S., 118), the Court of Claims rendered judgment for the defendant. The controversy in this, as in the prior case, turns upon the effect of a release. In that it was in this form:

"The William Cramp and Sons Ship and Engine Building Company, represented by me, Charles H. Cramp, president of said corporation, does hereby for itself and its successors and assigns, and its legal representatives, remise, release, and forever discharge the United States of and from all and all manner of debts, dues, sum and sums of money, accounts, reckonings, claims, and demands whatsoever, in law or in equity, for or by reason of, or on account of, the construction of said vessel under the contract aforesaid."

Here the same terms of release are used, but they are followed by this proviso:

"Provided, That this release shall not be taken to include claims arising under the said contract other than those which the Secretary of the Navy had jurisdiction to entertain."

That release was executed on May 18, 1896; this on April 19, 1901. We held that the former release settled all disputes between the parties as to claims "under or by virtue" of the contract. Evidently the proviso was incorporated with the purpose of accomplishing some change in the effect of the release. That purpose is disclosed by prior correspondence. On February 13, 1901, the Secretary of the Navy, answering a letter enclosing a claim for extra work of $66,973.23, writes:

"I have to state that while, from a casual consideration of the matter, it might seem proper that the papers should be referred to the bureaus concerned for examination and report, it appears, after a careful consideration of the subject, that the claim, being for unliquidated damages, is of a kind the department has no authority under the law to entertain."

To which the company replied, suggesting this proviso:

"Provided, That nothing herein shall operate as a waiver of this company's right to sue for and recover judgment in the Court of Claims for damages incurred or losses sustained by the company in the prosecution of the contract work which were occasioned by delays or defaults on the part of the United States"— and adding, in response to the statement of the Secretary—

"that the claim being for unliquidated damages, is of a kind the department has no authority under the law to entertain"; that the act of March 3, 1887, c. 359, 24 Stat., 505, known as the Tucker Act, vests the Court of Claims with jurisdiction to hear and determine such claims. Some further correspondence followed between the parties, which culminated in a letter from the company, enclosing the release as finally executed, and saying:

"This (release) contains a clause which excepts from the operation of the release claims arising under the contract, which you, as Secretary of the Navy, had not jurisdiction to entertain."

It is well understood that executive officers are not authorized to entertain and settle claims for unliquidated damages. Opinion of Attorney General Taney, in which he says:

"If the Navy commissioners have refused to take the bread from Mr. Stiles, according to their contract, when he had prepared it of the quality called for by the agreement, it is not in the power of the executive branch of the Government to liquidate and pay the damages he may have sustained. If he has been damnified by the officers of the Government, Congress alone can redress the injury." (Opinions, ed. 1841, p. 882; McKee v. United States, 12 C. Cl., 504, 555–558.)

In Power v. United States (18 C. Cl., 263, 275), the court thus discussed the matter:

"The Secretary of the Interior concurred in the opinion that the claimant was equitably entitled to damages and that he should be invited to furnish proof of the extent of his injury, but did not agree that the damages could be adjusted in the department. He proposed to submit the case to Congress.

"In this conclusion that the department had no authority to settle such a claim the Secretary was right. The laws regulating the payment of money from the Treasury, in the current business of the Government, are reviewed at length by our brother Richardson in his opinion in McKee's Case (12 Ct. Cl. R., 555). He shows clearly that the laws provide only for the settlement and payment of accounts. An account is something which may be adjusted and liquidated by an arithmetical computation. One set of Treasury officers examine and audit the accounts. Another set is entrusted with the power of reviewing that examination, and with the further power of determining whether the laws authorize the payment of the account when liquidated. But no law authorizes Treasury officials to allow and pass in accounts a number not the result of arithmetical computation upon a subject within the operation of the mutual part of a contract.

"Claims for unliquidated damages require for their settlement the application of the qualities of judgment and discretion. They are frequently, perhaps generally, sustained by extraneous proof, having no relation to the subjects of the contract, which are common to both parties, as, for instance, proof concerning the number of horses and the number of wagons and the length of time that would have been required in performing a given amount of transportation. The results to be reached in such cases can in no just sense be called an account, and are not committed by law to the control and decision of Treasury accounting officers.

"As is well said by Judge Richardson, in the opinion already referred to (12 C. Cl., 556), this construction 'would exclude claims for unliquidated damages founded on neglect or breach of obligations or otherwise, and so, by the well-defined and accepted meaning of the word "account" and the sense in which the same and the words "accounting" and "accounting officers" appear to be used in the numerous sections of the numerous acts of Congress wherein they occur, it would seem that the accounting officers have no jurisdiction of such claims except in special and exceptional cases, in which it has been expressly conferred upon them by special or private acts. And such has been the opinion of five Attorneys General—all who have officially advised the executive officers on the subject. Attorney General Taney, in 1832, whose opinion is referred to by his successors in office; Attorney General Nelson, in 1844 (4 Opins., 327); Attorney General Clifford, in 1847 (4 Opins., 627); Attorney General Cushing, in 1854 (6 Opins., 524); and Attorney General Williams, in 1872 (14 Opins., 24). And the same views were expressed by this court in 1866 (Carmack et al. v. United States, 2 Ct. Cl. R., 126, 140).' (McClure v. United States, 19 Id., 28–29; Brannen v. United States, 20 Id., 219, 223–224; 4 Opin. Attorneys General, 327–328; Id., 626, 630.)"

But it is contended that the contract, independently of the release, provided for a settlement of all matters growing out of the delay in the completion of the vessel, although this is in apparent conflict with the opening statement of the Government in its brief, for there it says: "The issue here is whether the proviso in that release saves the contractor from the final and complete surrender of his right to recover on the claims set out in the petition." But this, although it indicates the views of the Government of the question at issue, does not preclude it from presenting other matters, and it insists that by the third clause in the contract the vessel, when completed without the armor, was to be subjected to a trial provided for in a subsequent clause of the contract, and a board of naval officers appointed by the Secretary of the Navy was to determine the deduction from the total price of the vessel under the contract if completed with armor. It further contends that by the ninth clause of the contract the matter of possible delay was recognized by the Secretary of the Navy, and his determination as to the effect thereof was to be conclusive. Now, it may be said that both the contractor and the Government had the right to insist upon the delivery of the vessel when it was completed without the armor and that the deduction in price should then be settled by the board of officers appointed by the Secretary. It may also be conceded that the Government could have insisted upon a release in the form specified in the contract, but neither the company nor the Government insisted on the delivery of the vessel at the time it was launched and before it was armored. The Government left the vessel with the company, waiting for armor to be put on—armor which it had not then been able to secure and tender to the company—and when the question arose as to a settlement it did not insist upon a release, as specified in the contract. This contract was plainly treated by both parties as impracticable, and therefore waived. Evidently from his letter of February 13, 1901, the Secretary was of the opinion that, equitably, there was something due to the company, and yet, realizing that that question was not one for his determination, in order that full justice might be done, he consented to a change in the terms of the release, and this he had power to do. (Salomon v. United States, 19 Wall., 17; United States ex rel. Redfield v. Windom, 137 U. S., 636; United States v. Barlow, 184 U. S., 123, 135.)

By the Tucker Act jurisdiction is conferred upon the Court of Claims "to hear and determine * * * all claims * * * for damages, liquidated or unliquidated, in cases not sounding in tort."

It results therefrom that a release executed in accordance with the terms of the contract would have extinguished all claims of the company against the United States growing out of the contract (206 U. S., 118); that the Secretary of the Navy had no power to pass upon and adjudicate claims for unliquidated damages; that he had power to accept a release such as was given, and that the proviso left for determination in the courts claims for unliquidated damages growing out of the contract; that under the Tucker Act the Court of Claims had jurisdiction to inquire into and determine claims for unliquidated damages, and that upon the facts found there is due to the company from the United States for extra work caused by the United States the sum of $49,792.66.

The judgment of the Court of Claims is reversed and the case remanded to that court with instructions to enter judgment for that amount (216 U. S., 494).

Cultivation of Clay Soils.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM GORDON,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 10, 1919.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me I print the following correspondence relative to the cultivation of clay soil:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, BUREAU OF SOILS.
Washington, D. C., February 3, 1919.

Hon. WILLIAM GORDON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Your letter of January 9, requesting that information relative to the improvement of clay soils be sent to Mr. L. H. Reed, Cleveland, Ohio, was duly received. I inclose herewith a copy of our letter to your constituent.

Very truly, yours,

MILTON WHITNEY,
Chief of Bureau.

(Inclosure.)

FEBRUARY 3, 1919.

Mr. L. H. REED,
3315 West Ninety-seventh Street, Cleveland, Ohio.

DEAR SIR: Your Congressman, Hon. WILLIAM GORDON, has requested that you be given information regarding the improvement of clay soils. I regret that we have no publication dealing specifically with this subject, but in a general way I may say that while in many cases clay soils are extremely difficult to till and require more artificial drainage lines to the given area than the loams and sandy loams, they are among the most productive soils in the world when properly and intelligently handled. Clay soils are usually improved by the introduction into them of an abundance of organic matter, applied either in the form of stable manure or as green crops turned under. Such legumes as clover, field peas, vetch, or even rye, are used for green manuring. The application of 400 or 500 pounds of slaked burned lime to the acre is of advantage in connection with the plowing down of green matter, operating to hasten decomposition and at the same time to correct the acidity of the soil due to the effect of the green matter. When the soil is known to be previously acid, a ton of lime to the acre will in general not be too much. The presence of the vegetable matter not only furnishes plant food but serves to break up the dense structure of the soil and make it more loamy and porous.

Unless there is sufficient slope to the land to provide for adequate surface drainage it is especially essential that tile drains or open ditches be installed, as otherwise the subsoil soon becomes water-logged on account of the slowness with which the excess of water escapes through the relatively dense, impervious material. Even moderate rolling land oftentimes is benefited by tile drainage.

In the tillage of clay land the plowing should be fairly deep or the subsoil plow should be used to break up the deeper soil and subsoil material. The depth of plowing should not be increased more than about an inch at any one time, however, as raw subsoil is unfitted to sustain plant life. It requires to be weathered and mixed with organic matter and the necessary bacterial organisms allowed to develop before a normal state of fertility can be said to exist. Considerable care must be exercised in the tillage of clay soils so that they will work up in a fairly mellow condition without the formation of too many intractable clods. They should be worked when in a state of moisture between that when the material is wet enough to be greasy in character and so dry as to resist the pulverizing action of farm tools. The range in point of time when clay soils can be successfully worked is much narrower than in the case of loams and lighter textured soils.

Clay soils are most successfully used for the production of small grains, as wheat and barley, and for such hay grasses as timothy and red top. Among truck crops cabbage does well on heavy soils.

Very truly, yours,

———— ————,
Chief of Bureau.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN JACOB ROGERS,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 11, 1919.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to print a description written by my colleague, Hon. WILLIAM H. CARTER, of the journey to France and the battle fields of the war, from which he returned a fortnight ago. I believe that his observations and conclusions are most valuable and will be of great interest not only to the membership of this House but to the general public. They represent the views of one who had exceptional opportunities, and who brought to the opportunities the trained powers of a skilled observer.

TRIP OF HON. WILLIAM H. CARTER, OF MASSACHUSETTS.

[Principal points: Arrival of President Wilson at Paris; visit to the Twenty-sixth Division; visit to home of Joan of Arc; visit to St. Mihiel and Seichprey; visit to Verdun; trips around Paris; visit to Tours; salvage plant, Gievres, and aviation center; visit to Bordeaux, docks, warehouses, hospitals; visit to the embarkation camp at Bordeaux.]

In order to gain some first-hand information regarding the tremendous projects of the American Expeditionary Forces, I made the trip to France. I found upon my arrival that it was a physical impossibility to visit all of the activities of our Government abroad, and for that reason it was necessary for me to limit my trip to some of the largest projects. I was especially interested in going over the ground where the Twenty-sixth Division had fought. This division, made up of the National Guard from New England, of which hundreds of boys came from my own congressional district, has more than upheld the traditions of that section of the country. One of the highest tributes that can be paid this division is that the Germans considered it one of the two best divisions that it fought against, and the French have announced that it is one of our four best divisions in France. This was the first complete division to arrive in France.

I was accompanied on my trip after my arrival in Paris by my former secretary in Washington, Jack S. Connolly, a member of the Twenty-sixth Division, who volunteered and served with that division at St. Mihiel and Verdun, but who at the end of the war was sent to Bordeaux to do some special work for the War Department.

I was in Paris the day that President Wilson arrived and witnessed the welcome that was given him. Early in the morning the crowds began to gather in the city. A holiday had been proclaimed all over France, and everywhere the American flags were mingled with the tricolor of France, and huge signs of "Vive Wilson" were erected in all sections of the city. Swarms of Americans filled the boulevards and mingled with their brethren of the allied countries.

It is very hard to estimate the number of visitors who thronged into Paris to witness the President's arrival. They were gathered by tens of thousands along the streets leading from the station to his hotel. Groups of men and boys even climbed trees in order to get a view of our Chief Magistrate, and in windows along the route every available inch of space was taken up. From the moment the President's train arrived until he reached his hotel there was a continued firing of salutes from the big guns. Small American flags were worn on the coats of everybody.

One significant sight was at the Place de la Concorde, where the captured cannon had been placed. Young girls climbed on these guns, and waving American flags presented a scene not to be forgotten. As the President passed the crowd cheered and waved handkerchiefs and banners. Whistles were blown, bands played, and the President was given a welcome by the French people as only Paris can give.

All day long the people celebrated and enjoyed themselves. Probably the most interesting to an American were the sights on the boulevards that evening. Thousands of men, women, and children thronged the streets. Games were played, and the favorite stunt seemed to be for the women to kiss all Americans. They insisted on kissing them twice, once on each cheek. A staid old American colonel seemed to resent a number of French girls stopping him, and he was immediately pounced upon by 20 young ladies, and before he was through he was properly kissed. Scenes of this sort were common that night. Cannon were taken from the Concorde and pulled through the boulevards by the soldiers. On each gun were probably a half dozen pretty girls singing and shouting and waving banners. Every time a taxicab came in sight the crowd gathered around and insisted upon rocking it until the occupants were given a good shaking up or were forced to walk.

One of the things that I noticed especially was that, unlike the celebrations in our own country, our American men and officers behaved themselves and there was no drunkenness. Our soldiers have been permitted to buy light wines and beers during certain hours of the day in France, and it is an established fact that they have not taken advantage of this privilege.

The French celebrations are somewhat different from our own, in that they have no bands of music to keep cheering them up, but everyone enters into the carnival spirit of the occasion.

WITH THE BOYS OF THE TWENTY-SIXTH.

I left Paris the next day by train, and after a five-hour trip arrived at Chaumont, the headquarters of the American Expeditionary Forces. After spending a few hours in this city we started for Montrony-le-Roi, the headquarters of the Twenty-sixth Division. After considerable difficulty we located the division headquarters about dark and made arrangements for our visit the next day. We motored to Neufchateau, where we spent the night at the visitors' house. Neufchateau and vicinity was the training area of the Twenty-sixth Division when it arrived in France in September, 1917, and is well known to every member of the Yankee division.

The next morning we started early for the headquarters of the Twenty-sixth and arrived shortly before 11 o'clock. We visited the headquarters and had a very pleasant chat with Col. Stevens, the adjutant. We also met Chaplain O'Connor, as well as a number of the boys. Gen. Hale, the commanding general, was out, as was Col. Major, the chief of staff. We went down and visited the boys at the headquarters troops. They were commanded by Lieut. Mandell, of Boston, and I found a large number of old Battery A boys. We met Sergt. Thomas Daly, of Dorchester, the top sergeant, Sergt. Ronald Hersig, and many of the boys.

The men were situated in a valley, and the weather conditions were very bad. The mud was over one's ankles, and it rained very hard during my visit. The boys appeared to be in good spirits, but every single one wants to get back, now that the war is over. They all spoke very highly of Gen. Edwards, as well as Cols. Logan and Sherburne. In many of the barracks that I visited I found Gen. Edwards's pictures, as well as quotations from the Boston papers containing his speech in which he outlined the history of the division.

The boys are required to drill about four hours a day now that the armistice is signed. This they seemed to think was rather hard, on account of the weather, and especially after what they have been through.

I drove out to Aquiville and there met the old Company C boys from Newton. They all were anxious to learn the news from back home, and they gave me a real welcome. I was invited to speak to the company but had to proceed on to Forcey, where I met the Company L boys from Natick. I found Corpl. Hall, the company clerk, and in a few minutes he gathered about 40 boys from my district, to whom I made two short speeches, one inside the company office and another outside. They then produced a number of interesting souvenirs which they had captured from the Germans and showed them to me with much pride. We talked for nearly an hour, and at the finish they gave me three rousing cheers and said that they would see me on Main Street, Natick, very soon. They are all anxious to get back home.

I motored back to the headquarters troop, where I had dinner with the boys. I find that this outfit probably has the best "eats" in the division. They feed about 500 men at each meal, and the cooks certainly do themselves proud in the manner in which they prepare their food.

I found that there was considerable sickness among the boys, caused by the cold weather, but this, I found, was only natural under the climatic conditions.

I motored back to Neufchateau, where I spent the night. The next morning I started out to visit the Artillery organization, but found that they were moving. However, I located the headquarters of the One hundred and first and met Capt. Needham and some of the other company officers. For miles along the roads I passed the boys marching to trains on their way to join the rest of the division in the area that has been selected for them near Montrony-le-Roi.

I met quite a few of the boys from the One hundred and second. I also met small groups of boys from the One hundred and third and had a very pleasant chat with Capt. Franklin E. Allen, the personnel officer of that organization. The boys were very much excited over the fact that President Wilson had promised to eat his dinner on Christmas Day with the Twenty-sixth; and, of course, this made them all happy. To be selected as the division to entertain the Commander in Chief was a great tribute to this organization.

I found upon my visit that the Twenty-sixth Division is noted throughout France for its wonderful work. Everywhere one goes one hears of the work done by these boys, the bravest and gamest lot of men that ever represented any division. The French are high in their praise for the Twenty-sixth.

I was able to gather some interesting statistics regarding this organization. I find that in all they captured 3,149 men and officers and more than 200 pieces of artillery. The losses in this division were especially heavy. The total casualties amount to 11,955 men up to December 9. Of this number we lost 100 officers and 3,524 men wounded seriously, 78 officers and 1,652 men killed outright, and 111 officers and 2,708 men wounded slightly. We had 113 officers and 3,250 men gassed and 10 officers and 273 men missing in action. We also lost 9 officers and 127 men by being taken prisoners by the Germans. During the Chateau-Thierry drive the Twenty-sixth Division advanced 17½ kilometers. At the St. Mihiel salient the division advanced 14 kilometers and at the Verdun sector advanced nearly 6 kilometers.

That night I spent at Neufchateau, and early the next morning I left for St. Mihiel. About 6 kilometers from Neufchateau we stopped at Domremy, the birthplace of Jeanne d'Arc. This is a little collection of houses, many tumbled down. The village is situated on the banks of the river Meuse, and in peace-time had only about 300 inhabitants and at present far less. Domremy has been visited by thousands of our American boys. When one enters the village they usually proceed to the little church where on the stained-glass windows they can read the history of the little French maid from the time that she received the inspiration as a shepherdess on the hills beyond until she was burned at the stake in Rouen. The little home where she was born in 1412 is still standing. There is a white statue of her that was sent from England in the front yard. One is permitted to enter the house and is shown into the little room with its double windows which was used by the maid. On the second floor is a collection of arms, pictures, and so forth, pertaining to the maid. Interesting as this is, there is, back in the hills, built on the very spot where she used to herd the cattle and hear the mysterious voices calling to her, the Basilisque crypt, built in her memory. Here are many beautiful statues and banners recalling the work of this young girl.

I continued on until I came to St. Mihiel, a city in peace times which boasted of 10,000 inhabitants and situated on the right bank of the River Meuse. Here I had my first look at a destroyed city. Practically every building in this city has been destroyed as the result of the great offensive drive of the allied troops in September which resulted so victoriously for us and which was one of the critical battles of the war. Riding along the road we could see the remains of both the German and allied trenches. Some of these trenches have been built four years, while others were just made last summer.

I have seen no end of dugouts and cottages that had been built by the Germans just north of St. Mihiel. They had believed that they were going to stay in these houses all winter, and did not expect to be moved. The houses had been built of boards, covered over with tar paper, and many of the rooms were prettily decorated with the latest wall paper. Electric lights had been installed, as well as up-to-date sanitary fixtures. Comfortable bunks had been erected, on which the Americans slept with much pleasure when the Germans were driven out. Around the houses small gardens had been built, and in one place I saw what was left of a German beer garden and bowling alley. Through the fields I saw miles and miles of barbed-wire entanglements. The difference between the German barbed wire and the French or American is that the Germans used spiked iron stakes, while the French usually used wooden stakes, except when it was necessary to drive the stakes in a hurry.

It is amusing to see some of the signs while driving along. Many of the signs had been erected by the Germans, while others had been erected by the French and many more by our own men. Piles of wood and painted cloth, which had been used as camouflage, are seen lying along the ground for miles. Many of the crossroads had screens, made by the Germans, of bamboo and poultry netting, woven with strips of canvas.

Just outside the city of St. Mihiel I visited a German cemetery. Here, much to my great surprise, I found very handsome tombstones which had been erected by the Germans, who believed that St. Mihiel would always belong to the Germans and little thought of being driven back from this city. For this reason they made the tombstones on a very elaborate scale. Many of them were carved out of rock and contained interesting inscriptions. On nearly every tombstone was a replica of the iron cross carved in the rock. I found in one end of the cemetery, in which apparently had been buried some poorer soldiers, only small markers. Each of these markers had contained an iron cross, but these have been entirely carried away as souvenirs by the Americans when they came through last September. The graves had been very carefully taken care of, and flowers had been planted. Some of the tombstones were built of rock containing phosphorus, and at night they lit up brightly.

There are practically no inhabitants now living in the city of St. Mihiel. Just beyond that city I stopped at Troyan, formerly the division headquarters of the Twenty-sixth Division. I visited the little French cemetery containing about 100 graves of our boys. Each American grave is carefully marked, and most of them were covered with flowers. The French people take much pride in taking good care of the graves of American boys. In looking over the names I found the name of Capt. Joseph McConnell, of the One hundred and first, the brave captain of a company, who lost his life in August.

A few miles beyond, in the woods, I visited some of the towns and woods where the Twenty-sixth went through. Here, on the 26th of September, the Twenty-sixth made an assault on the Hindenburg line, which was directly in front of them. The assault was so successful that it took five divisions of boches to stop the division, as they believed that the Twenty-sixth intended to break through and take Metz, which was to the right. From here I drove to Seicheprey. I passed through Ramschelle, which had been the headquarters of the One hundred and first, and saw the remains of the cellar of the church where Col. Logan and Chaplain O'Connor were forced to hide for five hours. I stood in the little square of Seicheprey where the boys from the Twenty-sixth stood and fought against the Germans and made such a gallant stand. Although we lost a number of men and had more than a hundred taken prisoners, it was at this little town that the Germans first got their idea of how a Yankee could fight. The boche had been punished severely in this scrap.

The next day I went to Verdun, probably the best-known fortress of Europe, and one which for four years had been attacked constantly by the Germans. This city is situated among high hills and its buildings have been practically all destroyed as the result of the continued shelling. One of the most interesting parts of this city is its immense citadel, which is built underground. There are accommodations for more than 50,000 soldiers in this underground citadel. During the recent fighting the Twenty-sixth Division headquarters were located here. Huge underground passages, wide enough for men in columns of four to march, extend for about 13 miles under the city. Throughout the fortress are little holes just large enough to contain the muzzle of a French 77-millimeter gun. There are also emplacements for hundreds of machine guns. Railroads run up to the fort, and in this manner the ammunition and supplies are brought up. This fortress was surrendered to the Germans in 1870 but later retaken by the French.

North of Verdun I saw a part of the huge forests which had been swept clean by the gunfire. As far as the naked eye could see everything has been swept down. Villages had been destroyed, until not a single wall remained more than 3 feet above the ground. Huge trees had been swept away, and there was hardly a foot of the ground that had not been at one time a shell hole. I saw the barbed-wire entanglements that our men had to go through, as well as the trenches on the side of the road. For miles this was a waste of land, and words can not give one a real idea of the damage done.

I went into Fort Vieux, which the Germans had captured in 1916 and had occupied for about six months. Here I found only about a dozen soldiers recovering from the four hard years of war. Out beyond the fort were two other forts, and here our boys were fighting as hard as at any time during the war when the armistice was signed on November 11.

I saw thousands of graves, many of them being American, on the side of the road. Each one had its little cross, containing the name and organization of the man. Here lay buried thousands of our boys, many of them in freshly made graves, having made the supreme sacrifice during the last few weeks of the war.

It is very hard for one to give an idea of the look of the front at this particular place. In northern France alone it has been estimated that more than 250,000 buildings have been destroyed and that more than 250,000 acres of land have been made useless; this is besides the huge forests which have been destroyed, as well as the bridges, roads, viaducts, and so forth. In the city of Rheims alone 12,000 homes out of 14,000 in the city have been destroyed. Never will I forget the sight that I saw north of Verdun, and then I realized what it must have been like to our boys.

An idea of the losses of the French was recently made by the French Government. Regarding farming implements, it was found "that to replace the losses they would need about 51,000 side-hill plows, 33,000 other plows, 56,000 cultivators, 30,000 mowing machines, 115,000 farm wagons, 28,000 harrows, 50,000 rollers, 18,000 hoes, 36,000 seed drills, 13,000 fertilizers, 16,000 beet extractors, 21,000 winnowing machines, 18,000 horse rakes, 32,000 reapers and binders, 53,000 root cutters," and so forth.

With regard to the cattle lost, it is very hard to get at the exact figures, but in 10 Departments in 1913 there were 607,000 horses, whereas in 1915 there were only 242,000, or a loss of 60 per cent. Of cattle of all kinds there was a loss of 850,000, or 55 per cent; of pigs there was a loss of 380,000, or about 55 per cent.

The loss in wheat amounts to about 1,300,000 acres. The loss in hay amounts to about 850,000 acres.

The total damage to the soil, to live stock, to crops, to forests, tools, and so forth, is estimated at $2,000,000,000.

Before the war France used 59,407,000 tons of coal a year, with an addition of 9,166,000 tons more in coke equivalent. Of this, France produced about 40,844,000 tons and 5,357,000 tons of coke equivalent, the rest coming from abroad. Of this amount, 27,398,000 tons of coal came from the Valenciennes Basin. In all, something over 70 per cent of the total coal supply of France came from the invaded regions, and very much the best quality of coal at that. About 140,000 men were employed in those mines in the invaded regions out of 203,208 coal miners for all of France. This means, with their families, three-quarters of a million people were largely dependent on the coal mines. Over $200,000,000 of machinery has probably been destroyed.

Before the war the total production of iron ore in France was about 21,918,000 tons, of which 19,639,000 tons came from the Briey and Longwy Basins, in the Meurthe-et-Moselle; that is, 90 per cent of the total, of which 16,500,000 tons was in the hands of the Germans. The miners who were employed in these invaded mines, with their families, represented at least 150,000 people out of employment. It is interesting to know that just before the war the total of iron production of the Germans was 35,941,000 tons. In the United States it was 63,000,000 tons. Over half a billion dollars worth of machinery has been destroyed, including that of steel and iron mills.

The textile industry consisted before the war of about 7,530,000 cotton spindles throughout France, of which 4,500,000 were in the region invaded by Germany, and of which almost all were either destroyed or carried back into Germany and France. Out of 2,365,000 wool spindles, 2,000,000 were in the invaded districts. Out of 550,000 linen spindles, 500,000 were in the invaded regions and destroyed or removed. The same is true of looms, of which there were 140,000 in France, and over 81,000 of these were in the invaded districts. Over $120,000,000 of machinery has been destroyed.

Out of 210 sugar refineries in France, 140 have been destroyed by the Germans. Out of 3,000 brush factories, 2,000 have already been destroyed. Over $25,000 of machinery has been destroyed.

Electric power stations totaling 300,000 kilowatts have been destroyed, with an equipment loss of $50,000,000.

Breweries have had over $25,000,000 of machinery destroyed.

In machine shops $100,000,000 of machinery has been destroyed. In foundries, and so forth, $60,000,000 of machinery is gone.

None of these damages include land or buildings. Furthermore, almost all of this machinery costs three times as much to replace to-day, so that it can safely be said that $4,000,000,000 worth of machinery will be needed to replace that destroyed or carried away. This includes the stock and raw materials damaged and damage done to the mines.

Before the war France manufactured 3,000,000 tons of cement a year. In February, 1918, she was manufacturing only 400,000 tons, which amount has since increased and later diminished through the difficulty of securing coal; a good proportion of this was in the invaded Departments.

I returned to Paris and then motored out to Chateau-Thierry, which is about 45 miles away, and which is the point where the Germans were stopped last July in their advance toward Paris. I went into the Belleau Woods, where the marines had their terrific fight in which they lost so many men. I went over on the Soissons road, which the Twenty-sixth Division cut off from the Germans, and visited the railroad station in the center of the town, where the German machine guns were hidden, which caused so much destruction to our men. The casualties of the Twenty-sixth at this point were more than 4,100 men. I saw Hill 190, which the Twenty-sixth captured, and also went into the woods and gained an idea of the ground through which our boys had to advance. The Twenty-sixth Division made history at Chateau-Thierry and won the admiration of the French generals who had an opportunity to observe their work.

About 5 miles north of Chateau-Thierry I visited Bois de Chatelet, where one of the German big Berthas was located. The gun location was in the weeds and there was a railroad spur track running in from the main road. The gun itself has been taken back by the Germans, but the foundation remains. This is one of the guns which bombarded Paris, about 50 miles away. The gun carriage was about 44 feet in width and the ball bearings on which the pit turned were as big as one's head. The pit was more than 30 feet in depth, and there was a solid concrete wall 6 feet in height. In the woods adjoining were the dugouts which had been used by the German officers and the men. With the aid of a wrench borrowed from the chauffeur, I managed to unscrew several of the nuts from the base of the gun, which I have with me. I passed hundreds of little graves near here, many of which were American.

I returned to Paris and then went to visit the rooms of the Massachusetts Soldiers' and Sailors' Club. These rooms have been donated by Mrs. Louis Frothingham and are on the second floor of the Hotel Lotti. They are most attractive, and here one finds all of the late papers from the various Massachusetts cities. A large phonograph, with a number of late records, furnished amusement for the boys. The work of this department is most interesting. It is under the direction of Dr. Marten Price, of Boston, who is assisted by Charles K. Crane, a nephew of former Senator Winthrop Murray Crane, of Dalton. I found several women making tea and sandwiches for the boys, and they sure were a happy lot. I found that this bureau furnishes relatives and friends with information concerning the soldiers and sailors. Hundreds of requests are answered concerning missing boys and this organization is doing most valuable work. It takes good care of the Massachusetts boys. Mr. Crane has done much valuable work and has donated his automobile for the benefit of the organization. Four women spend much time going around to the hospitals in Paris and caring for the wants of Massachusetts boys. A number of secretaries are employed and this small expense is borne by the State.

I also inspected the headquarters of the American Red Cross in Paris and met many of the Washington newspaper men who had accompanied President Wilson and who were to cover the peace conference. Christmas afternoon I had dinner with Congressman ALVAN T. FULLER, of Massachusetts, and spent a delightful two hours with S. S. McClure, the publisher of McClure's Magazine.

After my visit to Paris I went to Tours, the headquarters of the services of supply. The achievements of the business end of the war has no parallel in the history of the world, and what has been done for the American Army in such a short time is marvelous. Docks were put up in record time; warehouses, the largest the world has ever known, were built by our engineers; railroads were built and hospitals were put up. Cities were built practically overnight in what was previously a French swamp. Cities complete, with their own theaters, fire departments, streets, stores, water supply, railroad terminals, and so forth, were erected.

One of the most gigantic tasks of the war was to prepare and handle the supplies for the men. With our limited tonnage and the fighting more than 3,000 miles away from our own shores the organization which completed this work has done marvels. You will remember that not only did we have to feed and clothe our own men and supply them with ammunition, but we also did a great deal to help feed the allied armies. When the big flood of American soldiers began to arrive in France it was necessary to find places for them to disembark. Our engineers set to work, dredged harbors, built huge dams, startled the French engineers, and have erected docks and warehouses that stand to-day as memorials to the work of the American engineer. Then, again, was the mighty task of moving the mountain of supplies to the men at the front. Railroads were built and American freight cars and engines were assembled. At one plant alone more than 15,000 American freight cars have been assembled.

The headquarters of all this work is at Tours, and the commanding general of the service of supplies is Maj. Gen. James G. Harbord. He is very ably assisted by Brig. Gen. William D. O'Connor as chief of staff. Through their courtesy I was able to visit some of the larger projects of the service of supplies.

SALVAGE.

The Quartermaster Corps has created many reforms in France which were unheard of in the United States. It has adopted from the English and French Armies the system of saving, and it has practically eliminated all waste. This has been done by the creation of the salvage service and has already resulted in the saving of millions of dollars to the Government. Salvage crews follow the men at the front and pick up everything that has been cast off. Battered field ranges, old tin pans, and all articles of metal are picked up and shipped back to the nearest salvage plant. Even the horseshoe nails are picked up, straightened out, and reissued. Clothing is the biggest article that is salvaged, and shoes are another important item. A statement was made that in France everything is picked up that has been discarded except cigarette butts and put through salvage. Now, owing to the shortage of cigarettes, the little French boys go along and pick up the butts, so there is no waste at all.

Salvage plants have been established in various sections of the service of supplies. The largest of these plants is at Tours and is known as the American Salvage Depot No. 8. A trip through this plant is most interesting. The main building has a floor space of 100,000 square feet, with concrete floors and railroad tracks running through at several points. In addition to this building there is a smaller building containing 40,000 square feet. Besides these two buildings there are three smaller buildings 9,000 square feet each, the metal department building containing 25,000 square feet, as well as several other small buildings that are used as warehouses, and so forth.

Actual salvage started in January, 1918, and at that time there were 12 men and 5 officers working at the plant. To-day there are 5,300 French female civilians, 730 male French civilians, 745 enlisted men, and 26 officers.

The laundry, which is one of the largest in France, turns out about 75,000 pieces per day. This production includes woolen breeches, blouses, shirts, underwear, socks, bed sacks, shoes, rubber boots, blankets, and other goods. A woolen blouse first goes through a sterilizer which kills all vermin and eggs. It is then washed in warm water and soap, and then dried with warm air. The cotton garments are not sterilized but are boiled in washing machines. After this process the garments are ready to be repaired. Boots and shoes are washed with a weak solution of cresol and water.

CLOTHING.

The daily output of clothing is made up approximately of 25,000 garments of underwear, 10,000 olive-drab woolen breeches or blouses, and 5,000 blankets. Besides this, the salvage service utilizes every bit of material. For example, a pair of shoes are too old to repair. A part of the leather is used for repairing purposes, and what is left is made into shoe laces by a special machine for this purpose. Old campaign hats that can not be repaired are made into hospital slippers, and so forth.

After the garments come from the laundry they are inspected and marked for repair. From here they are sent to the various sections where the repairing is done. The room where this work is done resembles an immense factory in the United States. Hundreds of the latest sewing machines are being operated by French women repairing the old garments. Buttons were sewed on by machinery, and when it is not practicable to do this work by machinery it is done by hand. Garments are then inspected, sized, and pressed, and are then ready for shipment to the troops. The goods are arranged in three classes, according to quality. Class A goods are reissued to the troops at the front, class B goods are reissued to depot troops and labor battalions, and class C goods are dyed green and are used by the German prisoners of war.

SHOES.

Next in importance to clothing comes shoes. The total production is about 3,500 pairs of shoes a day. Shoes are first paired for length and width, as well as character. They are then washed and dried and repaired thoroughly. Two types of repairs are made, one for hospital attendants and patients, without hobnails, and the others for the boys at the front, containing hobnails. Latest shoe-repair machinery has been installed in this plant. A large rubber goods repair section has recently been started. This department handles rubber boots and arctics, slickers, ponchos, and shelter halves. It produces about 3,500 garments and 850 pairs of boots daily. This production is expected to be increased, as recently a large number of vulcanizing machines were installed, which will replace the old method of drying and repatching.

HARNESS AND LEATHER.

This branch repairs chiefly harness and saddles. The articles are first scrubbed with soap, a disinfecting agent, and are then repaired and oiled.

METAL BRANCH.

The metal department is located about a mile and a half from the main depot. Here are found all sorts of metal articles, from a German helmet down to a horseshoe nail. During the month of August the value of production at this plant was $3,246,588, and the total cost of this production was $331,885. The number of pieces salvaged in each of the large departments was: Clothing, 1,154,279; metal, 15,439; canvas and webbing, 172,924; harness and leather, 14,208; shoes, 110,953; rubber goods, 77,633; the number of pieces sterilized and washed by the laundry was 1,655,706. Not only does the salvage service make a saving of nearly $100,000 a day at this one depot alone to the Government, but it also saves a large volume of transport.

One of the most interesting as well as gigantic projects that I visited on my trip was the general intermediate storage depot at Gievres, 48 miles from Tours. It was originally planned that this project should carry supplies of all kinds on hand for a million men a month, but it long ago greatly exceeded this capacity. The length of this project from its extremity is about 7 miles and is 1½ miles in width. It is of diamond shape and the area is divided into five sections of warehouses. In general the warehouses are 50 by 500 feet, built in three individual buildings in a line. The buildings are built parallel to each other in order to greatly facilitate the loading and discharging of supplies. There are at present 185 warehouses, covering a space of 5,000,000 square feet, and the open storage space, which is used for storing property not affected by the weather, of 10,000,000 square feet.

The supplies on hand include engineer and chemical warfare, gasoline and oil, quartermaster, medical, ordnance, Signal Corps, Red Cross, Young Men's Christian Association, each in a respective part of the project. The engineer depot includes many branches. It has large metal and wood machine shops and foundries for brass and iron.

The regulating office is in constant communication with the front line. This depot supplies troops from Dunkirk to Italy, and telegraph and telephone requests come into this depot for supplies of clothing and food at all hours.

At the gasoline and oil depot four huge tanks have been erected, with a capacity of 500,000 gallons. There are hundreds of small tanks for use by individual organizations that are assembled at this park.

A huge remount station for supplying horses and mules to the troops in the front line is established at Gievres and at times the number of animals vary from 4,000 to 10,000. A large veterinary hospital is in operation to take care of these animals, as well as the sick animals that are shipped back from the front.

A trip through these huge yards is most interesting. One sees 1,000 steel buildings, piled up in separate parts, all ready to be shipped to any desired point. All kinds of road machinery, as well as road-repairing machinery, such as tractors, sweepers, and so forth, take up considerable ground. At the engineering depot huge piles of hardware and machinery are found, and one can see five large cranes unloading this material.

At the Signal Corps depot one sees piles of telegraph and telephone poles as well as thousands of miles of wire.

Next to the Signal Corps depot is the Young Men's Christian Association warehouses. Here are three large warehouses full of Young Men's Christian Association supplies, as this is the general depot for the Young Men's Christian Association, and shipments are made from here to the entire front. Next to the Young Men's Christian Association warehouses is the Red Cross depot, which is the last depot that has been established here. It is now receiving a large quantity of supplies from various places, and is already filling the wants of the Army all over France.

Passing on, we come to the medical supply depot, with its some 20 or more warehouses. Here we find piles of Army ranges, beds, and all kinds of medical supplies, too numerous to mention. Passing through the medical supply depot, we come to the main Tours-Nevers road. Turning to our left we observe the ordnance depot. At this depot all classes of ordnance are carried, excepting heavy artillery and heavy artillery ammunition. Next we come to a prison camp for American prisoners.

Crossing the track, we observe the large animal-drawn transportation park, filled with wagons and carts of all kinds and descriptions. Looking off to the right we see piles of parts for wagons. They are so arranged that a wagon is started at one end by assembling wheels on an axle and passing a little farther another pair of wheels on an axle, and when it leaves the last pile of parts the wagon is completed and rolled over on the loading platform ready for shipment to the front.

As we pass on down through the quartermaster section we find a great number of warehouses. Over 100 are in this section and used by the Quartermaster's Department. To our left are warehouses filled with baggage sent here from various commands, and from almost every part of France. This baggage is sorted here, classified, and stored subject to the orders of its owners. Passing on through we see piles of rations, rope, stoves, and so forth.

Just as we approach the southern boundary of the project again we turn to the right and pass a railroad dump lying between two classification yards. Going a short distance we again turn to the right and recross the project. Here we find a clump of barracks, occupied by men working in this vicinity of the plant. To our left we find a corral where the animals and wagons used in this section are kept. Passing on through, great quantities of soup and other commissary supplies are observed.

We now are about to leave the quartermaster warehouses, and on looking to the right we observe again the refrigerating plant in the distance. Just this side of the refrigerating plant we find cars high in the air on top of piles of coal. At this point some 200,000 tons of coal is expected to be stored.

Passing now on through we cross the end of the largest classification yards. Here are 20 tracks, forming a group of classification tracks. Also to our left we observe the locomotive repair shops. Looking down in this direction one is struck by its great similarity to a big railroad yard in the States—locomotives moving in all directions, steam and smoke rising, similar to what would be found in a very busy yard in any part of the United States.

Going out on to the main road and turning to the left, we go down nearly to the extreme west of the project and cross back again on the project, we come to the main railroad hump. To the west are 15 receiving tracks that lead to the hump. The hump controls two classification yards, one of 20 tracks and the other of 15 tracks. It is here that cars are switched and classified.

Leaving this part of the plant we go direct to the cold-storage plant. The refrigerating part of the cold-storage plant consists of one building 970 feet long by 120 feet wide. This building has a maximum capacity of 8,000 tons of beef. Crossing the tracks, we go through and take a look at the machinery and the ice plant.

In entering this part of the building the first thing one finds are the big compressors that have come here from Milwaukee, Wis. Walking around to the boiler room, one observes the large, massive boilers that have come here from Chattanooga, Tenn.; then pass through the ice-making plant, where 500 tons of ice can be made daily.

We have now, in a general way, seen 140 miles of American railroad track, many machine shops, and the equivalent of 20 miles of warehouses 50 feet wide, and cars scattered throughout the yards. In riding through, one is not impressed with the number of these cars in the yards. However, if the cars found in the yards in a single day were made up in one train, that train would vary from 30 to 40 miles in length.

On our way back from the camp we stopped at Issoudun. This is the Third Aviation Instruction Center and is the largest flying center in the world. This school is an advanced training school primarily for the development of chassé or pursuit pilots, while facilities are provided for the training of pilots for bombardment, artillery observation, and reconnaissance machines. The general scheme of the school is devoted to the finishing of pilots for the small, swift type of combat planes. The course here is admitted by French and English aviators to be the stiffest in the allied armies, and it is of such a nature that when the individual pilot is graduated from this school to the front he can be depended upon to make good.

The Third Aviation Instruction Center is the finishing school for all American pilots who have received preliminary training in the States, France, Italy, or England; in fact, every American pilot, before finally going to the fighting front, is sent to Issoudun to receive final training. The school maintains a constant liaison with the front, and moniteurs are constantly going from this school to the front and returning in order that the pupils may receive the benefit of the very latest developments in aerial warfare.

Apart from being a finishing school, the Third Aviation Instruction Center is really the point in the pilot's training where his future is decided. Here it is determined whether the aviator is best suited for pursuit, bombardment, artillery observation, or reconnaissance work, or whether he is capable of flying any of these types of machines at the front. The disposition of his training is finally made here.

The aviation center is absolutely self-supporting, with its own electric-light system, sewers, waterworks, its own railroad, its own fire department, repair shops, supply department, machine shops, hospitals, target ranges, and so forth. It even publishes its own newspaper, which is edited and printed by soldiers. While its founders were busy laying out the modern city they did not overlook the streets, sidewalks, and macadam roads.

There are at present 16 independent flying fields at the school, and additional fields are in contemplation. Because of the existing conditions in France, the school is as nearly self-supporting as it is possible to be. To make this possible, the aero repair department and the machine shops are essential parts of the institution, incidentally saving millions of dollars annually to the United States Government.

The supply department is virtually a depot supplying all of the outlying fields. The depot is divided into seven different departments—Nieuport airplane parts, parts for all makes of airplanes, motors and motor parts, hardware, instruments, clothing, and the gasoline, oil, and grease department.

There are in use at this field 17 types of Nieuport airplanes. To keep these ships in the air it is necessary that a stock of approximately 15,000 parts be kept on hand. While at Tours I visited the headquarters of the Signal Corps and was shown the activities of this department. For practical purposes the work of the Signal Corps may be divided into two fields: First, the construction, operation, and maintenance of communication by telegraph, telephone, and radio, for the control and distribution of personnel and material of the Army from base ports through the zones of the S. O. S. up to the lines of combat; second, communication by every practicable means within and between the units of the fighting forces.

SIGNAL CORPS IN THE S. O. S.

The first of these requirements made necessary the provisions of a network of a line of communication between ports, depots, hospitals, aviation centers, and training camps; in short, a complete system on a large scale connecting all places where units or offices of the American Expeditionary Forces may be located. This calls for the construction, installation, and operation of telegraph, telephone, and radio equipment analogous in every way to that necessary in commercial systems like those of the United States.

The facilities which the French could place at the disposal of the Signal Corps were very early found to be inadequate, and Signal Corps lines built with American material by Signal Corps personnel have been constructed in steadily increasing amounts.

Since the Signal Corps commenced to function on June 24, 1917, there have been nearly 19,000,000 local telephone calls and upward of 1,000,000 long-distance telephone calls handled by its services. Since the Signal Corps telegraph system commenced to function, on August 9, 1917, there have been handled more than 5,500,000 telegraph messages. The long-distance telephone and telegraph system constructed by the Signal Corps is entirely maintained by Signal Corps personnel. In addition, 4,870 kilometers of leased wires are also maintained by Signal Corps personnel.

Although the main function of the Signal Corps is the provision of communication a large part of its activity in the S. O. S. has to do with its own supplies. In the United States Army each service has certain classes of material which it handles exclusively. Signal Corps supplies consist of all the implements and material for constructing lines of communication, including equipment and central stations and telegraph offices, as well as all the instruments and apparatus used for signaling in combat. Although of less relative importance from the point of view of personnel involved it should be said that the Signal Corps is charged with meteorological and photographic service to the entire Army, and supplies for these activities are also under the control of the Signal Corps.

Signal Corps supplies from America and, to a small extent, from England arriving at base ports are sent to supply depots in the S. O. S., where they are checked and inspected. From these depots they are sent as required to advance depots, where a further distribution takes them to Army parks. A special depot for photographic supplies is maintained at Paris.

THE SIGNAL CORPS IN COMBAT.

The second great field of activity of the Signal Corps is concerned with the provision of tactical units fully equipped and trained in the use of every practicable method of signaling promptly and despite enemy interference military information and communications with respect to the preparation for and conduct of active military operations at the front, as well as for the interception of enemy communications and the location of enemy radio stations, whether on the ground or on airplanes.

The interception of communications and the location of radio stations of the enemy is done by specially trained personnel working with special apparatus in cooperation with the intelligence section of the General Staff. By means of these services it is possible to learn the enemy's plans in advance and to gain information on the character and distribution of his units in the battle line.

The provision of all possible means of communication has entailed a vast amount of study and instrument development, both in the laboratories of the Signal Corps in France and in the United States. The conditions of warfare are not those of time of peace, and it is an interesting fact that telephone communication, to mention only one instance, is in a more advanced state of development at the front than it is commercially in the United States.

TECHNICAL SERVICES.

In addition to this general organization for supply, transportation, and signaling in combat, there are maintained in the office of the chief signal officer a number of special administrative and technical divisions. The supply division has supervision of the handling, storage, and issue of all Signal Corps supplies from the time they reach the base ports until they are turned over to the Army parks. The telephone and telegraph division supervises construction, maintenance, and operation of all telephone and telegraph lines in the services of supply. The engineering division makes surveys, prepares plans and estimates, and has technical control of construction of telegraph and telephone lines and installations in the zone of the services of supply and advises and assists the zone of the advance with respect to construction and installation in that zone.

The research and inspection division, the laboratories of which are in Paris, is charged with the development of apparatus to meet any requirements which may be presented and makes inspections at factories and depots, in order that supplies may reach the armies in a condition conforming to standard specifications. The radio division has charge of the radio service in general throughout the American Expeditionary Forces and also supervises Signal Corps radio intelligence service.

The photographic division is charged with the maintenance of a file of all negatives taken by the Signal Corps or other American services in France and with the keeping of a complete photographic record of the war, as well as with a supply of moving and still pictures for purposes of public information and propaganda.

The special service division supervises the meteorological service, signaling by means of pigeons, and visual signaling, which is done by flags, lamps, and panels.

Other divisions of the office of the chief signal officer comprise the personnel division, which keeps all necessary personnel records and prepares travel orders, and so forth.

From Tours I went to Bordeaux, one of the seacoast cities of France that has been used to a great extent by the Americans. We have been using nine ports for supplies in France: Brest, St. Nazaire, Rouen, La Pallice, Rochefort, Bordeaux, Nantes, Marseilles, and Havre. The largest docks are at St. Nazaire and Bordeaux, and Bordeaux is one of the three cities that has been chosen to debark our troops. I first went out to visit the Bassens docks.

Situated on the right bank of the Gironde in the direction of the ocean and about 10 kilometers from Bordeaux, these docks are composed of two sections. The first section, constructed by the French over a period of 10 years, has a capacity of seven berths at present and is about 1,220 meters long. The second section is composed of docks built by Army engineers, using some civilian labor. It has been completed since March, 1918, and this is very remarkable progress, in view of the fact that a great deal of difficulty had to be overcome because of a large amount of marshland. Extending along the entire length of this dock are three railroad tracks running parallel to each other. They are at present spanned by 20 traveling cranes of the most modern type, each having a lifting capacity of 10 tons; when fully equipped there will be 40 of these cranes. In most cases the supplies are taken from the ships by these cranes and loaded directly on the cars. However, in some instances it is necessary to place them in warehouses, which were constructed by American engineers, just back of the railroad tracks. These warehouses form an integral part of the general system and run almost the full length of this section of the dock. The dock is now completed and about 1,250 meters in length, having a capacity of 10 berths, and will handle 12,000 tons daily. A very modern fire apparatus is ready for instant need. Above the fire house is placed a lookout platform, which will be used for a systematic control of the arrangement of ships and also to announce any outbreak of fire quickly. Two men will be on constant duty at this lookout station. A comprehensive view of the whole project is seen from this platform. Small electric tow carts and gasoline tractors are used for the movement of small freight and the spotting of cars on the dock, respectively. The Army engineers have installed a complete electrical system, by which the docks are lighted. All apparatus, including the cranes, is operated by electricity. The electric tow carts are charged on the docks.

Another set of cranes, composed of units, each with a platform and a boom at each corner, and operated by a steam donkey engine on the platform, serves to handle the freight which is to be temporarily stored in the warehouses to the rear.

A very comprehensive trackage system has been constructed throughout the entire docks by which the loaded cars may be easily placed on a track and made into trains. From here the trains—American locomotives and largely American cars, operated by Americans—are taken to the immense distribution warehouse depot at St. Sulpice over American tracks. At present about 6,000 negro troops with white officers are used continuously on these docks in three shifts. No German prisoners are used on the docks. A high barbed-wire fence has been erected between the docks and the main road to facilitate guarding the project.

MOTOR RECEPTION PARK AND ASSEMBLING PARK.

Situated about 1.6 kilometers south and east of Bassens Docks. All automobiles that come into this port are taken directly to this park. They are here assembled, equipped, and prepared to be convoyed to the advanced distributing parks. About 150 cars of various types are sent out daily and often as high as a thousand cars leave per week. The park is now operating on a very efficient basis and construction is in progress for the necessary buildings so that the work may continue during the rainy periods. New standard Liberty motor trucks may be seen here in great numbers.

CAMP ANCONS.

Situated about 1 kilometer east of the docks. This camp is particularly interesting from a visitor's point of view on account of the very efficient way and unique methods by which the 6,000 negro troops are taken care of. These are the troops who perform the labor upon the docks. One of the most interesting features is the feeding of these men. The men pass through stiles in single parallel columns and receive the food from attendants at the rate of about 125 per minute. A kitchen, composed of about two dozen field ranges in a near-by building, cooks the food, and it is carried by the attendants to the men who do the serving. Hot food is taken from this kitchen for all meals and served to the troops who are on duty at the docks.

ST. SULPICE WAREHOUSES.

Situated about 25 kilometers northeast of Bordeaux. This is an immense system of warehouses, to which most of the supplies from the docks are taken, over an American railroad. This system of warehouses comprises three sections and when completed will have about 115 storage buildings, each with dimensions of 15.4 meters by 154 meters, making a total covered area of 2,583,392 square feet (240,000 square meters). A wonderful system of tracks around and between these warehouses makes it possible to charge or discharge them in the minimum of time. About 800 or 900 cars are being loaded or unloaded daily.

Each section is composed of many rows of warehouses, three in a line and placed diagonally with the sectional divisions. On each side of each line of warehouses are two tracks. The intervening space, 5,700,000 square feet between warehouses, is used for the storage of Engineer property and other material which is not affected by weather conditions.

It will be noted that both the warehouses and the intermediate space can be utilized at the same time from the two tracks. The camp is approximately 2 by 5 kilometers and located adjoining the main Bordeaux-Paris railroad line. About 11,000 troops are at present used in this camp, including 1,800 German prisoners. These prisoners are formed into companies of 450 men each, and 85 class B American troops to guard each company. A prison camp of 900 men is located each side of the project. All the men, including the prisoners, work 10 hours a day and receive the best of army rations, including the 15 per cent additional allowed labor troops. The prisoners are doing very good work, but usually arrive in a poor state of health. From two to three weeks are required to bring them to full efficiency.

Owing to the size of this project, a unique system of gasoline "speeders" has been instituted for supervisional work. My observations of the camp were made from one of these "speeders." There is also an American prison camp here for men who have been sentenced from three to six months. They are also used on this work.

The project now has about 14½ kilometers of railway tracks completed, and will be increased to 240 kilometers. Switching facilities are arranged for on either end of the project to connect with the main line.

EMBARKATION CAMP.

The embarkation camp is situated about 5 kilometers northeast of Bordeaux. The day after the armistice was signed a soldier wrote his best girl: "For over a year I have had a burning ambition to go overseas, and, by gosh, I've still got it." Then he and all his fellows sat down and did a little figuring. Statistics seemed to prove that a long and sad wait lay before him. To make sure, he consulted his company commander and had his fears confirmed.

The company commander forgot that Uncle Sam learns by experience. He remembered how long it took to come over. He saw visions of trucks drawing up before company barracks at ports of embarkation not so very long ago loaded with shoes and overcoats and breeches and shirts, and, after a hectic two hours of sorting and trying, returning two-thirds laden for exchange with odd sizes that would not fit anybody. He saw company clerks toiling all night long over service records, passenger lists, and the hundreds of individual papers necessary to keep a quartermaster busy and contented. And on that basis he knew it would be a long, long time, even should the return movement start immediately, before the cow-haunted towns of sunny France would fade into memory.

But Uncle Sam has learned by experience. He has put 2,000,000 soldiers into France, and in the process he has acquired knowledge. The hundreds of thousands who passed through the replacement camps of St. Aignan-Noyers, of Le Mans in Brittany, of Blois, and of Nevers, soon showed him that some better methods had to be devised, and in his service were men frantically desirous of keeping their names out of print who had the sense to devise them. He cut out the trucks and got down to business.

The result was "The Mill." They tried to get a better name for it, but the dictionary did not contain one. For it is a mill. Into one end they feed soldiers—dirty and ragged and infested from the battle fields—and from the other they turn them out cleaned and reequipped and ready for home. Now that the soldier's ambition to go overseas is once more in a way to be gratified, he has acquired another. That is the way with ambitions. Now he wants to greet again his closest friends at home and get rid of his closest friends in France. I refer, in the latter case, to the cooties, or, in more dignified terms, the lice.

It is not a pretty animal, nor is it a pretty name, but both stick. The cootie has risen to the dignity of official command. I believe there is now an officer—I am not sure he is not a general officer—who rejoices in the proud title of chief delousing officer. Why not chief delicing officer I do not know. It was considered that the corps under him should be named the military delicers, somewhat like the military police, but the other M. D.'s objected. At any rate, he has built various combat strongholds, such as in the embarkation camp outside of Bordeaux, and there he obtains his victories.

Men going home are either casuals or organized units. The organized units come off the line and are sent into billets in villages scattered over a wide area. There they put up their own little portable delousing plants and draw their new equipment and generally tidy themselves up. When they think they are ready, they report the fact and are inspected; and if their opinion of themselves is correct they are, according to priority list, moved to Embarkation Camp No. 2, whence they go aboard ship.

The camp is a collection of typical American barracks, situated in a beautiful country about 4 miles out from Bordeaux. It is very complete and comfortable. The arrival, armed, it is hoped, with his service papers and travel orders, "blows in" laden with full equipment. He is shoveled into one end of the mill. From that moment his destinies are in other hands. Between long batteries of typewriters he files slowly. His vital statistics are taken. Where he is from, who is his nearest relative, to what unit he has belonged, the barracks to which he is assigned, and other items of the sort are entered on duplicate cards. From this room he proceeds to another, also full of clerks, who assign him to one of the eight great districts into which the United States is divided. The idea is to get him into a casual company with comrades from his own section of the country. Thus his return home in an orderly and military manner is assured. The casual companies number 150 men each and are officered by casual officers, also from the same neck of the woods. The information here obtained is collated at headquarters. The adjutant has always before him a morning report showing exactly the number of men and officers on hand from any part of America. He also knows that by the time the man leaves that second room his records, all his service records, his equipment slips, his allotments, his insurance, his qualification cards, and so forth, are cleared and in order.

The third room has two long benches, two long tables, and a row of ash cans. Hinged sides to the room make it possible to remove the ash cans from the outside. Here the soldier separates himself from all his personal belongings. Equipment and all that dread word comprehends falls from him, both ordnance and quartermaster, and he steps into the fourth room boasting earthly possession of only a towel and a piece of soap—both newly acquired. The ash can contains all the rest, and that spirited away by unseen hands disappears into unknown regions. What eventually becomes of its contents he knows not nor greatly cares. As a matter of fact, they are taken away and undergo treatment and reclamation.

And in the fifth room that soldier undergoes his five or six hundredth physical examination since entering the Army. When a medico has nothing else to do it is his delight to examine you physically. Medicos have nothing much to do.

If he is all right the soldier goes on into still another of the innumerable long steamy rooms. If he is all wrong he is shunted one side into the yawning infirmary wagon. This room is full of showers and steam and hot water and the smell of soap, all of which are supposed to be very bad for cooties. In fact this might be called the chamber of horrors for the cooties. When they have passed this test they are, if not dead, at least in an awful fright.

The cleaned, solitary, but naked soldier next steps into a storehouse. Here are arranged neatly on pigeon-holed shelves every last item that a soldier is supposed to own, and arranged according to the exact order in which he wears and carries them. That is, he gets his taps for identification tag and his undershirt first, and his ordnance last. Into the equipping and dressing room he comes as he came into the world, and out of it he steps a complete American soldier.

All but his haircut and shave. A mammoth barber shop of 50 chairs—count 'em; 50—still awaits him. He can now go to his assigned barracks to await the time when, a sufficient number of men from his section having gathered, he is pronounced a member of a full-strength casual company and is moved to the embarkation camp. From that moment his history is that of any soldier belonging to a unit.

Before the time of sailing perhaps some days or even weeks must elapse. He must be held in readiness, not permitted to stray. It is dull work. But here comes in those most excellent institutions, the Red Cross and the Y. M. C. A. Both camps are blessed with several huts under exceptionally able management. Pianos, phonographs, magazines, letter paper, canteens for the assuagement of the soldiers' strange and perpetual hunger for chocolates, chewing gum, and the cheaper brands of cigarettes are all there in abundance, and the personal touch also, without which these things amount to little. One American woman has, by dint of sheer personality and sympathy, so endeared herself to the thousands who have come in contact with her, that men on leave have actually taken their vacations in Embarkation Camp No. 2 instead of amid the white lights in order to renew their acquaintance with her. Think it over, it means something.

The best of all—to the friendless casual at least—he gets paid. All he has to do is to step to the desk. No waiting for the pay roll of his old company to be examined. You do not know what that means unless you have been there; but about 2,000,000 of our men have been there.

Even waiting must have an end. There comes a time when the Navy says to the personnel officer at the docks that it has a ship with such a capacity ready for home, and the latter refers to his priority list and his morning report and reports such and such units for embarkation. They shoulder their packs and march to the docks in tow of special guides. There are guides everywhere to show each unit, each man, by prepared lists, just where he shall go. At the foot of the gangplank the embarkation camp bids him and his record farewell.

And to an Army man here is a beautiful arrangement, for in the Army a man and his record are presumed to be inseparable. If they ever drift apart, dreadful things happen. The man is adrift. He may even become a casual, and that, as I must have made clear, is a terrible fate. If the transport took him over at camp, for example, and if on the way to the docks he should break his wishbone or something and be sent back to a hospital, and his record should go right on without him. Do you not see? But embarkation will have none of that. It escorts him and his record "tout ensemble," as we say in our fluent French, to the edge of the water and wishes him a good trip.

At the mill, near Bordeaux, alone they can delouse or delice them at the rate of 6,000 a day, 18,000 a month. Bring on your ships!

ST. LOUBES.

Situated 12 kilometers northeast of Bordeaux. This project is situated on the south bank of the Dordogne River. Along the water front American engineers have constructed about 600 feet of wooden docks, where the ammunition barges are unloaded. Upon arriving the ammunition is loaded on these barges at a point down the river and towed up to this dock. From here it is taken by horse-drawn vehicles to sorting warehouses. From these sorting warehouses the supplies are distributed to 36 special storage warehouses, according to the clasification of shells. These special warehouses are distributed over a large area and connected with the distributing warehouses by railroad tracks. All possible precautions in the location of these warehouses have been taken in order to prevent the possibility of any general explosion.

This whole system is, of course, connected with the main French railroad lines.

HISTORY OF UNITED STATES ARMY BASE HOSPITAL NO. 6, AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES.

Base Hospital No. 6, the first American hospital of any character in the immediate vicinity of Bordeaux, arrived at Bordeaux on July 28, 1917, with 29 medical officers, 64 nurses, 7 civilian secretaries and specialists, and 153 enlisted men of the Medical Department. The unit was organized in Boston, Mass., by Maj. (now Col.) Frederic A. Washburn, Medical Corps, administrator for the Massachusetts General Hospital. Nearly all of the medical personnel and nurses were graduates of the Massachusetts General Hospital.

The unit sailed from New York on the steamship Auroria on July 11, 1917. It was among the first six base-hospital units ordered to France. The unit arrived at Liverpool July 23, and proceeded without delay to France by way of Southampton.

The unit was the first American organization to enter Bordeaux or vicinity, and one of the first to be established in what is now known as base section No. 2, which at that time had not been conceived. The citizens of Bordeaux and Talence evinced much interest and pleasure in the advent of the first element of the American Army in this neighborhood.

Arrangements had been previously made for the unit to take over the Petit Lycee de Bordeaux at Talence, Gironde, which had been in use for three years by the French Service de Sante as a French hospital. The personnel of the unit was quartered in a few vacant wards until such time as the construction and the organization program should be carried out.

August 21, 1917, the first American patient was received.

At the time the unit arrived at Talence the French hospital had upward of 900 patients, whose evacuation was necessarily slow, and it was not until September 1 that the French hospital Complementaire No. 25 officially turned over its buildings to United States Army Base Hospital No. 6.

In the meantime plans for construction had been under way, and by September 5 the renovation and repair of the administration building had been completed to the point where it was ready for occupancy. Soon thereafter the construction of barracks was started. The original plans of construction received many additions as the American Expeditionary Forces grew in numbers.

On October 28, 1917, the hospital received its first visit from the commander in chief, Gen. Pershing. He made a thorough inspection.

The construction of the various groups of barracks progressed favorably, and by December 25 a Red Cross hut was completed for the use of personnel and patients.

On March 1, 1918, the base laboratory, base section No. 2, S. O. S., was established at the hospital.

March 1, 1918, the Chateau de Breuil was leased for the use of nurses.

March 13, Secretary of War Baker and Gen. Pershing visited the hospital.

March 15, 11 officers, 21 nurses, and 46 men, comprising Hospital Unit "O," reported at the hospital for duty. This unit had been formed in Charlotte, N. C., by Maj. Addison G. Brenizer, Medical Corps.

On April 3 the first convoy of patients from the front was received, numbering 326. On April 8, a convoy of French patients was received, an agreement having been made to care for 100 at a time as long as accommodations permitted.

On April 25 Maj. Washburn was relieved of the command and ordered to England to take charge of the hospitalization of American troops in England, and Maj. (now Col.) Warren L. Babcock, M. D., commanding officer of the American Red Cross Hospital No. 3, Paris, took charge of the hospital. On this date the hospital was taking care of 650 patients, and the construction had advanced to a capacity of 1,360.

May 13, 1918, the Chateau de Baychevelle, near Pauillac, was added to the hospital as a convalescent pavillion for convalescing American officers.

From this date until the present writing convoys of wounded were received at regular intervals from evacuation and advance hospitals, and the patients increased rapidly in number. On June 30, 1918, the number of patients was 1,385 and the capacity 2,200.

July 30 the hospital was again visited and inspected by Gen. Pershing.

On July 31 the number of patients in hospital was 2,332, and the number of beds 2,600.

The construction work was kept in advance of the demands for accommodation of wounded and completed in time to receive the great flood of patients following the Chateau-Thierry and Soissons battles. On completion of the construction, September 1, 1918, the capacity of the hospital was established at 2,750, and orders were issued immediately for the organization of an emergency capacity by the erection of tents and the use of many of the corridors of various buildings. An emergency capacity of 1,500 beds was thus provided in a few days.

The hospital furnished several surgical, gas, and shock teams of trained specialists for work in forward evacuation hospitals and at the time of the establishment of Headquarters Base Section No. 2 a number of its personnel were requisitioned as specialists for service in the office of the chief surgeon, Base Section No. 2.

On November 1, 1918, the Caserne Carayon-Latour, at Pessac near Talence, was taken for equipment and administration as a part of Base Hospital No. 6. It had a capacity of 1,200 beds, thereby increasing the capacity of Base Hospital No. 6 to 5,550. This Caserne was later designated as Base Hospital No. 220, and Capt. George A. Leland, jr., was appointed commanding officer.

On November 11, the day the armistice was signed, the hospital had 4,320 patients, its normal and emergency capacity both being fully occupied. On the basis of population it was the largest base hospital in France under a single administration as distinguished from hospital centers. At its maximum it has had a total personnel, nurses, soldiers, and civilians, of nearly 700, and up to present writing has cared for over 25,000 patients, the majority of whom were American wounded.

While at Bordeaux I was invited by Brig. Gen. Robert D. Walsh, the commanding general of Base Section No. 2, to accompany him out to Base Hospital No. 6, which is located in the outskirts of the city. This hospital was first started by the Massachusetts General Hospital unit, and at present contains a large staff of Massachusetts doctors. The work which has been done at this hospital is well known all over France. I was shown through the various wards and met a great many men from all sections of the country. The men were in a happy frame of mind because orders had been received that all men in the hospitals were to be sent back home. I was impressed with the comfortable portable buildings, with their warm stoves, and the good food that was given the men at this hospital. I talked to scores of them, and every single one was warm in his praise for the treatment received here. At times this hospital has had as high as 6,500 patients. I was very much interested at visiting some of the gardens that were taken care of by the convalescent patients. These gardens furnish all of the fresh vegetables that are used in the hospital as well as give useful and helpful occupation to the men.

The Red Cross has furnished huts as well as the Young Men's Christian Association, and they take good care of the boys. The Knights of Columbus have men going through the hospitals at all times distributing free cigarettes and chocolate to the men.

I also visited the Beau Desert hospital center. Here four hospitals are in operation, and they have had as high as 14,000 patients at one time. This hospital center is a city in itself. I also visited the Wellesley College Unit Red Cross Hut, which is at this hospital center, and which is considered one of the most attractive in France.

While at Base Hospital No. 6 I made a short speech to the boys when one of their number was being decorated with the distinguished-service cross for bravery.

Everywhere that I went I found Massachusetts officers and men upholding the traditions of Massachusetts and doing the work that had been expected of them in a manner that made me proud of the fact that I came from Massachusetts. We will never be able to repay the men and officers who gave up their homes and friends and went over to France to fight for us. They suffered hardships that the world might be a better place to live in. Many of the poor lads made the supreme sacrifice, and as I noticed their graves, from the fighting regions north of Verdun to the small cemeteries outside the hospitals in Bordeaux, I then, in a small way, began to realize a little of what these men have been through.

So far as war relief work is concerned, I have heard nothing but the highest praise, from officers and men alike, for the Knights of Columbus and the Salvation Army. They have been with the boys always and everywhere, giving them little luxuries that helped greatly to stimulate morale.

Address Delivered by Hon. Royal C. Johnson at Norristown, Pa., on February 9, 1919, on the Life and Character of Theodore Roosevelt.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EVERETT SANDERS,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 11, 1919.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an address of Hon. ROYAL C. JOHNSON, delivered at Norristown, Pa., on February 9, 1919, on the life and character of Theodore Roosevelt.

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS OF HON. ROYAL C. JOHNSON, REPRESENTATIVE FROM SOUTH DAKOTA, DELIVERED AT NORRISTOWN, PA., FEBRUARY 9, 1919.

Theodore Roosevelt was our friend and, like 2,000,000 other Americans, I have returned to the land of my birth to find that our general and friend has "gone west"—"gone west" to the place where he may secure that peace that was never allotted him in life, and where neither the recollection of his power, nor service, nor kindness may enter his thoughts.

"Gone west" with a smile, secure in the knowledge that he satisfied himself that he performed his duty like a man, but that he may never again hear the tributes that men give to men.

"Gone west" with the love, affection, and confidence of his countrymen. Too few of us there will be who will be able to do likewise.

I dislike to eulogize him. It is easy to criticize the living or eulogize the dead, and I can not believe that he would desire either. All that he would wish of us is to let his life and his work and his example live for the inspiration it may give to future Americans. He had no other thought than America. With full knowledge of the world and its history, he was always an American, and history will record him as the greatest American citizen of his time.

I shall not try to talk of him as will the historian, coldly stating the facts of great achievements, but rather as I shall talk to my grandchildren, when they cluster around and ask me of Theodore Roosevelt, because his history will not be written in books, but will be engraved in the hearts and minds of those yet unborn who will follow him. It is of the memories of him that we wish to think, and not of what may be written.

When they ask me of him, I shall say, "No one can tell you of Roosevelt, his life, or his work—he accomplished so much in every realm of the world's activities that none of us may imitate him, but I can truthfully say that he was the greatest living force in the world for a score of years—not long as time is considered, but measured by the life of men, an eternity."

During that time he was legislator, statesman, soldier, father, and President, and there are none to-day who dare to say that he was not the best. As a legislator his record is an open book which the historians of the world will lay before you, and with which you are familiar. As a statesman he had the knowledge of the world's forces that few have had, and he used his knowledge for his country. As a soldier he was the idol of soldiers, and he faced death as a soldier should face it.

I have always felt that the secret of his strength and the underlying reason for his honesty was the fact that he had faced death so often and had no fear of it. The conquering of that fear had led him to the great philosophy that if he could but satisfy himself, he need have no fear of satisfying others, and with that great fund of knowledge, which he had so studiously earned, he satisfied himself and was usually right. Without that lack of fear he never could have performed the services to his country which he did perform, and you will find the dominant note of lack of fear of death or consequences running through all of his activities. His own creed, as given by him many years ago, expresses my thought better than I could express it, and I shall give it to you as he gave it:

> I preach to you, then, my countrymen, that our country calls not for the life of ease, but for the life of strenuous endeavor. The twentieth century looms before us big with the fate of many nations. If we stand idly by, if we seek merely swollen, slothful ease and ignoble peace, if we shrink from the hard contests where men must win at hazard of their lives and at the risk of all that they hold dear, then the bolder and stronger people will pass by us and will win for themselves the domination of the world.
> Let us therefore boldly face the life of strife, resolute to do our duty well and manfully; resolute to uphold righteousness by deed and by word; resolute to be both honest and brave, to serve high ideals, yet to use practical methods. Above all, let us not shrink from strife, moral or physical, within or without the Nation, provided we are certain the strife is justified, for it is only through strife, through hard and dangerous endeavor, that we shall ultimately win the goal of true national greatness.

If one could have asked Theodore Roosevelt, when he knew he was going to leave us, what he considered his greatest work, I believe that he would say that it was the fact that he had trained four sons and given them to his country; and it is as a father that we must most admire him. No one knew what war would cost as he knew it, and no one knew the toll of death that would be taken as he did, yet willingly and cheerfully he acquiesced in the desires of his sons when they went forth to the fighting line, ready and willing to accept that which was to be accorded them as did their father.

He knew the soldier's creed, and when his son had said, "If my time shall come, I wish to lie where I have fought and fallen," he knew the motive that called for that expression and cheerfully acquiesced. He knew that if the cause was worth fighting for and dying for, the place of death was the place for eternal rest.

Of his life and work as President we must let the historian speak, because every realm of human endeavor and activity entered into it. His one desire, if I may interpret his feeling, was that every man, woman, and child in his country might be given a place in the sun, with the right to happiness, justice, and freedom. He desired to "carry on" with that thought with a firm belief in a Divine Providence, and in the broad sense of the word, a Christian. He carried to the office of President the lessons that he learned from the Sermon on the Mount, and as he learned them he lived them. We see this if we take his creed, and he expressed it when he said: "If we read the Book—the Bible—aright, we read a Book that teaches us to go forth and do the work of the Lord in the world as we find it; to try to make things better in the world, even if only a little better, because we have lived in it. That kind of work can be done only by a man who is neither a weakling nor a coward; by the man who, in the fullest sense of the word, is a true Christian, like 'Greatheart,' Bunyan's hero."

But enough of eulogy; the devotion of my allotted time to the saying of the kindly, but true, things of Theodore Roosevelt would not satisfy him. If he were present, his mind would be upon the future, and he would wish to know what we were doing now to carry out his work that he had begun and for which he gave his life. He would ask us many searching questions, and questions that none but he could ask; he would ask concerning the future of our country and what we were doing to make it better. He would say, "Our boys have gone to make the world better, and what are we doing and what will we do for them when they come back?" I wish he were here to tell us, because no one understood the American soldier as he understood him, and if we could but have his counsel and advice at this period of the Nation's reconstruction it would be timely and wise.

I think he would ask us what comprehensive program we have undertaken for the sick, the wounded, and the well, and if we have made provision for the new life to which every returning soldier aspires.

As we read his writings we know that he knew the problems; he knew that men whom the world called failures have fought the good fight and will come back regenerated, and he would ask us what provision we have made to keep them on this plane to which they have risen. He would say that each of them must live his own life, but that this coming back must mean that the respect for law and for the rights of civilization be kept before each man. He would say that these men must decide for themselves, but should be given every opportunity for advice in making a choice. In his great wisdom and charity he would know that men return with hopes and desires that life can never fulfill, and his practical mind would wish to reconcile that wish with that which they can receive. He would say that we must be governed both by the law and by the facts, and by the conditions and not by theories. He would know that every man must be returned to the place in life that he by merit and industry and application is entitled to occupy, and he would see to it that that place was kept or made for him. He would know that we must reconcile the thoughts and hopes and aspirations of both soldiers and civilians; he would teach the soldier that this war could never have been successfully terminated had it not been for the loyal support of the men, women, and children, who saved and slaved that the soldier might be heartened and equipped, and he would teach the civilian that he would have no country had it not been for the soldier.

His great mind would fathom the fatalism that permeates the thoughts of those who played with death and he would combat it with words that would bring home to the heart of every man the fact that not luck but tact and industry and perseverance will rule the world. He would teach the boys that in battle they lived not by merit or by luck, and that while "c'est l'guerre" was the motto of war, in the future they must learn that the world is not changed and their actions must be governed by adaptibility and judgment. He would know that his sons and your sons must be given time to pick up the habits of life which they left so long ago and which are now hard to assume, and he would outline the needful legislation. He would see that it is yet too soon to say just what we shall do or how we shall do it, because the youth of our country has not returned, has not been consulted, and any decision to which we come without the counsel of the men who fought that the people of our country might retain the right to choose their own destiny will be made ex parte and subject to reversal. This does not mean that pressing decisions should not be made. We live in the present and each day, and its problems must be met. It does mean, however, that we must maintain the Constitution as it is and the foundations of legislation as they are until all of the people of this country are given an opportunity to express themselves.

He would lay down some of the general principles that must govern us. One that is accepted by the bona fide citizens of this country and will be demonstrated upon the return of its troops is that we have a profound respect for its laws, its decisions, its uniform, and its flag.

Four million men fought or were ready to fight for its dedisions, in its uniform and under its flag, against an alien enemy, and those men will not hesitate to fight against an enemy, alien or domestic, who can not accept the decisions of a majority of the citizens of our country and respect its flag. He would say this in his charity and kindness for the benefit of those individuals who hold in allegiance the red flag, which has never been the symbol of organized society and government under whose laws sane and civilized people must live. These rules are plain to the understanding, and have been and must be observed by the overwhelming majority of the citizens of all countries.

He would say, and I would repeat after him, that the free men who wear or have worn the American uniform will fight any organization that seeks the destruction of Government or finds that it can not abide by the laws of this country, respect its flag, and uphold its hands. An enemy is an enemy, whether at home or abroad. A traitor is a traitor, no matter where he may live; and Theodore Roosevelt would say, and every soldier would repeat, that the cause of anarchy and of rebellion will be met with every soldier upholding the Government for which soldiers fought.

He would say, and every soldier would repeat, that no man can hold true allegiance to two gods, two countries, or two flags. One must be surrendered, and the country can not live and prosper that does not force the surrender of any allegiance which is inimical to national unity. He would make the statement, as he has time after time laid down the principle, that every American citizen is entitled to the protection of the American Government for his person and property at any place in the world where he may happen to be.

He knew, as none of us know, that no country can be great or maintain its self-respect if the rule is not complied with, and when a government does not assume that attitude neither it nor its citizens retain their self-respect.

Time is all too short to honor this great man, but I believe that so long as the Nation endures the thoughts of men will turn to him for inspiration, and I can only say that for him I have but one regret, and that is that he might have died at the head of the troops of his country, in the fight for the things which he knew were right. He would have then died as he wished to die and as he lived. Together with his son "gone west" in battle at the front. A soldier, God bless him.

Our Country is Not Large Enough to Shelter Any Citizen Not Truly American.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. S. D. FESS,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 11, 1919.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I insert the following:

ADDRESS DELIVERED BY S. D. FESS AT THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF PITTSBURGH, PA., FEBRUARY 8, 1919.

Mr. Chairman and members of the Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce, I am here to speak on at least one phase of the reconstruction problem.

However great was the problem of winning the war, the proper solution of the problems of peace is greater. The war came after two and one-half years of warning, which gave the Nation abundance of time to think of the task. When we entered it it was a problem of men and money, mobilized to give the maximum war ability. This was done in the usual American way. While all must admit it was wasteful, and wickedly so, the answer to all claims for economy and all charges of extravagance was "we must win the war."

With the close of the war the problems of peace are imminent and acute.

Under the stress of war we ignored the principles of sound business and finance to embark upon emergency legislation. While this was done as temporary measures to enable the Government to utilize the maximum ability for Government purposes, to a total disregard for individual rights, it offered an administration astonishingly friendly to socialistic tenets the open door to try out these socialistic doctrines at the behest of Socialist advocates and propagandists. So we are not surprised to find presented to us to-day on the part of the administration a request, if not a threat, and on the part of classes of agitators a demand, that these temporary and emergent measures for war purposes be made permanent law for peace purposes.

FIRST PHASE OF PROBLEM.

This is the first phase of the reconstruction problems. Another phase more serious is the inevitable loosening of the ties of law and order, the giving way of the sheet anchor of peaceful government. This has permitted a phase of resistance to the organic laws of the land, which is reflected in numerous ways and divers places, not only in Europe and Asia but even here in America. The worst fruits of this disregard for order fully is found in Russia. The Bolshevist régime there can not be described to an American accustomed to respect for law. Here is a Government which but yesterday could stand out against the world. It was looked upon, and had been for many years past, as the greatest rival of the Anglo-Saxon. Many of our keenest students of world politics looked upon Russia as the one mighty rival of Great Britain. Students of political history predicted a conflict between the Slav and the Anglo-Saxon.

To-day, under the ban of a group of anarchists, whose fundamental theory of government is the abolition of private property, this mighty empire lies prostrate, with none so poor as to do her reverence. That doctrine with its poisonous virus breaking out all over Europe has shown its presence here in America, in more or less boldness since the war opened the door. Its fertile field is among the labor of our country, especially the ignorant foreign worker. It quite naturally feeds upon the misfortunes and pains of a people. It seeks the times of distress to fatten and increase its ranks.

FOREIGN DOCTRINE INCREDIBLE.

To-day, when war's demands, which were unlimited, produced a standard of cost of living that is abnormal and fictitious it foresees a period of unemployment and consequent suffering, and immediately charges it all to our system of government. To this situation quite naturally they offer as a remedy a change of our system, the abolition of private property, and the inauguration of what they choose to call the new internationalism, in which by government feat they propose to make every man and woman equally happy, without regard to the real fundamental principles of sound success.

To the average American, for this is a foreign infusion, this doctrine is incredible. But I warn you men of business that it is taking a deeper hold upon our country than any of you perhaps conceive. It is rapidly spreading among the less well-to-do among us who are too prone to gather among themselves and turn a listening ear to the irresponsible agitator, who assures the aggrieved that their ills flow from their Government, which owes them a living upon terms of their own making. The toiler is told if he wants to work and must work he should work for himself or his Government, not any other employer. Recently a spokesman of the railway employees urged the roads should be run in the interest of the employees as against either the owners or the public. This is the Russian Soviet under which Russia is to-day prostrate. The toiler is told that the striking inequalities of our citizens as property holders is not due to individual differences but to a Government that wrongfully permits the inequalities. He is urged to demand in the name of equal possession that the Government be abolished and all denied any possessions. This doctrine refuses to admit of diversity of abilities and proposes to make all alike by leveling all to the plane of dispossession. It proposes to chop off the head of every citizen who, by his efforts and application, rises above the average standards.

WARNING IS ISSUED.

I warn the country against this frightful doctrine. No man can fail to see the food upon which it feeds, nor the growth it is bound to make unless met by a sound and well-organized campaign of education. All political parties ought to unite their agencies of information to dissipate by the light of education this nefarious and pernicious poison that is daily insinuating itself in our body politic.

I am now addressing a group of men who represent the business energy and success of this city. I am convinced if I should take a census to find how many have come to your present status by your own efforts and devoted application to principles of sound business, even starting with small beginnings and advancing wholly upon your own intelligent direction, I would find that the vast majority has come from almost nothing. In what you have done in your business career has not been limited to personal gain, but no doubt you have given employment to thousands of citizens, thereby making it possible for many of them to have their homes, to educate their children, to become active and useful factors in all good works in their immediate vicinities.

But if among you, through sloth or indolence, idleness, thriftlessness, wastefulness, or from whatever cause, there are those who prefer to sit on the proverbial store box and solve the problems of state, on which they are so busy that they have no time for work, his situation is not his own choosing or lack of choice, but the government or the system of laws under which he lives. The acuteness of this problem is commensurate with the number of this class of citizens among us.

MUST ABSORB ALL LABOR.

Unemployment which may result from demobilization will aggravate the question. Our concern should be to absorb all our labor as soon as possible. We should also endeavor to carry on a campaign of education to show the conditions necessary for steady employment of labor. Here business must be given a chance to employ labor.

Labor must be willing to take employment at a wage business can pay. The two must be cooperative. Indeed, the public must demand a policy of enterprise in which the employer must be concerned about the welfare of his labor as well as the profits of his industry. It was well expressed by some of your conventions that "If it is not for the common good it is not good for business." This should be the criterion not only for the employer but for the employee.

I believe that the American laborer is loyal to our spirit and institutions, and can not easily be turned against them, even in times of stress and storm induced by whatever cause so it is not such as may be avoided. But we can not overlook the importation of Old World principles and practices too often becoming insinuated into our labor circles from which are fomented outbreaks of lawlessness of various degrees. Within the past few weeks our Nation has witnessed outbreaks in many cities where were announced un-American doctrines and where the sight of the American uniform was hissed and our Government denounced.

DEPORTATION IS ADVOCATED.

This country is great in its boundaries and offers vast areas for occupations and residences, but it is not great enough for two allegiances. We must make it known to every comer that unless he can subscribe to the doctrines of a real Americanism this is no place for him. I vote now to forcibly deport every man and woman who hissed the appearance of an American boy in khaki. I am ready also to forcibly expel every man and woman who refuses to subscribe to a full and unqualified allegiance to this country.

We just now are contemplating the prevention of any further immigration for at least four years, a question of some serious import to business, out of which we may have to enact laws to meet certain conditions of labor.

Our chief concern is to insure a partnership between capital and labor, so that the interest of the one becomes the interest of the other. This is necessary to prevent labor from becoming a fertile field for the operation of the Bolsheviki.

It must come first by a clear conception of the problem, in which the rights of both are clearly discerned, and secondly by a fearless demand on the part of the Government for a recognition of the rights of both. This suggests the old problem of the conflict between liberty and authority.

MUST AVOID EXTREMES.

History of government seems to be an attempt to reconcile liberty and authority—both are absolutely essential. Some think the greatest boon to mankind is liberty. Others think it is law and order. Our country, happily, combined the two.

Jefferson was the greatest exponent of liberty. Hamilton was the greatest exponent of power.

While the world is set against autocracy we must avoid its extreme, bolshevism. Liberty under government, when the government is on behalf of liberty, is the solution.

This at once raises the question of our duty—now before us as a Nation just emerging from the world war, during which time in order to win the war we have made government everything and the individual nothing.

Liberty of industry is denied, and all business finds itself with the Government's strangle hold about its throat.

Our immediate duty, now that the war is over, is to get back from a war to a peace basis, which means to remove the Government's shackles on business.

When the real American doctrine is applied to present-day problems, people will demand the liberty of contract with the power of enforcement. Liberty without a corresponding responsibility is bolshevism. Enforcement of contract if no liberty was exercised in the making is autocracy. Both of these are un-American, and each is equally vicious.

Capital should be at liberty to invest, but in such a way as not to injure the public. Labor should be at liberty to discontinue a particular work, but not in violence to the injury of the public. The citizen should be at liberty to employ his talents, to apply his time to the best use of which he can make of his opportunities so long as not to interfere with or injure the public.

The function of the Government is to insure an equal opportunity to all its citizens in the rivalry of life.

CAN NOT MOLD CITIZENS.

Jefferson contended that that is the best government which governs least. That is, the best results are attained where the liberty of the citizen is least restrained in legitimate enterprise.

This is what capital wants. It is what labor asks for. It is what ambition rests upon, what aspiration consists of.

Government should not attempt to make all citizens of one mold, whether he be employer or employee. On the other hand, it should keep open wide the door of opportunity for every talent of every citizen. It should beckon to every citizen, whatever be his talent, his tendency, his tasks, so they be legitimate, to invite him to strive to excel, for this is the very essence of success of the individual and prosperity of a nation. The man who achieves should be commended. The man who fails should be stimulated to correct his mistakes in order to succeed, if possible. The Government should treat every man and woman as an independent, self-reliant, responsible citizen, not as a pensioner, not as a mere subject of paternalistic concern. Each citizen must be taught the fundamental doctrine of "sink or swim." That what he is is due to his efforts, not to paternalistic care; that he is the architect of his own fortune.

The door of opportunity must be left open. This is the real function of government. The success or failure of the citizen will therefore be his own, and the country must be made to recognize that fact in order to avoid producing on the one hand a nation of mollycoddles and on the other a nation of paternalistic dependents, both of which are equally bad.

If we fail to develop in the citizen this sense of self-reliance and responsibility, every misfortune growing out of indolence, idleness, or shiftlessness, to say nothing of waste and extravagance he will lay at the door of his government. This is the basis of anarchy and bolshevism.

DEMOBILIZATION PROBLEMS.

It is true that the Government in the case of the immediate problem of demobilization must employ every facility to prevent unemployment of labor. But this should be done not by fiat, but by providing ways for industry to prosper, so that capital may be invested profitably and labor be employed at a scale that, while it is in keeping with American standards, it will also enable the producer to market his product. Labor is justified in demanding the best conditions conducive to its employment, but it must not overlook the ability of his employer to market the finished product. Conditions of production which leave the producer without a market because of the high cost of production will prevent the industry from continuance. That means unemployment, which, of course, means loss of wages and a further interruption between the producer and consumer. The greatest demand in industry is measured by the consumer from the standpoint of labor. If labor, which makes up the great bulk of consumption, is deprived of wages from whatever cause, the producer will be injured to that degree. Business paralyzed by labor conditions will display its worst effects upon the laborer, who under the scale of high cost of living must be employed or suffer.

In that event we will have a situation where anarchy will lift its head and the slogan "kill and burn" will be heard. This is bolshevism in its worst form. It is a conflict between those who have and those who have not, in which those who have not undertake to seize what is possessed by those who have.

The first symptoms of these outbreaks are unemployment and consequent distress from want.

These conditions are seized upon by the leaders of anarchy to organize against government. Law and order are resisted and disregard for law, our only stay against crime and violence, is encouraged.

Liberty becomes license and government a sham.

DANGERS ALWAYS IMMINENT.

These dangers, always imminent in times of distress, breed out of ignorance of economic principles and feed upon undisciplined passion so freely displayed in times of crises. To-day we see the same spirit of antagonism to law and all legal restraints rapidly spreading over the world. Congress was asked to vote $100,000,000 to feed Europe upon the specific representation that it will prevent the spread of bolshevism. This representation comes from the highest source. While all of us stand ready to assist the suffering in Europe we doubt the remedy proposed for the antidote of a cult of the type of bolshevism, Mere appeal through the stomach is at best but temporary, but the real remedy is the assurance that the time is here when respect for law must be compelled.

I have a few suggestions to make as remedies for this disease.

Open wide the door of opportunity for capital to invest in the enlargement of existent industrials and also in the development of new industries.

So soon as possible unshackle industry by the removal of hindering regulations, so that the war essentials no longer needed for war purposes can be converted into peace industries, and the nonessentials, discontinued during the war as of no value for war purposes, may be stimulated for peace purposes.

Let the Government, so soon as possible, cease to be a competitor in production in all such industries as can be carried on by private enterprise, thereby encouraging those who have capital to embark into production on such scale as the demands for the article will warrant. In other words, maintain the principle of private ownership and operation wherever possible under the law of supply and demand.

Legislation should be enacted to permit the development of hydroelectric power by private contract under such regulation as to amply protect the public. This increase of power in industrial development will enhance prosperity by increasing the output of labor, thereby multiplying the conveniences of life and reducing the cost of living.

ENLISTED MEN'S RIGHTS.

The vast waste of power permitted in our streams by either refusal or neglect to permit the conversion of the water flow into power should be corrected.

In lines in which private enterprise can not fairly compete, such as road building or other public improvements, the Government may well embark upon a building program. This should be dictated by a policy of employment of labor in needed public works for the public benefit.

This activity should extend to the Reclamation Service to utilize waste swamp land and arid tracts throughout the country under such guidance as will insure not only employment of labor but an increase of acreage for production.

The labor situation, which may become acute by demobilization, should be relieved along national lines, with especial regard for the rights of the enlisted men, who must not be made to suffer for his sacrifice. Soldiers should not be discharged in the centers, but carried to the communities from whence they came and without unnecessary delay. They should be provided by such allowances as to reasonably assist them in replacement in industry, with a choice of resuming the places which they left to enter the service.

While demobilization should bear some relation to industry, the soldier should not be refused his discharge beyond the day his service is not needed by the military situation. The Government can not be justified in detaining the enlisted man in the service when no longer needed, for fear his discharge might embarrass the labor situation of those who were not in the service, but who were identified with war work in munition plants at abnormal wages. Such a policy will be and should be rebuked in unmeasured terms as a crime against patriotism.

While the abnormal cost of living is reflected in the high scale of wages, this scale can not be reduced to normal except as the cost of living is reduced.

This restoration to normal conditions involves a problem.

REASON FOR HIGH COSTS.

The cost of living is not an increase of value so much as an increase of price. This is largely reflected in not only an inflation of credit, due to the stupendous war borrowing which has suddenly increased our annual outlay from a billion to nearly $20,000,000,000, but also to an inflation of our currency.

Whereas our per capita circulation at the close of the Civil War was but $16, it has now reached the enormous sum of $55, or three and a half times as much.

Even in the famous silver campaign in 1896, where the advocates of the quantitative principle of finance demanded greater circulation, the per capita circulation was but $31.

The virtue of our Federal Reserve System lies in our ability to so expand our credit that we may avoid a financial crisis such as used to come every 20 years. But that very remedy contains the specific danger. We are now in the period of inflation. How will deflation or contraction be accomplished, if at all?

This increase of price without an increase of value may not seriously injure save in case of unemployment. In that case the problem of living becomes acute and the Government faces a most serious situation. This is an additional reason why capital and labor must avoid needless antagonism, but willingly cooperate in order to insure against unemployment.

If industry can not safely invest its capital to employ labor at this abnormal scale, so that the finished product may find a market, industry must stop. In that case labor will be unemployed, and while labor becomes the greatest sufferer, capital must suffer from lack of investment.

Our country can not permit an army of unemployed men to beg for bread. Herein lies the seeds of trouble which may become Bolshevik, the one most dangerous element in the world of to-day, because of its disregard for law, the very sheet anchor of our liberties and the foundation of our national prosperity.

FIND WORK FOR ALL.

And I leave off as I began, that the chief function of the Government is not to employ labor, but to keep open the door for the employment of labor so that every man who wants to work can find a place at a reasonable wage, and every dollar that he wishes to invest can find an investment at a reasonable profit.

The inevitable dispute between labor and capital should find an agency, either official or unofficial, by which the two sides can be fairly represented and adjudicated in the interest of the public as well as in obedience to the laws of equity in the case. The Government should be interested in this phase of the industrial problem.

Such a body can be selected for the purposes of conciliation. However, it should never be overlooked that good labor conditions can not result from mere Government fiat. They must come from a condition which permits industry to employ labor steadily and at good wages. The one supreme demand of the hour is, in my judgment, such legislation as will insure steady employment here. That means we must depend upon producing here rather than elsewhere. Every article purchased from abroad that could have been produced here means displacement of that labor here by employing labor in the country from which we purchased the article.

Our people can not be unaware of the modern cosmopolitan philanthropy which is styled the new internationalism by which we scorn at the idea of our legislation on behalf of our own people. The campaign now on to lose the American aspiration in a maze of European interests, to remove all economic barriers and legislate for the world rather than for America sounds well, but carries with it too much European customs and conditions of economy to suit a country whose laws and privileges have for a century seen an exodus from Europe to America by a steady stream of immigration. The latest device for displacing a national policy based upon a real American spirit is the proposed constitution of the world, in which our national destiny is lost in international interests.

NATION HAS BEEN BLESSED.

This Nation has been wonderfully blessed by the character of her laws and institutions, her principles, policies, and business freedom. Her industrial achievements are the wonder of all ages. Her captains of industry are the foremost of the world. Her labor is the best skilled, most independent, and prosperous. This has been made possible by the cooperative spirit between the employer and employee under a policy of protection of American labor against the cheaper European competitor. To this policy the country has committed the advocacy and leadership of a great political party. Its greatest proponent was the splendid leader of the American policy of protection whose memory we have so recently honored.

In this presence and upon this occasion when our thoughts are turned to the stupendous problems of reconstruction as affecting the labor situation of the Nation, and as would be reflected in the life and services of our martyred McKinley, we reaffirm our devotion to this American policy to protect American labor against the cheaper labor of the Old World, and will refuse to exchange a national policy for the new free-trade cult in which we are asked to cease legislation for our own people, to enter upon an international program of legislation for all the world. The country will take its stand firmly for an American policy of protection to insure steady employment of labor on an American scale to preserve the American standard of life. If Europe wishes to come to our standard we will rejoice in her decision. But until that is reached we will continue to maintain our policy of taking care of our own household first without any undue entangling alliances with foreign countries.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK CLARK, OF FLORIDA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 12, 1919,

On amendment offered by him to the naval appropriation bill for water pipe line to Key West, Fla., at a cost of $2,000,000.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. This amendment is in harmony with the declared purpose of the bill as stated in the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs:

It has been the purpose of the committee in making recommendations to reduce all appropriations to the lowest possible figure consistent with the increased activities, efficiency, and proper administration of the service, and to that end the committee has labored by reducing appropriations in every instance where it was felt that no harm to the service would result.

Again—

Under "Public works, Bureau of Yards and Docks," the committee feels that it would be inadvisable at this time to recommend any appropriations for new projects, enlargements, or developments, and in this bill has recommended only appropriations which are considered necessary for the proper care, maintenance, and operation of existing properties.

The importance of Key West as a naval base has been too long recognized by high naval officers to need elaboration by me. I can do no better than quote from these sources.

In 1822 the Hon. Smith Thompson, Secretary of the Navy, in response to a resolution of the United States House of Representatives requesting the President to inform the House "what appropriations will be required to enable him to fortify Thompson's Island, usually called Key West, and whether a naval depot, established at that island, protected by fortifications, will not afford facilities in defending the commerce of the United States," said:

That the geographical situation of the island referred to in the resolution has for some time past attracted attention, and been considered peculiarly important both as a military position and in reference to the commerce of the United States.

These are some of the obvious benefits in time of peace, but its advantages in time of war with any European power having West Indian possessions are still more important, both as it respects the protection of our own commerce and the annoyance of our enemy. An enemy with a superior naval force occupying this position could completely intercept the whole trade between those parts of our country lying north and east of it, and those to the west, and seal up all our ports within the Gulf of Mexico.

Under date of May 11, 1823, when asking for an increased number of vessels and men, Commodore Porter wrote:

From the importance of the trade of Cuba and the Gulf of Mexico, the whole of which is protected from this place with a force not equal to one frigate, I presume my requests will not be considered extravagant. The arrivals and departures of the American vessels from the port of Habana alone average about 30 a week and those from Matanzas about 20. Not a day elapses but that great numbers of American vessels are to be met passing through the Gulf, and since our establishment here they daily in numbers pass in sight of us. I mention these facts to give you an idea of the importance of this station and to show the propriety of augmenting the force by the additions which I have asked.

In November, 1823, Commodore Rodgers, United States Navy, made a report containing this:

Nature had made it the advance post from which to watch and guard our commerce passing to and from the Mississippi, while at the same time its peculiar situation and the excellence of its harbor point it out as the most certain key to the commerce of Habana, to that of the whole Gulf of Mexico, and to the returning trade of Jamaica, and I venture to predict that the first important naval contest in which this country shall be engaged will be in the neighborhood of this very island.

Seventy-five years afterwards this prophecy was fulfilled, and with Key West as a base our fleet engaged in the most important naval contest ever fought in the Gulf, destroyed the Spanish fleet, and drove Spain from the Western Hemisphere.

In wars and rumors of wars has the importance of Key West as a naval base been demonstrated. During the Civil War more ships were stationed there than at any other port in the United States, and but for its occupancy by the northern forces as a naval base the result of the war might have been different. In 1873, when the capture of the Virginius threatened war with Spain, nearly every ship in the Navy was hurried to Key West, which was made the base of all operations. In 1898, on the breaking out of the War with Spain, every available naval vessel was again sent to Key West, and the Oregon and Marietta made their record run from California.

When we entered into the war against Germany the strategical importance of Key West was again recognized by the Navy Department.

Its position on the Straits of Florida—through which 5,000 vessels, aggregating from 20,000,000 to 25,000,000 tons pass annually—commands the protection of American commerce in any war. In all past history this position has been of the greatest importance, and no matter where on the Western Hemisphere the war may be, the American commerce in the Straits of Florida will have to be protected from Key West as a naval base.

A distinguished naval historian has said that some day the Government of the United States will recognize "the capacity of the Florida Reef as an advantageous naval station—a sort of Downs or St. Helens Roads in the West Indian Seas."

The military branches of the Government have recognized its importance, but it is the Congress of the United States that seems loath to do for Key West what the Navy Department recommends as of utmost importance.

On December 29, 1829, Commodore David Porter, United States Navy, made an extensive report on Key West, from which I cite the following:

SIR: In consequence of your application to me for my opinion of Thompsons Island, or Key West, I have to state that since the year 1823 I have from time to time been making myself acquainted with the Florida coast and keys—part of the time in command of the United States squadron, and subsequently in command of the Mexican force in that quarter; and perhaps there is no man living better qualified than myself to give an opinion on the subject, as my information is derived from actual observation and practical experience.

The harbor of Key West, in my opinion, is the best harbor within the limits of the United States or its territories to the south of the Chesapeake.

1. For its easy access and egress at all times and with all winds.

2. For the excellent anchorage and security it affords, both in the inner and outer harbor, for ships of the largest class. Leading to the harbor of Key West are several excellent channels, some affording water for the largest class of ships, the others suited to the vessel drawing 10 and 11 feet water.

The advantages which Key West affords in a commercial point of view are:

1. Its vicinity to the island of Cuba and port of Habana, having a ready market for all articles placed there in deposit or left by the wreckers, of whom this is the rendezvous of those on the coast.

2. It being a convenient touching place for all vessels bound to and from the Gulf of Mexico, Bay of Honduras, and the coasts of Louisiana and Florida.

As a naval station Key West has decidedly the advantage over all others I have ever known:

1. In its susceptibility of fortification.
2. The ease and number of its approaches with all winds.
3. The difficulty of blockade, as I have proved while in command of the Mexican squadron, it requiring a blockading force equal to three or four times the force to be blockaded to keep up an efficient blockade.
4. The ease with which supplies may be thrown in, despite the presence of an enemy.

* * * * * * *

In speaking of Key West as a naval station, I have reference only as to its being employed as a depot for stores and a rendezvous for our ships of war; but even as a place for the establishment of a navy yard it has most decidedly the advantage over every other place south of the Chesapeake.

* * * * * * *

These facts and opinions are stated after an experience of nearly seven years.

The advantages of its location as a military and naval station has no equal except Gibraltar.

1. It commands the outlet of all the trade between Jamaica, Caribbean Sea, the Bay of Honduras, and the Gulf of Mexico.
2. It protects the outlet and inlet of all the trade of the Gulf of Mexico, the whole western country of Louisiana and Florida.
3. It holds in subjection the trade of Cuba.
4. It is a check to the naval forces of whatever nation may possess Cuba. It is to Cuba what Gibraltar is to Ceuta.

It is to the Gulf of Mexico, etc., what Gibraltar is to the Mediterranean.

* * * * * * *

In making this statement respecting Key West I am actuated by no other feeling than the desire that my country should not, by the prejudices, partialities, interested views, and errors of others, be induced to lose sight of the great advantages it presents, whether looked at in a military or commercial point of view.

You may say that these opinions are ancient history; but less than a year ago Assistant Secretary of the Navy Franklin D. Roosevelt, in a joint letter to the Secretaries of War and the Navy, said:

Fortunately in the past the United States has not been forced to conduct a major campaign in defense of its shores. For this reason largely, and perhaps to an extent because Key West is a somewhat advanced and isolated position on our coast, its strategic and tactical importance has not been so much to the fore as other localities in the world. However, the Navy Department has always appreciated the military importance of this particular site as a base for naval operations in case we were forced to conduct operations on or near our own coast.

A radius of 1,100 miles swept from Key West as a center includes within the circumference of the circle nearly all the following positions: The entire Mexican, Central American, Canal Zone, and Colombian coasts, the islands of Curarao, Cuba, Haiti, Porto Rico, and St. Thomas, Bermuda, the Bahamas, and the coast of the United States to New York. All of the more important passages leading from Europe into the Gulf of Mexico are included within sweep. Its strategic importance as a base for naval operations is therefore clearly shown.

The present war may, before its close, find hostile submarines of the cruising type operating on this side of the ocean. All of the shipping from the Gulf of Mexico, including the tank steamers, carrying that most vital necessity—oil—must pass through the Yucatan Channel or the Straits of Florida. This shipping should be protected, when the necessity arises, by every means in our power. Except for Habana, which is small, and a few anchorages behind the reefs, there are no harbors where the above shipping may take refuge from the submarine except at Key West. As a base for offensive operations against submarines, Key West is ideal, and the Navy Department has taken advantage of this fact to mobilize certain of its forces there, and is taking steps to further expand the facilities of the port.

The Navy and War Departments have consistently sought to develop Key West in accordance with this view.

The present normal activities at Key West were thus described by Rear Admiral Fletcher, United States Navy, in 1918:

There is on the island of Key West, under the jurisdiction of the Navy Department, the naval station, the naval air station, the naval training camp, the new naval hospital, and the distance-control radio station.

The one drawback to Key West is the lack of a supply of fresh water, and to this fact can be attributed the failure to make of Key West the important naval station that its strategic position demands. The present sources of fresh water are: Rain water stored in cisterns, water shipped by rail from the mainland, and distilled water. With these combined sources there is annually a large deficiency, and from February to August the situation frequently becomes acute. For a time the Army and Navy depended upon the rainfall for their supply of fresh water, but with the development of Key West as a military and naval base this was so uncertain that both the Army and Navy maintain distilling plants, which are entirely inadequate to the present needs and preclude contemplated developments.

An appropriation of $2,500,000 has been made for a submarine base at Key West, and my amendment appropriating $2,000,000 to furnish fresh water to the naval station there is not a new project or the enlargement or development of existing conditions.

It is as futile to classify supplying fresh water to meet the necessities of the enlarged naval activities contemplated at Key West as "a new project" as it would be to classify an appropriation for food for the men as "a new project."

I am fully sustained by the Secretary of the Navy in my contention that this is not a new project, but one "necessary to carry on the building program or its auxiliary necessities." This he made very clear in his testimony before the House Committee on Naval Affairs, as will be seen from this colloquy:

Mr. KELLEY. We can pretty well afford to let new projects rest. We have gone through the war and the great stress is over, and can we not just about hold things in statu quo for a year or until we know what is going to happen? All these navy yards ask for extensive improvements which do not hinge in any way on existing facilities in the yards, but are entirely new projects.

Secretary DANIELS. I have recommended none except where they were necessary to carry on the building program or its auxiliary necessities.

Mr. KELLEY. And wherever we find, if you happen to have overlooked anything of that kind, an item which seems to us not to bear directly on the building program at these navy yards in the way of extensions or improvements we might very reasonably cut them out, might we not?

Secretary DANIELS. I think you will find they have been cut out.

The Secretary of the Navy submitted an estimate of $2,000,000 for this water-supply system, and my amendment is to give effect to his recommendation.

Testifying at an investigation in Key West on May 19, 1918, Admiral Fletcher said:

It was not believed that the activities of the Navy can be increased to any large extent without an increase in the present facilities for providing water. It is understood that the naval air station is to be increased very shortly.

An enlargement of the present naval station to accommodate a large force of submarines and such other light-draft vessels as will be needed in connection with the use of this place as an operating station, and with these increased facilities in the station it will be undoubtedly necessary to have an increased water supply.

The method proposed of providing the increased supply of water at Key West by a pipe line along the line of the Florida Coast Railway from the mainland. This has been brought to my attention since I arrived here, in January. As far as I can see, it seems to me to be the only feasible plan by which a proper and sufficient supply of water can be provided in the shortest possible time at a probably minimum expense.

At the hearing before the Naval Committee on December 6, 1918, the following occurred:

Mr. BROWNING. Of course, it is not within your province—it is one of the developments of the department—but do you think under the existing conditions of peace that we want a submarine base at Key West, and that this money ought to be spent there?

Admiral PARKS. I do. I think that is one of the most important points for a submarine base.

Mr. BROWNING. Where are our submarine bases at the present time? There is one at New London.

Admiral PARKS. New London is the largest submarine base.

Mr. BROWNING. What are the others?

Admiral PARKS. We are building one at Hampton Roads.

Mr. BUTLER. And one at Charleston?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a regular base.

Mr. BUTLER. But they have accommodations there?

Admiral PARKS. Some. The important one south of Hampton Roads is on the Florida coast—Key West.

Mr. BROWNING. During the war; but why now?

Admiral PARKS. It is not necessary for immediate use, if the war is over; but the particular purpose of a submarine base at that point is to protect the transit line for oil; that is the principal thing.

Mr. BUTLER. The transit line for oil?

Admiral PARKS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Through the Gulf.

Mr. BROWNING. I can see, if we are in war, the importance of that base; but I can not see, with the war ended and with no chance of war for some years to come, and with this $2,500,000 that has not been obligated, why the project at this time should not be postponed until the Navy knows just what they expect to do, and tells us just what they expect to do. In my opinion, the item should be taken out and the $2,500,000 already appropriated should be permitted to revert to the Treasury.

It seems reasonable to suppose that the Naval Committee would not have omitted from the appropriation bill an item that the Secretary of the Navy considers so important if it had had time to fully investigate the proposition, in view of the very positive statement of the Secretary of the Navy that he had recommended no new projects and no improvements "except where they were necessary to carry on the building program or its auxiliary necessities."

I quote again from the testimony of the Secretary of the Navy on this subject:

Secretary DANIELS. We have undertaken to build a submarine base at Key West, which, of course, is the strategic point for the Gulf and Caribbean, and we have appropriated money to do that, in addition to the station we have there now. The purpose is to get fresh water. I think the only fresh water there is rain water.

The CHAIRMAN. And what they bring down in barges.

Secretary DANIELS. Yes; or by rail.

Mr. ESTOPINAL. Could we not get some place where we could find water?

Secretary DANIELS. You could do that if you had the strategic advantages. Key West juts out, and it is the only place possessing such advantages.

* * * * * * *

Mr. ESTOPINAL. Let us get to a place with water. We do not want to bring water 130 miles. There are many places where we can get both land and water.

Secretary DANIELS. Not a strategic place for the Caribbean and the Gulf. In the Spanish-American War Key West was a very small station, but we had to utilize it, and if there were any war involving the Panama Canal it would be important.

Mr. KELLEY. How many submarine stations have we?

Secretary DANIELS. We have a number, but the only two we have that are of the first importance on the Atlantic and the Gulf are at New London, Conn., and Key West. You might say we have an important one at San Diego. We have them at other places.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is there not land or harbors down there available just north of Key West that could be utilized so that this amount of money might be saved?

Secretary DANIELS. No; there is no place at all.

Mr. BRITTEN. How much has the Navy Department expended up to the present time on the submarine station at Key West?

Secretary DANIELS. You appropriated $1,025,000 to begin it.

Mr. BUTLER. That was a war appropriation?

Secretary DANIELS. That was an appropriation made in the last bill.

Mr. PETERS. How much of that has been spent?

Secretary DANIELS. Not very much. During the war we were not able to get work done.

Mr. HICKS. I think the Rivers and Harbors Committee has appropriated money in their bill for dredging there.

Secretary DANIELS. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. What is the population of Key West?

Secretary DANIELS. Twenty-five thousand, I think.

Mr. KELLEY. Could not Charleston be used as a submarine base?

Secretary DANIELS. That is too far away.

Mr. BROWNING. I do not think the population of Key West is 25,000.

Secretary DANIELS. Yes, it is; or I would guess that.

Mr. BRITTEN. Have you considered the establishment of a submarine base at the Virgin Islands?

Secretary DANIELS. You would have to spend more money there than at Key West, and it would not be so good for the purpose. We have a station at Key West, and expenditures have already been made there.

Mr. BRITTEN. We have only spent a small amount of money there in comparison with what is being suggested now. That appropriation of $1,025,000 made last year has not been expended.

Secretary DANIELS. We have spent several millions before that at Key West. Key West strategically is the place for this submarine base. It is the strategic point for the Caribbean Sea and the Gulf. I will say this, that when this matter was taken up we went into it very carefully, and so insistent was Admiral Benson that this was the ideal place and the only place that he very strongly urged that it was of such great importance that the President should provide for the water system out of his fund for national defense. It did not seem to me that it was a proper matter to bring before the President to be provided for out of that fund, but that it was a matter for Congress to pass upon. While it was greatly needed, I was not willing to ask the President to consider it, because it was a naval project, and we could not get it done immediately.

It costs the Army about $25,000. If this appropriation is made, it will furnish 4,000,000 gallons a day. The city of Key West will bond for $400,000 to establish a distributing system and pay the Government for the water used by the city, the cost of which is conservatively placed at $125,000. The East Coast Railway has agreed to take water from the Government, and its needs will amount to more than $120,000. It is also proposed to furnish water to the planters on the Keys, over which the pipe line will be laid, for irrigating purposes, thereby greatly increasing their productivity. From this source the Government would derive at first about $75,000 a year. The Government would, therefore, receive from sale of water $220,000 and save approximately $100,000 for water used by the Army and Navy and the cost of upkeep of distilling plants. Competent engineers have placed the cost of operation and maintenance and upkeep at $200,000 a year, leaving a net income to the Government from this investment of approximately 10 per cent a year.

I quote now from the testimony of Rear Admiral Parks before the House Naval Committee on December 6, 1918:

The CHAIRMAN. Please tell us about this submarine base, as a question of policy, and the water system, including the purchase of land and the necessary rights of way, $2,000,000. We should like to have a pretty full exposition of that.

Admiral PARKS. Key West is on a small key, not far from the main Florida coast, and has a small civil population—say, about 20,000 people. It is the terminus of the Florida East Coast Railroad, by which connection is made to Habana. It has certain Army fortifications and usually about 900 men and a naval station of small capacity, where vessels have been based for protection of the passage between the keys and Cuba. The passage is used by the oil ships coming from Mexico and the Texas coast. The whole water supply there is from rain water that is caught and water that is brought in tank cars from the mainland and that secured from condensers. The water from condensers costs $7 a thousand gallons at the present time, and for several months it has been impossible for the Navy Department to secure condenser tubes for short establishments, and all condensers put in have had to be jet condensers. Distillation is always an expensive method of securing fresh water; $7 a thousand gallons is a tremendous high rate to pay for water. The water brought down in tank cars costs approximately $3 a thousand gallons, and tank-car costs necessarily mean more or less congestion on that single railroad to transport those cars back and forth. It has not been found convenient to get and operate sufficient tank cars to give the people an ordinary amount of water, and it is estimated that the people have gotton along there up to last July with about 173,000 gallons a day. That is an entirely too small a quantity for ordinary purposes.

This proposition is unique in these respects:

1. That it is not asked for by the people of Key West as a means of distributing money in the community, but is recommended by the Navy Department for the proper maintenance of present conditions and developments in the naval activities at that place.

2. That it is probably the only project for which an appropriation has ever been asked for the development of the Navy which will afford a handsome financial return from the expenditure.

At the hearing at Key West, from which I have quoted Admiral Parks's testimony, it developed that the amount of water necessary for the improved and enlarged facilities of the naval station at Key West costs the Government about $75,000 a year.

Amendment to the Indian Appropriation Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM W. HASTINGS,

OF OKLAHOMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, January 25, 1919.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I want to discuss briefly the amendment proposed by me to strike out the parenthetical clauses excepting oil and gas leases in the proviso limiting the appropriation of $185,000, in section 18, for expense of administration of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma, so that the amendment will read:

Provided further, That hereafter no part of said appropriation shall be used in forwarding the undisputed claims to be paid from individual moneys of restricted allottees or their heirs, or in forwarding uncontested agricultural and mineral leases made by individual restricted Indian allottees, or their heirs, to the Secretary of the Interior for approval, but all such undisputed claims or uncontested leases now required to be approved under existing law by the Secretary of the Interior shall be paid, approved, rejected, or disapproved by the Superintendent for the Five Civilized Tribes of Oklahoma: Provided, however, That any party aggrieved by any decision or order of the Superintendent for the Five Civilized Tribes of Oklahoma may appeal from the same to the Secretary of the Interior within 30 days from the date of said decision or order.

It will be seen that this amendment only provides that the undisputed claims or uncontested leases shall be paid, rejected, approved, or disapproved by the Superintendent for the Five Civilized Tribes, and that any aggrieved party has a right to appeal from the decision or order of the superintendent to the Secretary of the Interior within 30 days. There ought not to be any objection to this amendment.

In the first place, it will be noted that no supervision is taken away from any restricted Indian, but that supervision only in undisputed claims and uncontested leases is transferred from the Secretary of the Interior to the Superintendent for the Five Civilized Tribes.

Let us examine the amendment and see what is attempted to be accomplished by it and why it should be enacted, and if there could be any legitimate objection to it.

In the first place, the Superintendent for the Five Civilized Tribes is a Federal official, nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and is on a par with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. He is located at Muskogee, Okla., where all of the enrollment, allotment, and other records of the members of the Five Civilized Tribes are kept. He has approximately 250 civil-service employees under him. He has numerous field clerks and other employees, stationed in practically every county in eastern Oklahoma where restricted Indians reside. He can call upon them for any information with reference to any claim presented or lease submitted for approval. He has in his office a bureau headed by an expert oil man, who has under him assistants to ascertain all the facts necessary to arrive at a fair value for any lease on any tract of land allotted to a restricted member of the Five Civilized Tribes. These men are honest, experienced, and competent, and this amendment seeks only to confer upon the superintendent authority to approve undisputed claims and uncontested leases.

There were enrolled as members of the Five Civilized Tribes 101,506 persons. Of them 78,101 were citizens by blood and 37,167 were enrolled as restricted Indians, being of one-half or more Indian blood. The original rolls were made in 1902 and the newborn children were enrolled up to March 4, 1906. It is estimated that one-third of the enrolled members of these tribes are dead. Restrictions have been removed from many under existing law, and it is estimated that there are remaining 23,441 living restricted members of the Five Civilized Tribes. As before stated, the amendment does not take away any supervision over any restricted Indian, and it does not, as some assert, transfer the supervision to locally elected officers in Oklahoma, but to trusted, competent Federal officials, all of whom, save the superintendent, are under the civil service. There are about as many employees under the superintendent at Muskogee as there are under the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in Washington, and it is contended that inasmuch as all the records are in Muskogee and that inasmuch as a large number of field clerks are scattered over the eastern part of Oklahoma, with whom the superintendent can communicate by letter, telephone, or telegraph, the office there is in a much better position with first-hand information to serve and protect the restricted Indians than Federal employees in Washington, 1,500 miles away.

The report of the Superintendent for the Five Civilized Tribes for the year ending June 30, 1918, at page 44, shows that 6,842 letters were received from the department for the fiscal year, or an average of about 22 daily; and the same report shows that 7,475 letters were mailed the department, or an average of about 25 daily.

When I came to Congress three years ago every agricultural lease had to be forwarded to Washington for approval, and every claim of every kind and character, payable out of restricted Indian money, had to be sent to Washington for approval, as well as all oil and gas leases. There were many vexatious delays. Instances were brought to my attention where claims were sent backward and forward; first through the local field clerk; then the superintendent at Muskogee; and then through the Commissioner of Indian Affairs at Washington to the Department of the Interior for approval. They were sent back for additional information and returned to Washington, so that oftentimes it took two or three years to get claims paid. Practically, no agricultural leases were sent the department for approval. The law was ignored because of these delays.

At that time an investigation disclosed that it took an average of three to six months to get oil leases approved. Last year Congress remedied this in part by providing that the undisputed claims might be paid and that all leases, other than oil and gas, might be approved by the superintendent. This present amendment only enlarges that supervision by giving the superintendent authority to approve all leases, including oil and gas, which are uncontested. When an oil lease is submitted for approval the enrollment and allotment records are looked up. The status of the allottee is examined. Information is secured through the oil bureau of the superintendent as to the bonus value of the land, the production, depth of the sand, and every other fact necessary to determine whether the lease should be approved. Under existing law a report has to be prepared by the superintendent and forwarded through the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to the Secretary of the Interior for approval.

These leases are all made on approved printed forms, and while it does not now take as long as it did three years ago, when threatened legislation expedited consideration of them, there are still many unnecessary delays in the forwarding for approval of oil and gas leases. The result is a loss to the restricted Indian, because it is well known in Oklahoma that a commercial lease is more valuable than a lease upon land owned by a restricted Indian. One of the reasons for the difference is the delay in forwarding the lease for approval to the department at Washington. There can be no excuse for it. No one assigns a good reason for it. No one asserts that there is any additional information in the Indian Office at Washington. All the information is submitted in the report of the Superintendent for the Five Civilized Tribes in each instance. It is a pro forma matter, purely perfunctory. It results in delays and is not helpful to the Indian.

When a lease is made the lessee has to make arrangements for money with which to drill the lease. He pays a premium upon the bond which he must give in each case. In times past the lessee, in order to secure prompt action from the department, either engaged a representative in Washington, wired or wrote his Congressman, or sent a representative here from Oklahoma to urge early action upon his lease.

Of course, this legislation is opposed by the department, as it opposes all legislation that may confer greater authority upon any officials in the field outside of the city of Washington. Every department opposes decentralization and every department will talk about "checks and balances," as if there were something magical about the term. Every member of the Oklahoma delegation favors this legislation and every Indian, restricted and unrestricted, without exception, who is not in the employ of the Government, and therefore, not under the influence of the department, favors this legislation. It would result in having quicker action upon the claims and leases submitted for approval and the rights of the restricted Indians would be preserved. In the event of anyone being dissatisfied with any action on the part of the superintendent, he would have the right of appeal to the Secretary of the Interior. The oil and gas leases upon the land of a restricted Indian will then be as valuable as if given upon the land of an unrestricted Indian.

This would not only be advantageous to the Indians but it would result in a great saving to the Government in that thousands of letters and reports would not have to be prepared and forwarded by the superintendent to the department. It would result in a reduction of the clerical force, not only in the office of the superintendent at Muskogee but in the department in Washington receiving these letters and reports, examining, passing upon, and returning them. The money thus appropriated for the Superintendent for the Five Civilized Tribes could be used, in my judgment, to a better advantage for the restricted members of the tribe, because more field men, more expert farmers, and more field matrons could be employed to go out among the Indians and assist them in a practical way to learn farming, gardening, stock raising, and how to care for their homes, which would greatly benefit them. It would certainly help them much more than if the money is spent for stenographers and clerks to prepare and forward reports on undisputed claims and uncontested leases. Remember always that civil-service employees of the Government in Oklahoma are charged with the duty and responsibility of carefully safeguarding the rights of the restricted Indians and that this amendment does not remove any of these safeguards.

I was reared in the Indian Territory and am a member of the Cherokee Tribe. I have represented the Cherokees all my life, before coming to Congress. As a member of the tribe, I assert that so far as I know, every other member of the Cherokee Tribe and every member of the other Five Civilized Tribes, not under the influence of the department, favors this legislation. It can not be harmful to the Indians themselves. They have suffered from the delays incident to this system too long. I have lived under long-distance government all of my life, and I hate it more than words can tell. These Indians for 100 years governed themselves. They had their own schools, their own courts, and their own legislature. They made their own laws, and the individual members made their own contracts. This amendment only asks that the restricted members may have the privilege of going before a representative of the Federal Government, see him in person, explain the matters involved, and get expeditious action upon it at home, with the right of appeal in the event anyone is aggrieved. I assert that the rights of the restricted Indians are protected by the amendment, and that the amendment as written in the bill should be retained therein.

The Naval Appropriation Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE HUDDLESTON.

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 11, 1919.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, the bill as presented carries an appropriation for the Navy for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1919, and in addition to this legitimate purpose the bill commits the United States definitely to a policy of vast naval expansion. This policy to which our country is thus to be committed is to have the greatest Navy in the world; it is the policy of naval competition in which we express the purpose to allow no nation of the world to exceed us in naval armament.

We see that the bill has two purposes: First, to maintain our present Navy and to build ships authorized by previous Congresses, and, second, to definitely commit our country to this new policy of competition in armaments.

NO ADEQUATE PROVISION FOR DISCHARGE OF ENLISTED MEN.

I seriously object to the bill as an appropriation bill, for the reason that it makes no adequate provision for the discharge of men in the Navy who enlisted for the duration of the war. The war is over. These men now feel that they should be discharged. The bill does not provide for this. They may be retained in service within the number appropriated for until their places can be filled according to the leisurely methods of recruiting now being followed, unless perchance articles of peace should be signed and the President proclaim the end of the war before that time. It is very clear, as to the majority of the enlisted men now in the Navy, that they can not be discharged within the next four to six months.

I am dissatisfied with this aspect of the bill and would be reluctant to accept it even were it not loaded down with the objectionable provision committing us to a policy of navalism of an extreme and dangerous type. I think our boys who have enlisted in the Navy are entitled to their discharges. We owe it to them that they shall not be retained longer than absolutely necessary. Their families have need of them. They wish to go home and to engage in business and take up the normal course of their lives. I feel it is unjust that they should be retained in the Navy merely to keep in commission ships for which there is no present need.

A SPECIOUS ARGUMENT.

We are urged to commit our country at this time to a policy of competitive naval expansion with the argument that in some mysterious way the adoption of this measure will strengthen the President's hands and enable him to induce the nations to agree at the peace table upon a policy of disarmament. We are urged to adopt a policy of armaments in order to get other nations to agree to disarm. That is the argument that is now being used in behalf of this bill. This argument can have no validity unless it means that we are to use the threat of building a vast Navy as a means of bringing other nations to terms. We are to hold the big stick over other nations and to coerce by threats. The mere statement of the argument refutes it. It is childish and unworthy. It places our Nation upon the low and contemptible plane of the bully. It compromises the dignity of the Government of a great and free people. I will not place my country in such an unworthy position.

The excuse for entering upon this policy that it will help the President is a mere pretense; it is not based in sincerity. I remember that in October last the Secretary of the Navy brought forward this identical plan and policy. He then announced that it was to be presented to Congress and its approval asked. That was before the armistice had been proposed or signed. At that time the policy was a war measure. Everyone expected when the armistice was signed that the policy would be abandoned. It was most surprising to learn from the President's address to Congress when it assembled in December that he still approved the program. His address, by clear implication, urged it. We did not know then that Germany was utterly crushed, and many believed that the policy of vast naval expansion was being urged as a measure against Germany still as a war measure. The American people had fought to end all war and to make future peace secure. The war had been won and greater armaments seemed uncalled for. No one dreamed that the conference then about to be assembled in Paris would not agree on disarmament. No differences of opinion had then arisen.

The proceedings of the peace conference have proceeded along the lines contemplated. We have no information that differences on disarmament have arisen. For all we know the situation is the same as it was before the conference assembled, except that we now know that Germany is wholly crushed and can not be again for generations a threat to the peace of the world.

We find that the policy of competitive building of fleets was desired first as a war measure, next as a measure in contemplation of an uncrushed Germany, and now is desired either as a permanent peace measure or as a big stick, to coerce our late war associates into agreeing to a satisfactory peace. The situation is absurd. The reasons presented are specious. If there be any good reason for entering upon this policy at the present time it has not been given us. We are acting in the dark. Somehow I can not get myself to believe that the measure is in furtherance of any definite or well-considered purpose.

THIS IS NO TIME TO ADOPT A NAVAL POLICY.

Of all the times in our history for the adoption of a definite naval policy this is the least appropriate. No man can now definitely say just what such a policy should be. If the peace conference decides upon disarmament, then no program of naval expansion can be entered on. If the conference limits armaments, of course the United States must conform to the limits adopted. If we are to go back to the old system of each nation adopting its own policy in the matter of armaments it will be plenty of time for us to decide what we will do after the conference adjourns. We do not propose to begin the building of the ships which constitute the program until 1921. We can not get ready to begin until that time, for our yards and ways will be occupied with ships already authorized and contracted for. We can not begin on the new program until 1921. At least two sessions of Congress will be held before that time. The adoption of a naval policy should be left to these sessions—the next Congress. It must provide and appropriate the money for the program; why should not the adoption of the program be left to it?

Summing up on this point, we find that we are now being asked to adopt a naval policy now on the least timely occasion and when we can not know what policy we should adopt. And, further, we are asked to adopt this policy now, when there is no reason why its consideration should not be deferred until the next Congress. No time is gained by adopting the policy now. No advantage can be had over its consideration by the next Congress. Can it be possible that the pressure to adopt the policy now comes out of the fear that the next Congress will not be willing to adopt it? If such be the case, still, nothing is gained, for the next Congress must make the appropriation; and if it does not approve the policy it will not appropriate the money to carry it out. I stand in amaze, and in no way that I look can I see reasons which would lead Members of Congress, acting on their own judgment, to support this measure at this time.

A POLICY THAT WILL LEAD TO WAR.

I am unwilling to enter upon a policy of naval competition. It is a policy that will lead to war. The situation of our country and its foreign policy does not require that we shall have the most powerful navy. Other countries are more dangerously situated. They are more dependent upon fleets to defend their sources of supply and their colonial systems. We have no hazards of that kind. If other nations of the world act foolishly, we have no need to compete with them in their folly. Rather than do so and be led eventually into a war, I should prefer raising the big stick now and threatening the world; not that we will compete in fleets and armies, but that we will fight them if they do not accept the policy of small armaments. I had as lief fight now as a few years hence, especially if the interval is to be spent in preparation by all sides so as to make the war more bloody and disastrous.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY I. EMERSON,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 17, 1919.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, under my leave to revise and extend my remarks I desire to have printed a few of the many letters received by me in favor of the Caldwell bill. Out of the many received I have selected a few from some of the leading and most highly respected citizens of Cleveland, Ohio, as follows:

CLEVELAND, February 14, 1919.

HENRY I. EMERSON, Esq.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have just been advised that Representative CALDWELL, of New York, has introduced a resolution in the House calling on the War Department to loan certain machine tools, which were purchased by the Government, to technical schools and universities for technical purposes.

As president of the board of trustees of the University School of Cleveland, I would like to call your attention to the work that school is doing and ask you to lend such assistance as you can to the passage of this resolution and to consider favorably the application of the University School for consideration in the distribution of this equipment.

This school was founded nearly 30 years ago in the interest of broader education of boys in Cleveland, and has had for its object the training of boys, from the time they are ready to go to school until they enter college, along very broad and comprehensive lines.

We try to give equal attention to the physical, manual, and mental development of our boys, and I believe this school was one of the very first to combine the manual training with regular scholastic instruction.

This school, which has borne a prominent part in Cleveland affairs for 30 years, is run for the benefit of the community and not for profit, and the accomplishments of our boys in national service in the last two years is a record of which the trustees are very proud.

Any assistance that you could give to the furtherance of the idea embodied in this resolution and securing for us an opportunity to obtain a proper share of this equipment would be very greatly appreciated.

I am taking the liberty of inclosing a pamphlet showing some of the war-time activities of the school, which is about six months old, since which further developments have added considerably to this good record.

Yours, respectfully,

HENRY S. PICKANDS.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, February 14, 1919.

HON. HENRY I. EMERSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. EMERSON: I am advised that Representative CALDWELL, of New York State, has recently introduced a bill reading as follows:

"To provide for further educational facilities by requiring the War Department to loan certain tools not used for Government purposes to trade and technical schools and universities, and for other purposes.

"Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War shall loan to trade and technical schools and universities and other recognized educational institutions which in the discretion of the Secretary of War shall have such equipment the machine tools suitable for their use which are owned by the United States of America, which are under the control of the War Department, and which are not being used for Government purposes."

I am interested in the passage of this bill because I am a trustee of University School, which has a 30-year record of practical and successful manual training and would be materially benefited by receiving some of these tools to replace those that are worn out in their service.

Trusting that you may feel at liberty to vote in favor of this bill when it comes up for action, believe me, to remain,

Very truly, yours,

SAML. MATHER.

CLEVELAND, February 14, 1919.

Hon. HENRY I. EMERSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I understand that Representative CALDWELL, of New York, has recently introduced a bill, which will come up for action within a few days—

"To provide for further educational facilities by requiring the War Department to loan certain tools not in use for Government purposes to trade and technical schools and universities, and for other purposes."

As a trustee of the University School of Cleveland, Ohio, I hope that you will be able to give this bill your support, as I believe that the effect of same will be beneficial to the students of the University School.

I hope that you will find that you can consistently vote favorably on the bill.

Respectfully, yours,

E. S. BURKE, JR.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, February 14, 1919.

Hon. HENRY I. EMERSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Representative CALDWELL, of New York, has introduced recently the following bill, which will come up for action within a few days:

"To provide for further educational facilities by requiring the Government to loan certain tools not in use for Government purposes to trade and technical schools and universities, and for other purposes."

The passage of this bill would solve the disposition of a lot of these tools from an industrial standpoint, and would increase the cause of education by enabling schools to have more modern tools.

I am interested in the passage of the bill, as I am a trustee of the University School of this city, and I am in hopes that it will have your approval and support.

Respectfully, yours,

E. V. HALE.

Concurrent Resolution of Legislature of North Dakota Respecting the Wheat Price Guaranty.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE M. YOUNG,
OF NORTH DAKOTA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 14, 1919,

On the bill (H. R. 13274) to provide relief where formal contracts have not been made in the manner required by law.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I believe it is pertinent to the discussion of this bill to consider the arguments found in the concurrent resolution of the Legislature of North Dakota in favor of legislation to enable the President to keep faith with the wheat growers and make good to them the guarantees contained in his proclamation of September 2, 1918. The war having come to an end suddenly, our Government must honorably discharge all just obligations, no matter how much it costs. This is a liquidation period. I think we can trust the Cabinet Secretaries to pay only the claims which are just. To do less than that would be dishonorable. I therefore vote "no" upon the motion to recommit for the purpose of striking out section 5. The concurrent resolution is in the following words:

Concurrent resolution relating to the fixing of the price for all wheat grown in the United States during the year 1919 that is delivered prior to June 1, 1920, at $2.26 at Chicago.

Whereas the President of the United States by his proclamation of September 2, 1918, fixed the price for all wheat grown in the United States during the year 1919 that is delivered prior to June 1, 1920, at $2.26 at Chicago; and

Whereas upon the faith of said proclamation the farmers of North Dakota and generally throughout the Northwest have gone to an enormous expense in the increase of acreage for wheat and for the purchase of horses, machinery, and other equipment for an increased wheat production and have incurred great obligations on that account; and

Whereas it appears that up to this time no agency of the United States has been created and charged with the duty of making effective the guaranteed price under the President's proclamation; and

Whereas the farmers of North Dakota, as well as all other wheat-raising districts of the United States, have acted in good faith upon the said proclamation of the President, and in case Congress fails to make the said proclamation of the President effective such failure will cause an enormous financial loss to the farmers of the State of North Dakota and other wheat-raising districts of the United States, as well as a great disappointment, and will tend to lessen the confidence of the people in the Federal Government: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of North Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring), That we earnestly urge Congress to pass such measure as will make the said proclamation of the President effective; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state be instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress and to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture in both Houses of Congress.

Investigation of the National Security League.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. KING,
OF ILLINOIS,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 17, 1919.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I insert the following statement made on February 5, 1919, before the special committee of the House of Representatives on House resolution 469 and House resolution 476, to investigate and make report as to the officers, membership, financial support, expenditures, general character, activities, and purposes of the National Security League, a corporation of New York, and of any associated organizations.

The committee met at 2 p. m., Hon. BEN JOHNSON, chairman, presiding. Other members of the committee were Hon. C. F. REAVIS, Hon. JOSEPH WALSH, Hon. E. E. BROWNE, Hon. PAT HARRISON, Hon. E. W. SAUNDERS, and Hon. T. H. CARAWAY.

Mr. KING was asked to testify. His testimony was as follows, to wit:

Mr. JOHNSON. Give the stenographer your name.
Mr. KING. Edward J. King.
Mr. JOHNSON. You are a Member of Congress?
Mr. KING. I am.
Mr. JOHNSON. How long have you been a Member of Congress?
Mr. KING. It will be four years the 4th of March, 1919.
Mr. JOHNSON. Your residence is where?
Mr. KING. Galesburg, Ill.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. King, Mr. Menken, the first president of the National Security League, testified over and over again that the National Security League was at no time engaging in politics. Col. Leydecker, the present president of the league, over and over again has testified accordingly. Charles D. Orth, who was chairman of the congressional campaign committee of the National Security League, also stated under oath many, many times that the National Security League was in no way meddling with politics. If you have any knowledge to the contrary, the committee would be glad to hear you tell what it is. State it in your own way.

Mr. KING. Shall I just start at the beginning and give the committee a history of matters touching upon these statements made by Col. Leydecker and others, so far as I am concerned?

Mr. JOHNSON. Not only so far as Col. Leydecker is concerned, but in so far as the National Security League, as a league, is concerned.

Mr. KING. Yes, sir. Practically the first intimation which I had of the activities of the National Security League in the last congressional campaign was when I received a letter from Mr. Emil C. Wetten, of Chicago, which, some time ago, I turned over to Mr. Browne, and which I should like to have to refer to just a moment.

Mr. BROWNE. There is a copy of all these letters.

Mr. KING. Have you, Mr. Browne, a carbon copy of the letter which I turned over to you?

Mr. BROWNE. No; I handed you back all the papers there that you gave to me.

Mr. KING. I think, perhaps, that is true.

Mr. JOHNSON. You have the carbon copy; have you?

Mr. KING. I have in my hand the carbon copy of a letter I received. I received a carbon copy from Mr. Emil C. Wetten there, no doubt on account of the fact that he sent the original of the letter to Washington and sent this carbon copy to Galesburg. I will not read this, because I presume it is the same letter which has been heretofore introduced in evidence. If it is not, I will ask to have it inserted.

Mr. BROWNE. It has not been put in.

Mr. JOHNSON. As it has not been heretofore inserted in the record, it had better go in just here.

(The letter referred to is printed in full below:)

"AUGUST 23, 1918.

"DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The National Security League has appointed a special congressional committee to consider the candidacy of all those seeking nomination at the coming primary from Illinois, somewhat along the lines of the Legislative and Municipal Voters League. Some of the candidates have requested the privilege of appearing before the committee. We have, therefore, concluded to give every one an opportunity to do so, if they so desire.

"What is your pleasure in the matter, and is there any possibility of your being in Chicago during the coming week. The committee would like to make its report Saturday, August 31—

The primaries took place September 11—

"A reply by wire will be very much appreciated.

"Yours, very truly,

"EMIL C. WETTEN, Chairman.

"Hon. EDWARD J. KING,

"House of Representatives, Washington, D. C."

(Carbon copy of this letter to Mr. KING at Galesburg, Ill.)

Mr. KING. I was, then, mistaken. This carbon copy was sent to Galesburg and the original to Washington. Upon receipt of this letter, there being no place at which the summons was returnable, I wired to the National Security League at New York City for the purpose of ascertaining at which point in Chicago I was summoned to appear. I got a wire from them that their office, the Chicago branch, was, I think, on Jackson Boulevard; the number I do not remember now, but it seems to me it was 51. It has been stated in the evidence here, in glancing over the evidence of Mr. Britten (Brundage), it was a very simple matter, and that Congressmen were given the privilege of siding with them, as he expressed it, if they so desired, and really he was under no obligations whatever to do so.

Mr. JOHNSON. The first telegram amounted to virtually a demand upon every Member to appear, did it not?

Mr. KING. In view of the fact that the Chicago papers, clipping of which I have here and will insert in the record, if the committee deems it material—I will refer to it occasionally—in view of the fact that in the Chicago papers had been published a few days before that an article, no doubt at the suggestion and with the connivance of this branch of the National League, or at least some of its individual members. This article appeared headed "Candidates face loyalty test of the Security League—Organized to fight those with antiwar records," and then it goes on to state that vigorous attack on disloyalty candidates will be launched soon by the Chicago branch of the National League, a patriotic, educational organization.

And the candidates it mentions, and so forth, and it mentions the fact that Roosevelt—and asked this question that Alton B. Parker has asked, and, if the committee will pardon the suggestion and without seeming to be prejudiced in the matter, I would respectfully suggest that both of these gentlemen have been probably requested to do so as a basis of the newspaper articles.

Mr. REAVIS. I will state to you, Mr. King, that both the letters of Roosevelt and Parker are in the record.

Mr. KING. Yes; I read them.

Mr. REAVIS. And they are not entirely in harmony with the newspaper account, either.

Mr. KING. This article goes on to state who the members of the inquisitorial committee are, naming them: Emil C. Wetten, H. H. Merrick, Edgar A. Bancroft, Homer J. Buckley, John F. Smulski, Peter S. Lambros, James A. Patton, Cyrus McCormick, Joseph W. Moses, Edward S. Gore, William B. Austin, and H. H. Latham. The first meeting of this committee will be held Friday afternoon in the office of the chairman, Mr. Wetten.

I am not certain of the date of this article, but it was very shortly before I was summoned to Chicago.

Mr. REAVIS. I think that clipping ought to go into the record, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. JOHNSON. You will turn that over to the stenographer to put the newspaper article in the record.

Mr. KING. I will be very glad to. I would like to refer to it.

Mr. JOHNSON. The stenographer will put it in at this point.

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

(The newspaper article referred to is printed in full below:)

PLATFORM PLANKS OFFERED.

"A tentative patriotic plank for convention platforms was drawn up at the meetings. It will probably be urged upon all political parties and candidates for office. It follows:

"'We declare that it is the supreme task of the civilized world to crush the insolent attempt of German autocracy to substitute a military dictatorship for self-government and the right of independent thought.

"'The world must be made safe for democracy by the defeat of German militarism.

"'We want no peace without victory and we demand victory so complete and conclusive that military ambition will be forever silenced and a peace secured that will make an end of war.

FOR LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

"'The world must be made safe by the cooperation of the major force of mankind, and that force should be organized by a league of nations to keep peace after the war.

"'We favor the entrance of the United States, after the war, into such a league of nations as may be adequate to safeguard the peace that must be won by the joint military forces of the allied nations.'

"Merrick and Homer Buckley were reelected president and secretary of the league, respectively, at yesterday's session. The following were elected vice presidents: William Wrigly, jr., John J. Mitchell, James J. Patton, and Cyrus McCormick. Edgar A. Bancroft was elected chairman of the executive committee and John T. Stockton chairman of the general committee.

CANDIDATES FACE LOYALTY TEST OF SECURITY LEAGUE ORGANIZATION TO FIGHT THOSE WITH ANTIWAR RECORDS.

"A vigorous attack on disloyal and antiwar candidates for the Senate and House of Representatives will be launched soon by the Chicago branch of the National Security League, a patriotic educational organization.

"The candidates' records in public office, if they have held any, their opinions on the war, and their spoken comment will be rigorously examined by a committee of the league during the next two weeks.

"Those candidates who do not pass the acid test of loyalty will be assailed by pamphlets and letters to the voters describing their records, by public speakers, and by newspaper publicity. To remove any possible stigma of politics no loyal candidates will receive any active aid toward election.

ROOSEVELT ASKS ACTION.

"This was decided yesterday at a meeting of the executive and general committee of the league in response to letters asking for the election of loyal men only in war time, sent to the New York offices of the organization by ex-President Roosevelt and Alton B. Parker, former Democratic candidate for the Presidency.

"A committee of 12 officers and members of the league was appointed by H. H. Merrick, president of the local branch, to delve into the candidates' records. Those on the committee are the following: Emil C. Wetten, chairman; H. H. Merrick, Edgar Bancroft, Homer J. Buckley, John F. Smulski, Peter S. Lambros, James A. Patten, Cyrus McCormick, Joseph W. Moses, Edward S. Gore, William B. Austin, and H. H. Latham. The first meeting of this committee will be held Friday afternoon in the office of Chairman Wetten."

Mr. JOHNSON. Now, go ahead and comment on it.

Mr. KING. A tentative patriotic plank was drawn up, and so on, and some other forms, which was not material except as to give the cast of extreme patriotism over the article, and especially over the individual members of the National Security League or of the Chicago branch.

Now, this paper, whichever it was, and I can not tell from the article, circulates not only in the city of Chicago, but circulates through the northern half of Illinois very extensively, besides Wisconsin, Iowa, and other States. The committee understand that very thoroughly.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is a bell for roll call. I think we had better take a recess and come back after.

(Thereupon the committee took a recess and reconvened at 3.25 o'clock p. m.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. JOHNSON. You may go on, Mr. King.

Mr. KING. Not only do these Chicago papers circulate very extensively through the States that I have mentioned, but they circulate through all the Congressional districts in Illinois, probably as far south as East St. Louis, and the farther south you go the more sparsely do they circulate. The fifteenth congressional district, which I have the honor of representing, is about 200 miles long, extending from Geneseo to Quincy, Ill., on the river. People read these papers, especially the morning papers, every morning, and while it is said they do not have much influence in the city of Chicago, they do have a good deal of influence in the country districts. After this article appears and after another one appears, copy of which I do not have, stating that Congressman Juul would be called before the committee, and probably that Congressman King, of the Fifteenth Illinois district, or from the Galesburg district, would be called on Friday or Saturday, giving the date. After this publicity had been given to the matter in the heat of quite a primary contest at which all kinds of false charges were being made, and people being very alert on matters of this kind, the mere mention of it that you were to be called before such a committee on the question of your loyalty was then and there practically an indictment against a man, and in the minds of many people he was then and there found guilty before being tried.

Mr. JOHNSON. Equivalent to saying that a woman was going to be called and questioned as to her virtue?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir. Had the people known who the individuals were and had studied the situation that there was back of the National Security League, as now disclosed by the evidence before this committee, and had the people of my district known that the members of the Chicago branch were certain individuals who were well known to the district in their activities with our national life, well known, they would have immediately said they cared nothing about it, and it would have added very materially to anybody's vote whom they had seen fit to attack. But it was designated the National Security League.

Mr. REAVIS. When you bring that indictment against these individuals, do you mean the members of this executive committee, the officers of the National Security League?

Mr. KING. I was referring when speaking of my section of the country to one particular member of the executive committee of the Chicago branch, whose name I intended to mention a little later on in the evidence.

Mr. REAVIS. I do not want to interrupt your line of thought, but I was curious to know whether that reflection was directed toward this so-called executive committee of the congressional committee or toward certain members not in the executive committee.

Mr. KING. I intended to include in that the fact that if the people had known in the district not only as to certain members of the executive committee, but had they known who was back of this institution in the city of New York as a national proposition, which has been brought out by this committee in its investigation, it would have made a whole lot of difference in the way people have made up their minds in the Middle West. But they didn't know it. What I am trying to get before the committee now is to show the effect that publications of this kind, which were given out presumably by Mr. Wetten or some other member of this Chicago branch. Mr. Merrick said, in testifying here, that there was a crowd of newspaper men around the outside door of the office every time they would have a meeting.

Members are perfectly familiar, and it might be put in the record, that these leagues or organizations are frequently organized for the purpose of getting publicity without being brought to trial in a personal damage suit for things they might say individually by organizing a branch, having an office, having the newspaper boys come over every morning and get statements to which nobody might care to put their individual names, they were able to attack the character of citizens and candidates with impunity. Now, they had that power over the press in Chicago and publicity given to everything they did and men attacked whom they sought to destroy in the State. I regarded the mere suggestion in the newspaper mentioning my name, and especially this letter from Mr. Wetten, of Chicago, inviting me to sit with them, as they said in Mr. Merrick's testimony——

Mr. JOHNSON. For the purpose of determining your loyalty.

Mr. KING. Yes; for the purpose of determining my loyalty. I regarded that as just as strong a summons as would come from any court in the land; in fact, stronger. I regarded that just as strong as though some guard in the Middle Ages had come with their halberds and torches and taken me out of bed in the middle of the night, and conducted me up into the city of Chicago for the purpose of appearing before practically an unknown committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is a direct challenge of your loyalty.

Mr. KING. Yes, sir; and certainly very few of them knew me personally. So, therefore, this so-called "invitation" of Mr. Merrick's, which was a proposition for the Members of Congress to "sit with" them, as he said was in effect a summons to come before that committee and talk it over with them.

Any man will run to the defense of his loyalty whenever it is attacked. Regarding this as a matter of importance as I did, I consulted with some friends at home. We went to Chicago the day before the inquisition was set for. We asked a friend of ours if he would go down to the National Security headquarters, at 51 Jackson Boulevard, or whatever the place was. He did go down there and returned. He said he did not find anything there except the name, National Security League, on the door, and at the bottom of the glass, the door there, somebody had a law office in there. I went in and could not find anybody there representing the league but a young lady stenographer; said what was wanted, and she said, I believe there is something like that here, and she reached down there and pulled out the lower drawer of the desk and brought out a typewritten list and handed it to my friend, who, had he not been a perfect gentleman, would have retained it. Being a perfect gentleman, he gave it back to the lady. But he was a Chicago man and knew almost all of the names on that list and remembered a great many of them, whom he told me about. He mentioned all these names that were on this special congressional committee, and he said this remark: "They all live here in Chicago. They are all big business men, and every damned one of them is a profiteer." Those were the remarks he made to me. That is hearsay, but sometimes you can develop things by hearsay you can not any other way. The names he reported to me indicated the gentleman knew what he was talking about. Then we found out who was the committee who was to hear the case. It consisted of Emil C. Wetten, chairman; H. H. Merrick, Joseph N. Moses, W. B. Austin, Peter S. Lambros, H. H. Latham, James A. Patton, Cyrus McCormick, John F. Smulski, and Edgar A. Bancroft. The following were not present at the inquisition: Mr. James A. Patton, Mr. Cyrus A. McCormick, Mr. Joseph W. Moses, Mr. E. A. Bancroft. Mr. James A. Patton was very sick at the time. Mr. James A. Patton is the man who cornered the corn market a number of years ago, known as the Corn King.

Mr. REAVIS. He cornered the wheat market, known as the Wheat King.

Mr. KING. The Wheat King. Mr. Patton was the man who, just prior to the declaration of war, bought up millions and millions of bushels of wheat for the National Biscuit Co. and had it stored away out of the reach of the common masses. Mr. Cyrus A. McCormick is in the International Harvester Co. that manufactures all the harvester implements, farm implements, practically, for the country, known as the Harvester Trust.

Mr. JOHNSON. During the war the price did not go up more than two or three hundred per cent.

Mr. KING. I don't think it went up over 300 per cent, but it is very close to it. John F. Smulski is a Pole, connected with politics sometimes in the State of Illinois, and was at one time the State treasurer. I was informed and I have heard it before, and I state it practically here, as near being a fact as anyone can without seeing it, that he wears the decoration, and that he had presented to him, but whether he wore it during the war, I do not know, a decoration from the Austrian Emperor.

Mr. JOHNSON. To whom do you refer now?

Mr. KING. Mr. John F. Smulski.

Mr. JOHNSON. What nationality is he?

Mr. KING. He is a Pole. That is, he is a naturalized Pole, I think; born in Poland, probably educated in this country, a very bright, smart fellow, by the way, as far as that is concerned. Then Edgar A. Bancroft is the head and front of the Harvester Trust.

Mr. HARRISON. Of what trust?

Mr. KING. The Harvester Trust.

Mr. BROWN. Is he a lawyer?

Mr. KING. He is an attorney. He was very modest and gracious in his testimony before the committee, but there is the head and front of the whole business right there. The gentleman from Mississippi examined him and found him a very pleasant gentleman. At one time he lived in my town, as shown by the evidence of Mr. Lambrose, the editor of the Greek Star. He said, in effect, that Mr. Bancroft having lived in Mr. KING'S town, he left that section to Mr. Bancroft.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Mr. KING referred to is yourself.

Mr. KING. As soon as I got into Chicago and found his name there on the list I could account for many mysteries that had not been cleared up in my mind before. I will not go into the personal matters between Mr. Bancroft and myself, because it would not throw any particular light upon this, except that it showed that individuals for the purpose of private revenge could use, as occasion required, the influence of the National Security League to get scurrilous matters against former enemies, apparently, into the Chicago newspapers. The Chicago newspapers published, as I say, everything that was requested by the National Security League. The Chicago Post, the Chicago News, and the Chicago Journal each made vicious attacks upon myself and Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Bancroft was in Mr. BRITTEN'S district and Mr. Bancroft was fighting Mr. BRITTEN, and in order to make the articles appear that they were not directed particularly against Mr. BRITTEN he thought about his former home and reaches down and gets hold of me and includes me in the article.

The articles could be produced, but I don't think it is necessary for this hearing. Of course, the articles said in plain words that we, BRITTEN and KING, were disloyal to the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON. Both you and Mr. BRITTEN?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir. Those articles, in order to help my opponent, were printed in a Chicago paper, and I wasn't running in Chicago, and probably for the benefit of somebody else in the district against me, because they were published in full-page advertising at advertising rates in every paper in the sixteenth congressional district. Now, Mr. Bancroft is the chief counsel for the International Harvester Co. It is not particularly on personal grounds—I perhaps ought not to say this, on personal grounds, because it is so many years ago, but I have found that in this campaign men whom I had excused from juries 30 years before; men whom I might have had some collection against, or a suit against, all rose up as one man, and they found that they couldn't vote for me on account of my war record. They never stated the real reason. Men whom I had supposed had been dead for 30 years—every enemy, almost, walked out of the graveyards to bring up some ancient grudge which they bore a fellow. Now, that is enough on that feature of it, but there is something else.

Bancroft used to lobby down at Springfield. I was a member of the Illinois State Legislature for eight years, and for four years of that time I was chairman of the committee on labor and industrial affairs. Of course, as chairman of that committee, I naturally had a great deal of labor legislation before me, and I always found Mr. Bancroft and his assistants vigorously opposed to anything along that line of such a nature as the workmen's compensation act, of which I had considerable charge.

Mr. JOHNSON. Which side of the question was he opposed to?

Mr. KING. He was opposed to anything that would change the present conditions with reference to labor as they stood at that time in the State of Illinois. I received many letters from him. Further than that, I introduced probably the first liability bill—I am not saying this boastfully at all—in the Illinois State Legislature, which was intended to remove what was known as the "death warrant" clause out of relief contracts. Railroad companies, especially the Burlington, organized a relief association which they required all the members to join, and in joining they had to sign an application, a clause of which said if they accepted any money from the company they waived all damages; and on the other hand if they sued the company they lost their insurance under the release. So the poor fellows got it coming and going. This was simply directed at that feature, but the International Harvester Co., with other organizations of that character, they maintaining a relief system for themselves among the men with a similar clause in it, fought that bill. I will not go into the history of that, while it ran along all one season and two other sessions in the Illinois Legislature, and I became somewhat marked by the gentlemen by my action in that matter. I am well satisfied, because the next year, the second year I was nominated by the Republican caucus for speaker of the house. Never before in the history of Illinois politics, legislative politics, had the Republican candidate that had been selected in the Republican caucus, which controlled a majority of the house, been defeated. It was taken for granted, but the next morning 25 Republicans, who had always lined up with these interests, joined with the Democrats—I am not blaming the Democrats a bit—and elected a speaker, a bipartisan speaker of the house, which house afterwards elected William Lorimer to the United States Senate.

I only mention that to show—and it was stated afterwards that if I had not been too friendly to certain labor interests I would have been elected speaker of the house, and there would have been no vote. Whether that was true or not I don't know. But I know that Bancroft led that fight, not in the open—he never comes into the open, and was not in the open in this matter, but always behind, always planning, always scheming, sitting up late at night, talking high moral propositions in daytime, but all the time working for his god, the International Harvester Co. of America and nobody else. For the last 10 years he has followed his clients as defendants in prosecutions brought by the Government. Whether he finally kept them out of the penitentiary or not I don't know, but he served them faithfully and served them long.

Furthermore, there was some political features that developed there in the district. He and some friends of his were disappointed in certain things. I am satisfied that that rankled him. He finally went to Chicago as attorney for the Santa Fe Railway Co., and finally became the attorney for the International Harvester Co. Now, he will deny that there is any animosity in his case, but why was my district left to Ed. Bancroft by this committee? Not only that, there is another man on the committee, Busby—you heard his name mentioned—he wasn't there along toward the last, but Busby is the head of all the street car interests in the city of Chicago. The last session I was down there they had a bill in there known as the Chicago street car men's bill. I don't remember just the points of it, but the fellows employed on the street car system wanted the bill, and Mr. Busby didn't want it. Well, we had a great fight. We had hearings going on there covering six or eight weeks. Mr. Busby asked me if I would appoint a subcommittee. I said, "Yes." "All right," he said——

Mr. JOHNSON (interposing). That was a subcommittee of the Committee on Labor?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir; to consider this bill, this street car men's bill. Later I was asked and solicited if I wouldn't put a certain particular member of that committee, whose name I don't remember now, upon that subcommittee, and upon that one point all the influence that could be brought to bear from the city of Chicago where the interests, the large business interests of the city of Chicago are, were brought to bear to get that one thing done. The Illinois Manufacturers' Association lobbyist was after me; all the different lobbyists that infested the capitol at that time, and I presume now, were after me on that proposition. Now, I don't claim any particular credit for not doing it, but didn't do it. I was satisfied I was blackballed for not being sufficiently friendly. I was blackballed for not being sufficiently friendly to the Chicago interests.

Again I was in a position in the legislature there where I was required to and did fight the best I could the proposition presented to the Illinois Legislature allowing Sam Insull to gather together and form into one trust all the independent lighting plants in the State of Illinois. He got that legislation through. I voted against it. I don't suppose he would even remember my name, but somewhere in his books—and they keep books—is a record that I was wrong upon that measure. He is another prominent member——

Mr. JOHNSON (interposing). Prominent in what way?

Mr. KING. Of the National Security League, the Chicago branch, whose name will be found, if it has not been given to the committee, upon this list of 50, if you can secure it. I found the name of Mr. Armour. Far be it from me to intimate for a moment that Mr. Armour knows me or will condescend to make my acquaintance, but his people up there know, just after I was elected in 1914, and before I came down here, we had an epidemic of foot-and-mouth disease in the State of Illinois.

Mr. JOHNSON. Among cattle?

Mr. KING. Yes; among cattle. And one county especially, the county of Henry, where there are a great many stockmen, was stricken, and the Bureau of Animal Industry here had adopted the scheme every time there was one case in any county in the State of Illinois, if it was down in the southeast corner 30 miles removed from the other corner, of putting that whole county under quarantine. I couldn't understand that when I was out there, until I read all the hearings on the foot-and-mouth investigation conducted by Senator Kenyon and others when I came here to Washington, and I found that the true explanation of that was that they had in Chicago a free area and also a restricted area, a quarantined area. Now, they bought cattle down State, or rather they came into the stockyards from there. They would say to the man, "Where do these cattle come from?" "They come from Henry County." "Well, that is a quarantined county." If they come from Knox County, the next county to Henry County, that is not a quarantined county. All the cattle that went from Henry County sold for from 25 to 30 per cent less to the packers, through their agents, than did the stock that came from the next county. That was due to the large area put in quarantine by the Bureau of Animal Industry here in the city of Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON. If they were unfit for use, they should not have been sold at all and put on the market.

Mr. KING. No; they were just as good cattle as those in Knox County, because in one instance the case was down in the southeast corner, within 2 miles of Knox County and within 3 miles of Stark County, but as it happened to be in Henry, they put all of Henry County in quarantine and prevented all the people in the northern part of Henry County from shipping cattle into Chicago, and if they did ship it in, just as good cattle as they shipped from Knox County, they sold for 25 per cent less.

Mr. REAVIS. That is quite an interesting statement. You mean by that that cattle that happened to be in Knox County, within 3 miles of the infected cattle, were in a free area?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. While the cattle that happened to be in Henry County, though they were 30 miles from the infection, were in a restricted territory?

Mr. KING. Yes. That enabled them to get all the good cattle for 30 per cent—25 to 30 per cent—less. So they made a million dollars off of the stock raisers of that one county alone.

Mr. REAVIS. Who made a million dollars? Who got the benefit of that regulation?

Mr. KING. Somebody in Chicago. Probably the packers eventually got the advantage of it, because they got the stuff.

Mr. REAVIS. They butchered and dressed the cattle that came from the restricted area?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. And sold it to the general public for the same price that they received for other meats, didn't they?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. Well, there isn't any doubt in your mind as to who profited by it?

Mr. KING. Absolutely not. I say so.

Mr. REAVIS. I just wanted the record to show that.

Mr. KING. Yes, sir. Now, then, when I came down here I made my maiden speech, and that is where I got in bad with the packers of Chicago. I took a good deal of time on that speech. It wasn't such a wonderful speech, but it had a lot of facts in it. I went through every bit of testimony that was given in those hearings on the foot-and-mouth disease, and I traced it and how it spread, and I showed how inspectors in Chicago were interested in serum factories there—foot-and-mouth serum factories—and I went into it pretty generally, and I showed how a fellow by the name of Fitzgerald or Ferguson, I forget his name, was the general agent there for Swift & Co., for, I think, Wilson Bros., and for Armour; and how he handled the shippers; how he invited them into Chicago to attend a general educational conference—that is a great thing nowadays in handling people—and how he banqueted them, took them out to vaudeville shows, and showed them a good time, and in that way kept them all perfectly satisfied. It showed conclusively that he was the fellow that shifted matters between the various packing companies in the city of Chicago and was their go-between, although he is presumably secretary of this educational society for the benefit of farmers and stock raisers. If this committee can get hold of that fellow and make him tell the truth, they can probably get at what they want.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is his name?

Mr. KING. His name is either Fitzgerald or Fitzpatrick or Fitzhenry.

Mr. REAVIS. We can get it from that speech of yours, can't we?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. You will furnish the committee with that?

Mr. KING. Yes; I will furnish the committee with it.

Now, the connection between that and this present investigation is this, that I was called to account by one of the inspectors in Chicago—I don't know that anything came directly from the packers, but I know from certain actions on the floor of the House that that speech was distasteful for a new speech for a Congressman to make saying anything against the packing industry of the city of Chicago. In that manner I got my third or fourth or fifth black eye—I don't know what it was—with the Chicago interests. Now, I see Mr. Armour, the head of the packing interests, was a member of this Chicago branch of the National Security League.

Mr. CARAWAY. And a very heavy contributor?

Mr. KING. I didn't know that. I presume that was true. Now, from these few instances I have given you you can easily see that I was persona non grata with the Chicago interests, and the Chicago interests believe they are, and are almost, as a matter of fact, the State of Illinois. You can see that when Mr. Wetten in his testimony talked about the Brundage faction down State—a Chicago man never talks, either in politics or any other branch, except in the terms of Chicago, and he thought there was a Brundage faction down State. There is no Brundage faction down State, nor Deneen faction down State. We have our own factions. We don't have to have anything imported from the city of Chicago in our factions. But with that kind of men in this branch, urged on by the chairman of the executive committee, Mr. Bancroft, I can see very readily why I was lugged into the situation at all.

Now, to go on with the meeting; I have told you who was there. We first went down to Jackson Street—51. We found no one there. They said that the meeting would be held at Mr. Wetten's office. I have even forgotten the building that Mr. Wetten's office was in, but we went to another building and went up the elevator and went into Mr. Wetten's office. I had talked this matter over considerably before going up there. I admit I was not in a very good frame of mind—that is, I felt more or less humiliated that I should be called in before a crowd of strangers and questioned on a subject of that kind—was not even permitted to go before a committee of my neighbors, like the boys in the drafts were.

Mr. CARAWAY. Did you realize that you didn't even go before a committee of American-born citizens?

Mr. KING. When I got in there I noticed that, as I observed them—well, I thought this, that I would make an effort to get the names of the individuals who sought to try me, and for that reason I took along a friend of mine by the name of Custer, and I took along a young man who afterwards became my secretary and was helping me then in the campaign. I took him along. Now, I said, "We may have difficulty in getting in here, because I understand that these are clandestine meetings—that is, that they are secret meetings; that their witnesses are not permitted in here and nothing to be taken down, but we will try it, because I propose if these people attack me to find out who the individuals are that try me, and I propose to bring a lawsuit against each and every individual that makes these charges, irrespective of the cloak that they are hiding under—the National Security League."

We found Mr. Wetten presiding—sitting at the desk—and I will say for Mr. Wetten that I think he was a very fair man in the whole proceeding, considering the men that he had to deal with. Then, there was Mr. Merrick, who thinks he is the mayor of Chicago, head of the chamber of commerce; W. B. Austin, a lawyer. I remember Mr. Peter S. Lambros on account of his whiskers. He was editor of the Greek paper. He sat over to my left. Mr. Wetten sat at the desk in front of me. Mr. Custer sat beside me, and the young man who is my secretary took a seat at a table. Mr. Merrick, I think, sat against the wall, leaning his chair against the wall. Mr. E. C. Gore and Latham were there, as I understand it—I know they were, but I do not remember them. They were merely "and others," under that title. I saw they were rather confused when I went in, that I should bring in two witnesses with me, and I said, "Gentlemen, I am here to consult with you about this matter in pursuance to your letter." I introduced myself and introduced them to my two friends. The situation was such that they couldn't very well tell them to go out. I am satisfied they wanted to do that, and they acted like it, but I didn't propose to sit in there alone without witnesses. At one stage of the proceedings Mr. Schroeder, who had a pencil and a piece of paper, and who under my instructions was getting down all that he could at the time, was stopped by Mr. Wetten, who said, "Mr. King, what is your young man doing over there? Is he a shorthand writer?" I said, "No; he isn't a shorthand writer; he is an old newspaper man taking down a few notes." "Well," he says, "we don't allow anything here to be taken down in shorthand," and I said, "Well, he is taking a few notes as he goes along." But they expressed the desire that he shouldn't do that; that nothing was to be public about the proceeding whatever.

So far as I was concerned I was glad to have it public; I would have been glad to have it public; I would have been glad to have it taken down in shorthand, and requested that I might have a stenographer there, which they refused, so I could show the people of the district, if they found against me in their verdict, that it ought to be set aside. I could show them the evidence. But that was not to be. I can't give the committee all the details of the conversation, but I remember Mr. Wetten said, "Mr. KING, the main objection to your record is that you made a speech down there in Congress—and by the way," he says, "I want to say before we start in we have read it, and it is a damned good speech." I said, "I thank you for that." And then over to my right sat one Moses. Now, Moses was a regular cootie. Every time you got him off of you he would be at you again—one Moses, who is now dead. He sat at my right here, with double glasses. He had the speech—I might mention this to the committee, that in addition to having a speech printed, which was not in the type of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD but had been set up especially by somebody, they had certain documents and statements which had been made by certain enemies of mine in the district—political enemies of mine in the district—lying upon their desk in full view. I could see them there, and was familiar with the documents, having seen them many times before, which led me to believe that somebody had given those to Mr. Bancroft, who had presented them to the committee upon which to interrogate me. Mr. Wetten didn't ask any questions, neither did many of the rest.

I spoke to them, and I was required to bare my very soul before those men. I had to go way back to the time of the Revolution and show that an ancestor of mine by the name of Ichabod was on Dorchester Heights and had fought the British the next day at Bunker Hill; and the record of Capt. Thaddeus King, and that there was an old King homestead on the Massachusetts and Connecticut line still standing, where some of them lived; and the record on my mother's side way back until they established it in some Englishman of some kind or character; and it was necessary for me to state what liberty-loan speeches I had made; how many bonds I had subscribed for; whether I had made liberty-loan speeches; whether I had contributed to the Red Cross and other war activities.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. King, did you tell them that your only child was in the service as a volunteer in the aviation service?

Mr. KING. Yes; that sort of stuck them a little bit.

Mr. REAVIS. Were they kind enough to tell you whether any of their sons were likewise serving?

Mr. KING. Not one of them mentioned that fact, and I don't think they could prove it. Some of them have not brought any sons into the world, let alone being in the war.

Mr. CARAWAY. Well, the country is fortunate, then.

Mr. KING. Yes; I had to bring that up. Now, mind you, all this was most distasteful to me, to go into a committee largely consisting of foreign gentlemen and establish my record as an American citizen before them. Of course, somebody said: "You don't need to have gone," but I have explained to the committee why I had to go. That was all there was to it. You were forced into it. Yes; I told them that my son was in the Army. "Well, was he drafted or did he enlist?" was the first question. I had the honor of replying—whether it is an honor or not, I make no distinction between a drafted man and an enlisted man—that he did enlist, and that he was a second lieutenant and was expecting to go overseas before long.

Mr. REAVIS. And not in a bullet-proof job, either, was he?

Mr. KING. No; he was in no bullet-proof job. I picked out four or five of them, and on that list of 50 I'll bet you can find every one of their sons in bomb-proof positions.

Mr. REAVIS. Your son was in the aviation?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir; and this evidence in New York, where two or three of the witnesses kept harping upon "Now, Mr. So-and-so is a business man, and he has a son in the war, and So-and-so has a son in the war"—it would be most interesting to find just what service those sons were performing. My observation of it is that the whole gang of them ran down here to Washington and made safe on that proposition in the first instance. Well, that is beside the matter I was trying to get at.

Mr. JOHNSON. You started to say that Mr. Wetten turned to your speech.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then, were you questioned about your speech?

Mr. KING. Yes; I was questioned by Mr. Moses. Moses seemed to be the fellow.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is he the one with the big, bold glasses?

Mr. KING. No; he is dead. He died after that. Yes; he is referred to as the one—I referred to him as having double glasses, double magnifying glasses. He sat very close to me. Now, let me see where that speech is. He had a copy of it. Not this copy of it, however. He looked down very close to the paper, and he would always look at one place in the paper, and that is where the name of Morgan appeared.

Mr. JOHNSON. What Morgan is that?

Mr. KING. Well, I referred to him as Morgan, meaning J. Pierpont Morgan. I didn't give his full name in my speech.

Mr. JOHNSON. Of New York?

Mr. KING. But when that name was sounded before the committee there was a dead silence. Somebody had certainly committed blasphemy or lèse majesté, or something else, by lugging into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the name of Mr. Morgan before this committee. "Well, what did you mean here when you said this about Mr. Morgan?"

Mr. REAVIS. Who said that?

Mr. KING. Moses. The record shows here that Moses was given the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to make a special study of it, he being former president of the Chicago Bar Association, composed almost wholly of corporation lawyers.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is usually the case, isn't it?

Mr. KING. I am not going to read what I said unless the committee wants what I said. It is not material in regard to Mr. Morgan, but I read it to him again, and I told him I thought it was very plain, what I said there and what I said about the loan, the original loan, not the one made by the United States, but made by Mr. Morgan.

Mr. JOHNSON. Loan to what—Russia?

Mr. KING. The loan that he made to the allies in the first instance, long before the war was declared.

Mr. CARAWAY. Those bonds that were palmed off onto the American people?

Mr. KING. Yes. That would perhaps be better. I can't remember all the different propositions he asked me to explain about this speech, but I thought it was very plain. Now, I said to them, "You talk about this speech as though this was a wonderful speech." I said, "This wasn't a wonderful speech. You would think that in my district and before this committee that this speech had more to do with injuring the morale, as you state, than any other speech that was delivered in Congress. The truth of it is it took 10 minutes to deliver the speech, and the only time it has attracted attention was in this campaign and before you gentlemen who are trying to lay the foundation of some attack." Now, Mr. Wetten said in his testimony here that I said I had made the speech in a fit of temper. Now, that is absolutely untrue. I said nothing of the kind. One of the Chicago papers, in reporting the evidence, pictured it a little bit worse by saying that I was sorry. They didn't ask me if I was sorry.

Mr. JOHNSON. That was a prepared speech, wasn't it?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. And it took you, perhaps, weeks to get up the data in it?

Mr. KING. Yes; it took me some time to get it up.

Mr. JOHNSON. Therefore, it couldn't have been a speech delivered in a fit of temper, could it?

Mr. KING. No; and I was never better natured in my life than at that time; and in saying that I was sorry, etc., Mr. Wetten is entirely mistaken with reference to that.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is not the word.

Mr. KING. That he used?

Mr. CARAWAY. No; that is not the word to describe what he did when he testified—"mistaken."

Mr. KING. Well, the committee can use their own word in their report, and I hope they will, and I will be for it.

Now, Mr. Bancroft said that this speech was a flagrant speech. Flagrant means, according to the dictionary, flaming, inflamed, glowing, burning, ardent. Its synonyms are meaning that this speech was glaring, notorious, nefarious, villainous, abandoned, hateful, odious, monstrous, wanton, violent, heinous, atrocious, and outrageous. That was the definition of Mr. Bancroft's description of the speech. Now, I don't expect any member of this committee to read the speech, or any other living human being; but I don't know what part especially was objectionable to Mr. Bancroft, unless it was where I quoted Thomas Jefferson, or perhaps that part where I quoted out of the last Farewell Address of George Washington, and such other matters of that kind. I was taking no part between the belligerents in this speech whatever, and I couldn't imagine just what part of it Mr. Bancroft had reference to in labeling it as he did.

Well, the meeting went on, and my friend Custer made a few remarks and told the committee a few things. I had to bring him along as a living witness that I was a reputable citizen in the city of Galesburg there, and had some friends, and the committee got somewhat sociable after a while—pretending to be, anyway. So we got into another conversation on other subjects. I didn't get into it; they brought it up themselves; but I could see very easily that they had more concern about that than they had about my patriotic attitude, which they were alleging that they were investigating. They wanted to know from me whether I believed in the labor unions running the country, and if the committee wants I can tell them what I said.

Mr. CARAWAY. I would be glad to have it.

Mr. KING. I said to them, "I have always supported the labor unions whenever I thought they were right. In the matter of wages, hours, and things of that kind, with which I am familiar, I always sympathized with them and have been for them; and I know I found when I was in Springfield that they were the only organization, the only definite, substantial organization in the city of Springfield that would stand for a reasonable, decent measure down there affecting other people besides themselves. They were always willing to help, and I had had a great respect for the labor lobby." I told them that I didn't believe in their running everything. I said: "I am an individualist; I believe that a man should rise by merit and get along in this country, and up until a few years ago a man was able to do that; but I believe there are crowds of people who have legislated against the opportunity of a man to rise through his own merits." Now, they said: "How do you feel on Government ownership of railroads?" Well, of course, I knew that that was a question——

Mr. REAVIS (interposing). Who asked you that?

Mr. KING. Mr. Merrick. I am pretty sure it was Mr. Merrick. It was the gentleman who leaned back against the wall. It might have been Austin, but I think it was Merrick. And I knew that it was the particular and crucial part of the hearing in that particular case. Of course, I hadn't made up my mind on that subject. I am like the President—keeping an open mind on the matter. I told them—I said, "I have an open mind upon that subject, but I want you to understand that I am an individualist, not a Socialist. That ought to be a sufficient answer to your question." They seemed pleased, and with a few other remarks the meeting was dismissed. You can draw your own conclusions on that.

Now, I have a number of other things here, but I think I have gone over most of the evidence, but if the committee will permit me to proceed for half a minute, I want to say I have given some little thought to this case and this testimony before the committee, and even have thought about it considerable.

This National Security League was nothing more than an organization designed to protect certain individuals from damage suits by being able to get out statements to the newspapers without being held personally responsible for the damaging statements so made.

Mr. JOHNSON. You do not mean to say, however, that they did not have interests to serve?

Mr. KING. No, sir; and I will also state that their main purpose, in my judgment, was to defeat many men who had had the temerity, even in a slight way, to stand for the rights of the common people. I believe they worked not only in New York, but throughout the country. They had many lesser organizations who believe what they say; who pass resolutions for them every time when the resolutions are sent out. They will pass them and send them in to us, who are influenced greatly by them—a sort of a Bourbon organization, a crowd of old-time Bourbons, like the old French Bourbons who never learned anything and never forgot anything.

Mr. CARAWAY. I think you are too hard on the Bourbons.

Mr. KING. A sort of general understanding over the country amongst themselves that every time the common people want anything or a chance for their white ally, to be sure to hit the proposition in the head, and all the time, night and day, without regard to religion, without regard to politics, without regard to art, sense, or anything else, they are always working on this one particular thing, and as soon as they are through with this they are on to another. To-night, I think it is to-night, I have an invitation from the Chicago Chamber of Commerce, signed by Mr. H. H. Merrick, the president——

Mr. JOHNSON (interposing). Of the National Security League?

Mr. KING. He is president here of the Chicago Association of Commerce.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is he not also the president of the Chicago branch of the National Security League?

Mr. KING. He is; yes, sir. The same gentleman and the same one who tried me in Chicago, one of my judges. I don't in any way want to compare myself to that Divine Person in the slightest degree who lived many thousand years ago, but I do have a right to draw the comparison between the judges that sat on my case and those that examined him for a while and rushed him in before Pontius Pilate.

"You are invited to be a guest at dinner of the Chicago Association of Commerce, Friday, February 7, at 7 o'clock, New Willard Hotel.

"This will be an informal meeting of the Senators and Congressmen from Illinois, with whom a delegation from the association desires to confer"—

He wants us to sit with him—

"regarding highly important aspects of the employment situation. It will afford, too, an opportunity to advise fully and informally with respect to other public issues of vital importance."

So they are no more through with one thing than another one begins. Now, you will have some other kind of a league, some other proposition coming along very soon. I have observed that all through my public life; I have always had to contend with it; others have had to contend with it; some have gone down trying to sustain themselves against it; many of them finally give way and go over and quit. The game is too expensive without being with them; you must go along with them if you care to go on in politics. That is the feeling of many.

I think that is all, gentlemen. I would like to have the committee examine me, though, on anything you want to.

Mr. REAVIS. Are you affiliated with any particular faction of the Republican Party in Illinois?

Mr. KING. No, sir; I am not.

Mr. REAVIS. That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. BROWNE. I would just like to ask Mr. King if that is the same Harry H. Merrick that on January 9, 1919, delivered an address before the association of commerce, or the Railway Business Association of Chicago, on organizing against governmental control of railroads?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. BROWNE. I notice that is gotten out in pamphlet form and on the back of it says:

"Requests for copies of this letter will be welcomed from all desiring to place in the hands of their Representatives or friends. Copies furnished to lists upon applications.

"FRANK W. KNOTSON,
"Secretary Railway Business Association,
"30 Church Street, New York."

Mr. KING. Yes, sir; that is the same fellow.

Now, if there is anything that the committee thinks I have neglected, I will be very glad if they will call my attention to it. I had to get my testimony together rather hurriedly, and possibly some important propositions I may have neglected.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. King, you may have gone into this, and if so we will strike this question out of the record. You read Mr. Wetten's testimony?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir. That is, I read it hurriedly at the table a few minutes ago.

Mr. CARAWAY. You observe that you said you were apologizing for your votes and your speech? Did you do any such thing?

Mr. KING. I am glad the gentleman has called my attention to that. No, sir; I never made any apology. I didn't make any apology for my votes. According to their own standards, I was about 60 per cent patriotic according to their chart, and I called their attention to that and in conclusion I said, "Gentleman, look over this chart there. Instead of condemning me you ought to commend me for complying with the conditions of the chart." I never apologized anywhere for anything. I told them that since I had stated in the speech that I would support the war and the President if it was so carried, that I had done so, and that I had a personal letter from the President commending me for—and this was the thing that while it didn't bother this committee, it bothered one of their offshoots down State—I actually voted for the espionage bill. They called it "gagging" the press. The President wanted it. Webb stated on the floor that the President wanted it, and he needed it to help win the war, and I voted for that.

So all my record was in support of everything that was asked for in support of the war. They said, "You voted against conscription, didn't you"? I said, "Yes; I voted against conscription. That is, in other words, I voted for the volunteer system of raising an army." I said that was a matter upon which men had a right to differ. "All you men would not have agreed upon that if you had been there, and there was a great number of Members of the House, nearly 150 of them, who thought that plan should have been adopted. There was nothing unpatriotic about that; nothing that tended to show that a man wasn't going to support the war—the method by which he thought the Army should be raised had nothing to do with the question."

That was about all that was said upon that subject, and I said I thought—I had an idea (perhaps I may have been wrong in that) that we could raise a volunteer army; that we could go out and make these talks to the boys in advance, instead of putting them in a camp and then going and talking to them afterwards.

Mr. CARAWAY. You read Wetten's testimony with reference to what occurred when you were examined?

Mr. KING. There is not a word of truth in his testimony, except that I was present.

Mr. CARAWAY. And he was present?

Mr. KING. Yes. And yet I will say this for Mr. Wetten, I think he was the fairest man on that committee, and I think that he had probably more to do with the result, so far as the final action of the committee is concerned, than anybody else had. I don't know.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; Juul's open letter was the thing that affected the final action of the committee. You read Merrick's testimony as to that?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARAWAY. Was anything true in it except that you and he were present?

Mr. KING. No, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. King, did this subcommittee that examined you express any opinion before you left as to whether or not they were going to take any part in your campaign?

Mr. KING. They did not. I presumed at the time that they were, on account of the literature which was scattered on the table there, and which I had access to, that they intended to take a part in it. They didn't take any part after that except to give out to the newspapers in the city of Chicago that I had been there that afternoon and had been up before the committee. And I said: "Gentlemen, if you have nothing against me, why don't you commend me and advise the voters of my district to vote for me?" They said: "We never do that. We just criticize."

Mr. HARRISON. Did they ask you to give nothing to the press touching that meeting?

Mr. KING. No; they didn't ask me—yes; I think they did.

Mr. HARRISON. But they did give to the press themselves that you were present?

Mr. KING. The press had it anyway. The press was around the door, outside, and the press, believe me, will get it when they want it.

Mr. HARRISON. Did you ask them not to take any part in your race?

Mr. KING. No.

Mr. HARRISON. Did you make any such request as that?

Mr. KING. No, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. Did you express to them that you were sorry for any votes that you had cast?

Mr. KING. I did not.

Mr. HARRISON. The reason why I asked is that one of the committee stated that you had made such an expression before the committee. Were any of the charts distributed in your district, do you know?

Mr. KING. I think they were.

Mr. HARRISON. By the Chicago branch?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. Do you know?

Mr. KING. I couldn't say. But I want to say this right in that connection: Some intimation is given that the National Security League took no part in the elections. That is not true, because I have got a letter right here from Mr. Orth, in which he asked me the name of my Democratic opponent and which I sent to him, and they sent to my Democratic opponent one of their questionnaires which he filled out, promising to do as they said under all circumstances and conditions that might arise from now till the end of the world, and he published it in the newspaper that he would do that, and I think that hurt him.

Mr. HARRISON. That is all I have.

Mr. REAVIS. Did you express any regret to them that you had circulated the speech through the district?

Mr. KING. I didn't say that. This is what I said. They said, "You are charged here"—this they got from the opposition—"with having circulated your speech all over the district after you delivered it." "Well, now," I says, "gentlemen, I will tell you the exact truth about that. I have about 1,500 friends that I have on a personal list, that I know personally in the district, and I sent to each one of them a copy of the speech. Those are all the speeches I sent out. There are 215,000 voters in the district, and I never sent them out to any of the voters whatever. I sent them out to about 1,500 friends in order that they might know what my position was at the time."

Mr. CARAWAY. May I call your attention—you said 215,000 voters. You don't mean that, do you?

Mr. KING. That is the population.

Mr. REAVIS. Now, the Congressmen that voted against war, a number of them made speeches explaining the reasons for their attitude; but when war was declared in the regular and constitutional way, for a Congressman to send a speech through his district that would justify his conduct or would be an attempt to justify his action on the war resolution, if it justified his action on the war resolution in voting against it, it would be in the nature of a criticism of the burden that the Government had taken on.

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. With that idea in view, did it impel you to refrain from sending your speech generally through your district?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir, it did; and I so stated that to the committee of the National Security League in Mr. Wetten's office. That is probably where they got the impression that I was sorry for something. I said to them: "After sending those speeches out, which were probably a week or two or three after the declaration of war, while they were a great defense of my own attitude, as I thought, and my reasons for voting as I did, nevertheless, now that we are at war, perhaps there were some things in the speech that might be questioned, and I refrained from sending any more speeches out after sending the 1,500 out."

Mr. REAVIS. Well, don't you know, Mr. King, that many of the men who have been seriously criticized by this league, who voted against war, refrained from sending out anything that would justify or tend to justify their own conduct, preferring to incur the criticism than to do anything that might tend to militate against the common impulse in favor of their country after they had gotten into war?

Mr. KING. And by doing that they were making a great sacrifice, putting themselves in a position for an attack without any means of defending themselves.

Mr. REAVIS. And to an attack from which they could not defend themselves without criticizing the action of the Government?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. And for that reason they preferred to endure the attacks rather than to defend themselves?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir; and those men undoubtedly found in their districts many people asking them, "Why didn't you send me your speech, so I would know something about why you did this?" I am glad the gentleman from Nebraska brought that point up.

Mr. JOHNSON. The committee stands adjourned until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 4.35 o'clock p. m., the committee adjourned until 10 o'clock a. m., February 6, 1919.)

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. L. C. DYER,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 18, 1919.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert the following:

MEDALS OF HONOR.

[From Military Laws of the United States, 1915, with supplement to Mar 5, 1917.]

1013. President may cause to be issued: That the President cause to be struck, from the dies recently prepared at the United States mint for that purpose, "medals of honor" additional to those authorized by the act (resolution) of July 12, 1862, and present the same to such officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates as have most distinguished, or may hereafter most distinguish, themselves in action. (Sec. 6, act of Mar. 3, 1863, 12 Stat., 751.)

This provision was not embraced in the Revised Statutes. Medals of honor will be awarded by the President to officers and men who most distinguished themselves in action. (Pars. 182, 183, and 188, A. R., 1913; see also G. O. 42, A. G. O., 1897, and G. O. 135, A. G. O., 1899.)

As section 6 of the act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat., 751), provides for the award of the medal of honor under certain conditions to officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates only, held, that it may not be awarded for distinguished services in action by a contract or acting assistant surgeon, who is no longer in the service. (Dig. Opin., J. A. G., 1b. 665, ed., 1912.)

See also Twentieth Opinions Attorney General, 421, in which advice was given not to grant the medal, as when the application was received, nearly 28 years after the gallant conduct, there was no official record on file in the War Department to substantiate the claim.

See Twenty-fourth Opinions Attorney General, 580, in which it is held that the fact that after the application or recommendation is made the applicant leaves the service does not prevent the President from making the award.

A medal of honor is a recognition of gallantry which is granted by authority of Congress to such officers or enlisted men "as have most distinguished themselves in action." When a medal is conferred there is included in the grant a conveyance of ownership of the medal, regarded as a chattel, which becomes the property of the grantee, and is subject to such disposition as he may see fit to make of it as a part of his personal estate, subject, however, to the qualification that it may be worn and used as a medal of honor only by the person upon whom it was originally conferred in recognition of his military services. (Id., 1c, 665.)

1014. May be awarded after separation from the service: For 3,000 medals of honor to be prepared, with suitable emblematic devices, upon the design of the medal of honor heretofore issued, or upon an improved design, together with appropriate rosettes or other insignia to be worn in lieu of the medal, and to be presented by direction of the President, and in the name of Congress, to such officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates as have most distinguished, or may hereafter most distinguish, themselves by their gallantry in action, $12,000: Provided, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to use so many of the medals and rosettes or other insignia provided for by this act as may be necessary to replace the medals that have been issued under the joint resolution of Congress approved July 12, 1862, and section 6 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1863: And provided further, That whenever it shall appear from official records in the War Department that any officer or enlisted man of the Army so distinguished himself in action as to entitle him to the award of the congressional medal of honor under the provisions of the sixth section of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1863, entitled "An act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1864, and for the year ending the 30th of June, 1863, and for other purposes," the fact that the person who so distinguished himself has since become separated from the military service, so that the award of the medal to him was not specifically recommended or applied for while he was in the said service, shall not be held to prevent the award and presentation of the medal to such person under the provisions of the law hereinbefore cited. Act of April 23, 1904 (33 Stat., 274).

The act of April 23, 1904 (33 Stat., 274), provides, "Whenever it shall appear from official records in the War Department that any officer or enlisted man of the Army so distinguished himself in action as to entitle him to the award" of the medal of honor under the then existing law, the award shall not be prevented by the fact that the person has since become separated from military service, or that it was not recommended or applied for while he was in the service. Held that the "official record" is one that must have been made by an officer of the Army pursuant to statute, regulation, orders, or custom. Held further that an oral recommendation was not an "official record," and therefore could not be the basis of the award of a medal. (Dig. Opin. J. A. G., A 2a, 665; see, also, Cir. 22, 1905, War Dept.)

The recommendation for a medal of honor was not made until more than a year had elapsed after the gallant conduct upon which it was based, l. c., July 1, 1863. Held that under the legislative rule fixed by the act of April 23, 1904 (33 Stat., 274), if it shall appear from the official records in the War Department that an officer or enlisted man has so distinguished himself in action as to entitle him to the award under the act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat., 751), the award may be made. (Id., 2d, 666.)

1015. May be replaced when lost or destroyed: That in any case where the President of the United States has heretofore, under any act or resolution of Congress, caused any medal to be made and presented to any officer or person in the United States on account of distinguished or meritorious services, on a proper showing made by such person to the satisfaction of the President that such medal has been lost or destroyed through no fault of the beneficiary, and that diligent search has been made therefor, the President is hereby authorized to cause to be prepared and delivered to such person a duplicate of such medal, the cost of which shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. Joint resolution No. 23 of April 15, 1904 (33 Stat., 588).

Held that the President has no authority under the act of April 23, 1904 (33 Stat., 274), to refuse to replace a medal that was awarded under the joint resolution of July 12, 1862 (12 Stat., 623), and the act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat., 751), when the same is presented for that purpose by its owner. (Dig. Opin. J. A. G., 2b, 665.)

1016. Not required to surrender old when replaced by new: The holders of medals of honor under the act approved July 12, 1862, and section 6 of the act approved March 3, 1863, shall not be required to surrender such medals in case such medals are replaced in pursuance of the provisions of the act of Congress approved April 23, 1904; and that wherever the holders of such medals of honor have surrendered them, in order to receive the medals provided for by said act approved April 23, 1904, such medals shall be returned to them: Provided, That no recipient of both medals shall wear both medals at the same time. Joint resolution No. 17 of February 27, 1907 (34 Stat., 1422).

1017. Rosette, or knot, and ribbon to be worn in lieu of and with: The Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue to any person to whom a medal of honor has been awarded, or may hereafter be awarded, under the provisions of the joint resolution approved July 12, 1862, and the act approved March 3, 1863, a rosette or knot, to be worn in lieu of the medal, and a ribbon to be worn with the medal, said rosette or knot and ribbon to be each of a pattern to be prescribed and established by the President of the United States; and any appropriation that may hereafter be available for the contingent expenses of the War Department is hereby made available for the purposes of this act: Provided, That whenever a ribbon issued under the provisions of this act shall have been lost, destroyed, or rendered unfit for use, without fault or neglect on the part of the person to whom it is issued, the Secretary of War shall cause a new ribbon to be issued to such person without charge therefor. Joint resolution No. 51, May 2, 1896 (29 Stat., 473).

ARTICLE XXV.

MEDALS OF HONOR AND CERTIFICATES OF MERIT.

182. Medals of honor authorized by Congress are awarded to officers and enlisted men in the name of the Congress for particular deeds of most distinguished gallantry in action.

1. In order that the medal of honor may be awarded, officers or enlisted men must perform in action deeds of most distinguished personal bravery or self-sacrifice above and beyond the call of duty so conspicuous as clearly to distinguish them for gallantry and intrepidity above their comrades, involving risk of life or the performance of more than ordinarily hazardous service, and the omission of which would not justly subject the person to censure as for shortcoming or failure in the performance of his duty. The recommendations for the medal will be judged by this standard of extraordinary merit and incontestable proof of the performance of the service will be exacted.

2. For most distinguished gallantry in action, a medal of honor can be awarded to a person, regardless of whether he is in the military service or not, provided he was at the time of the gallant act or acts an officer, noncommissioned officer, or private in the Army of the United States.

3. Consideration of cases will be confined to those in which a specific recommendation for the award of a medal of honor was made or shall be made at the time of the action or within one year thereafter. The testimony in support of such recommendation must, when practicable, embrace that of at least two eyewitnesses, and must be in the form of certificates from officers and affidavits from enlisted men and others, describing specifically the act or acts of gallantry performed.

4. Commanding officers will thoroughly investigate all cases of recommendation for medals of honor arising in their commands and indorse their opinion upon the papers, which will be forwarded to The Adjutant General of the Army through regular channels.

183. Announcement of the award of a medal of honor to an officer or enlisted man of the Army will be made in orders from the War Department at the time that the award is made. Upon receipt of copies of such an order commanding officers will publish the order at the first formation at which orders are published to their commands.

184. When any enlisted man of the Army shall have distinguished himself in the service the President may grant a certificate of merit to him on the recommendation of the commanding officer of the regiment or chief of the corps to which such man belongs.

1. A certificate of merit can be granted only upon condition that the proper recommendation therefor is made while the person to whom the grant of the certificate is recommended is in the military service of the United States.

2. Unless the commanding officer of the regiment or corps in which the enlisted man was serving at the time he distinguished himself specifically recommends the award of a certificate of merit to that man such certificate can not be granted to him upon the recommendation of any superior commander or of any other officer.

3. Consideration of cases will be confined to those in which the specific recommendation referred to in the preceding section was made or shall be made at the time of the act or within one year thereafter.

4. The word "corps," as used in this article, is construed to refer to any staff corps or department of the Army or any body of troops not forming part of a regiment.

185. Recommendations for a certificate of merit must be based upon the statement of an eyewitness, preferably the immediate commander. The act or acts by which the enlisted man distinguished himself must be specifically described, and when the recommendation is made by a commissioned officer who was an eyewitness it must be so stated. When a commissioned officer was not an eyewitness, the testimony, when practicable, of at least two eyewitnesses who so describe themselves must accompany the recommendation. Each case will be submitted separately and forwarded through the regular channels, with the views or recommendations of each commander indorsed thereon, including the commanding officer of the regiment or chief of the corps to which the enlisted man belongs.

186. Additional pay at the rate of $2 a month from the date of the distinguished service is allowed to each enlisted man to whom a certificate of merit is granted.

187. If the soldier be out of the service when the certificate is issued, it will be retained in the office of The Adjutant General of the Army until called for, when proof of the identity of the applicant will be required. Should he die before receiving his certificate, it will be deposited in the office of the Auditor for the War Department for delivery to those legally entitled to it.

188. Neither a medal of honor nor a certificate of merit will be awarded to any case when the service of the person recommended, subsequent to the time he distinguished himself, has not been honorable.

189. Any person in the military service who comes, except by legal transfer or bequest of the owner, into possession of a medal or badge that is indicative of military service or efficiency not authorized to be worn as a part of the uniform of the Army shall immediately report the fact of such possession to his commanding officer for report to The Adjutant General of the Army, with a view to its return to the proper owner.

The distribution of bronze medals, commemorative of the naval and other engagements in the waters of the West Indies and on the shores of Cuba during the War with Spain, to officers and men of the Navy and Marine Corps who participated in said engagements or who rendered specially meritorious service otherwise than in battle, was authorized in resolution of March 3, 1901, No. 18, 31 Statutes, 1465.

Rosettes and ribbons to be issued to holders of medals of honor: That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue to any person to whom a medal of honor has been awarded, or may hereafter be awarded, under the provisions of the acts approved December 21, 1862, and July 16, 1862, a rosette or knot to be worn in lieu of the medal and a ribbon to be worn with the medal, said rosette or knot and ribbon to be each of a pattern to be prescribed and established by the President of the United States, and any appropriation that may hereafter be available for the contingent expenses of the Navy Department is hereby made available for the purposes of this act: Provided, That whenever a ribbon issued under the provisions of this act shall have been lost, destroyed, or rendered unfit for use, without fault or neglect on the part of the person to whom it was issued, the Secretary of the Navy shall cause a new ribbon to be issued to such person without charge therefor. (30 Stat., 741.)

SEC. 2715 (act Mar. 3, 1901, c. 850). Gratuities and medals of honor to enlisted men of Navy or Marine Corps for distinguished services: Any enlisted man of the Navy or Marine Corps who shall have distinguished himself in battle or displayed extraordinary heroism in the line of his profession shall, upon the recommendation of his commanding officer, approved by the flag officer and the Secretary of the Navy, receive a gratuity and medal of honor as provided for seamen in section 1407 of the Revised Statutes. (31 Stat., 1099.)

SEC. 2715a. (Act Mar. 3, 1915, c. 83.) Medals of honor to officers of Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard: The President of the United States is hereby empowered to prepare a suitable medal of honor to be awarded to any officer of the Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard who shall have distinguished himself in battle or displayed extraordinary heroism in the line of his profession. The recipient shall, when practicable, be ordered to Washington, D. C., and the presentation will be made by the President as Commander in Chief, or by such representative as the President may designate. When not practicable to have the presentation at Washington, the details of time, place, and ceremony will be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy for each case. In time of war the presentation shall be made by the commander in chief of the fleet, or the division commander.

[Act of Apr. 27, 1916, ch. 88 (39 Stat., 53).]

ARMY AND NAVY MEDAL OF HONOR ROLL.

Chapter 88. An act to establish in the War Department and in the Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as "the Army and Navy medal of honor roll," and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby established in the War Department and Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as "the Army and Navy medal of honor roll." Upon written application made to the Secretary of the proper department, and subject to the conditions and requirements hereinafter contained, the name of each surviving person who has served in the military or naval service of the United States in any war, who has attained or shall attain the age of 65 years, and who has been awarded a medal of honor for having in action involving actual conflict with an enemy distinguished himself conspicuously by gallantry or intrepidity, at the risk of his life, above and beyond the call of duty, and who was honorably discharged from service by muster out, resignation, or otherwise, shall be, by the Secretary of the proper department, entered and recorded on said roll. Applications for entry on said roll shall be made in such form and under such regulations as shall be prescribed by the War Department and Navy Department, respectively, and proper blanks and instructions shall be, by the proper Secretary, furnished without charge upon request made by any person claiming the benefits of this act.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War and of the Secretary of the Navy to carry this act into effect and to decide whether each applicant, under this act, in his department is entitled to the benefit of this act. If the official award of the medal of honor to the applicant, or the official notice to him thereof, shall appear to show that the medal of honor was awarded to the applicant for such an act as is required by the provisions of this act, it shall be deemed sufficient to entitle the applicant to such special pension without further investigation. Otherwise all official correspondence, orders, reports, recommendations, requests, and other evidence now on file in any public office or department shall be considered. A certificate of service and of the act of heroism, gallantry, bravery, or intrepidity for which the medal of honor was awarded, and of enrollment under this act, and of the right of the special pensioner to be entitled to and to receive the special pension herein granted, shall be furnished each person whose name shall be so entered on said roll. The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall deliver to the Commissioner of Pensions a certified copy of each of such of said certificates as he may issue, as aforesaid, and the same shall be full and sufficient authority to the Commissioner of Pensions for the payment by him to the beneficiary named in each such certificate the special pension herein provided for.

SEC. 3. That each such surviving person whose name shall have been entered on said roll in accordance with this act shall be entitled to and shall receive and be paid by the Commissioner of Pensions in the Department of the Interior, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, a special pension of $10 per month for life, payable quarter yearly. The Commissioner of Pensions shall make all necessary rules and regulations for making payment of such special pensions to the beneficiaries thereof.

Such special pension shall begin on the day that such person shall file his application for enrollment on said roll in the office of the Secretary of War or of the Secretary of the Navy after the passage and approval of this act, and shall continue during the life of the beneficiary.

Such special pension shall not deprive any such special pensioner of any other pension or of any benefit, right, or privilege to which he is or may hereafter be entitled under any existing or subsequent law, but shall be in addition thereto.

The special pension allowed under this act shall not be subject to any attachment, execution, levy, tax, lien, or detention under any process whatever.

SEC. 4. That in case any person has been awarded two or more medals of honor, he shall not be entitled to and shall not receive more than one such special pension.

Rank in the service shall not be considered in applications filed hereunder.

The Naval Appropriation Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GILBERT A. CURRIE,

OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 10, 1919.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I have already spoken somewhat at length upon this subject. Under the permission granted me to extend my remarks I shall briefly submit some further data showing the futility of now authorizing the President, at some future time and at his discretion, to enormously increase our Navy. We should withhold such authority and exercise our own judgment at the proper time. This is the constitutional duty and prerogative of Congress. Why, then, shirk this responsibility and direct that one man may, in the light of developments, decide our naval policy? Congress will be in session and it should decide the question, just as the framers of our Constitution intended.

The present bill carries an appropriation of over $720,000,000. It also provides an authorization for the so-called presidential program which will cost an additional half billion dollars to construct.

The act of 1916 provided for the construction of 10 first-class battleships, 6 battle cruisers, 10 scout cruisers, and a vast number of destroyers and smaller craft. That act contemplated an expenditure estimated at $815,000,000. Congress must yet appropriate, in round numbers, in addition to the amounts carried in the present bill, $400,000,000 to complete the 1916 program.

The battleship Idaho, authorized by Congress in 1914 and contracted for in the same year, is just now nearing completion. The battleship Tennessee, authorized by Congress in 1915, is but a trifle more than half completed. Construction is not yet started on 6 of the great battleships authorized by Congress in 1916. Not one of the 6 battle cruisers authorized by the same Congress is yet under course of construction. The remaining 4 great battleships authorized in 1916 are from 5 to 38 per cent complete.

We are building 73 submarines, and 9 more have already been authorized; 212 destroyers are in course of construction and 12 more authorized.

Secretary Daniels, testifying before the Committee on Naval Affairs, submitted a statement showing all vessels not completed but authorized prior to the act of August 29, 1916, and the progress of work on the vessels authorized in 1916 and subsequent acts. I insert that statement by the Secretary of the Navy, omitting therefrom the details concerning destroyers and any reference to smaller craft.

The statement referred to is as follows:

BATTLESHIPS, DECEMBER 1, 1918.

All of the 13 battleships under construction are building under regular naval appropriation acts, as indicated. The last 10 were authorized under the three-year building program of August 29, 1916. Appropriations were made for four of them under that act; three under the act of March 4, 1917; three under the act of July 1, 1918.

During the war work was practically suspended upon the battleships of the three-year program except the Maryland at Newport News and her sister vessel, the West Virginia. The Mississippi at Newport News and the New Mexico at the navy yard, New York, were completed during the war and work continued upon the Idaho at the New York Shipbuilding Co. and the Tennessee and California at the navy yards, New York and Mare Island. All battleship work will now proceed as fast as material and labor become available.

BATTLE CRUISERS, DECEMBER 1, 1918.

The six battle cruisers listed are being built under regular appropriations for increase of the Navy. All six were authorized by the three-year building program of August 29, 1916. Appropriations were made for four of them under that bill, and one each under the bills of March 4, 1917, and July 1, 1918.

Work upon these vessels was suspended during the war. Advantage was taken of the delay to make various improvements in the plans believed advisable as a result of experience in the present war. The improved plans are now in the hands of the contractors and work will proceed as fast as material and labor are made available.

SCOUT CRUISERS, DECEMBER 1, 1918.

The 10 scout cruisers listed are all building under regular appropriations for increase of the Navy. All 10 were authorized by the three-year building program of August 29, 1916. Four of them were appropriated for by that bill, three by the bill of March 4, 1917, and three by the bill of July 1, 1918.

Work upon these vessels was practically suspended during the war. In fact, the keel of No. 4, which had been laid at Seattle, was removed from the slip at the request of the Emergency Fleet Corporation to enable certain Shipping Board work to be pressed. The contractor for Nos. 4, 5, and 6 sold his Seattle yard where the construction of these vessels was originally contemplated and they will be built at a yard in Tacoma, Wash. Work upon all of these vessels will now go ahead as fast as material and labor are available.

Destroyers Nos. 75 to 109, inclusive, and destroyers Nos. 345 to 359, inclusive, are building under the three-year building program of August 29, 1916; 20 of these destroyers, Nos. 75 to 94, inclusive, were appropriated for in that act; 15 destroyers, Nos. 95 to 109, inclusive, were appropriated for March 4, 1917; 15 destroyers, Nos. 345 to 359, inclusive, were appropriated for July 1, 1918.

Seventy-six destroyers, Nos. 110 to 185, inclusive, are being built under the emergency fund in the act of March 4, 1917; 150 destroyers, Nos. 186 to 335, inclusive, are building under appropriation "Increase of the Navy, torpedo boat destroyers," in the naval deficiency bill of October 6, 1917; 9, Nos. 336 to 344, inclusive, are being built under the emergency funds of March 4, 1917, and October 6, 1917. Of the 15 destroyers appropriated for July 1, 1918, only 3 have yet been placed.

Of the destroyers above, 45 have been completed since April 6, 1917. Of destroyers previously authorized, not included in this table, 6 have been completed since April 6, 1917, making 51 in all since April 6, 1917. Recent destroyer completions have been as follows: July, 5; August, 3; September, 11; October, 5; November, 8.

SPEECH

OF

HON. CHARLES H. SLOAN,

OF NEBRASKA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, January 16, 1919.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 14078) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I support this amendment, and I desire to present a few reasons. I should have been pleased if the superintendent of this institution had been granted an increase of salary, recognizing as I do his zeal and efficiency. This is an institution of which the Nation, and the Capital especially, might well be proud, but concerning which there seems little information and in which there is too little interest taken.

I was astonished this morning, while calling at the Congressional Library, at the limited bibliography there is relating to the Botanic Garden. Yet it is one of the most interesting institutions we have in the city of Washington. It is worthy of the fullest and most faithful record. Its varied phases are entitled to the tribute of speech and verse.

The first legend deemed worth mentioning was that when George Washington was projecting the city of his name the stubborn Scot called David Burns, who always opposed "the Mount Vernon surveyor," unsuccessfully endeavored to have the Botanic Garden near the White House rather than the Capitol. While Burns did not have his way, there was no Botanic Garden really provided for until 1820, during Monroe's administration. The President gave the Columbian Institute—the predecessor of the Smithsonian—permission to establish a botanic garden "just west of the Capitol."

Its location was on a tract called Rome—note the names—owned by one Pope, over which flowed the Tiber River—a river well known then but in these iconoclastic days may soon be referred to as was that Brazilian river explored by the late Theodore Roosevelt as the "River of Doubt."

Little was accomplished by the Columbian Institute before 1836 except to drain the site and plant some trees. The first appropriation was made for the garden by Congress, of $1,200, in 1843. I have no intention to burden the record with statistics, but I venture to recall that it was in 1854 we first read of William R. Smith, the old-time superintendent, who had charge until his death in 1912. The salary in 1854 was $50 per month; the helpers $1.50 and $1.25 per day, respectively. In 1856 there was public record of Oqui Adair, a Chinese laborer in the greenhouse, whose wages were fixed at $1 per day. In 1857 there was provision for employment of a boy as seed packer, at $12 per month. Salary and wages, meager then, are not liberal now. All Washingtonians and many Capital visitors knew Supt. Smith, who served his apprenticeship in the Kew Gardens of England.

The stories told of Smith would fill a book. He knew plants and he saw as many literary flowers in the works of Robert Burns as many a man could see real flowers in the Botanic Garden. He was an evangel of flowers, a champion of Robert Burns, and an uncompromising defender of the unsightly Botanic Garden wall. The congressional decree for the removal of the wall clashed with the old superintendent's will that it should remain, and Congress came off second best. And when he died the "wall," like the Star-Spangled Banner, was "still there."

It is told that one of the things Smith insisted upon as the doorway to his favor and the gift of flowers was that the recipient knew of Robert Burns and could quote his poetry. There was an occasion when a highly stationed official tried to obtain some flowers from the garden for some state event. Smith promised him the flowers. But to impress it upon Smith, the Senator said, "As Jimmy Burns said." "As Jimmy Burns said?" interjected Smith. "Why don't you talk about Tommy Alexander, Billy Bonaparte, or Charlie Christ. You get no flowers from this Botanic Garden." [Laughter.]

The visitor to our National Capital is always struck when he sees the eastern side of the Capitol by its low elevation. It is like the inhabitants of the Capital City, a decided objection to rising to meet the morning sun. While, when you come to the rear of this massive and historic building, standing as it does upon the crown of this commanding hill which nature seems to have placed for this particular purpose, and note the imposing landscape there, and the stately architecture of the building, again the people of Washington are typified in the fact that they extend the day as far as they possibly can to the last unit of time.

In the same way we, who have followed the course of empire some thousand miles farther than you of the East take it it as a tribute to the best and greatest part of the country that the western side of the Capitol is more imposing than the eastern. But marring that general effect there is an institution, not the institution itself but the barrier with which it is inclosed, to which I voice a criticism and protest.

A stranger coming down Pennsylvania Avenue from Union Station is struck, of course, with the position and appearance of the National Capitol which challenges the first attention of American and foreigner alike. Looking southward he sees a wall of old brick masonry surmounted by long spears of iron. It looks as if one of the phalanxes of Alexander had suddenly stacked and abandoned arms, leaving these spears planted in the masonry to prevent and punish a trespass. But we have, once we pass the wall, one of the most entertaining and instructive places in Washington.

It has been my custom during the eight years I have been a Member to take early morning walks, going wherever my fancy, time, opportunity, or suggestion of companion indicated. I frequently visit the Botanic Garden. I have been impressed with the lack of interest that Representatives and Senators, at least in the morning hour, show in this rare institution. It will enlarge your experience in Washington. If you forget the absolute traverse of space and overlook its measurements you can travel all the longitudes of the earth measured by its productions. You can travel from the lowest latitude to almost the highest. You can accomplish considerable altitude without wearied limb or shortened breath. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SLOAN. Not only may you have that experience, but you may have the delight of that institution in all the manifestations of nature when under culture and care. I know no other walk so interesting as the one which follows a line projecting directly from the mid Capitol down through the "avenue of palms" in the summer, which will transport you without a railroad ticket or steamboat passage to the farthest tropical regions. It will not take long, if you know the location down there, to find the petric mounds upon which you discern the plant life which prospers on mountain side, near mountain peak, or in the far northern latitude. You see all the flowers from all parts of the earth, from the modest violet and most delicate orchid up to the gorgeous American beauty and the resplendent flower of the sun. National flowers are there—the rose of Britain, the lily of France, the thistle of Scotland, and shamrock of Ireland. There are flowers which bloom only in daylight under the kiss of the sun, while there are those other strange creations which yield blush and smile only under the cover of night. There are plants which continue in bloom through the large part of their existence, while there is that patient, stately, living column which only once in a century's span displays its colors.

In this garden a century plant bloomed in 1917. Its life began about the close of the last American-British war, when the Capitol conflagration set by enemy hands was raging. It stood stately and tall in glorious bloom in 1917, when America and Britain fought together to defend their respective Capitals against a cruel and vandal foe. Then, too, there are plants whose fruits are sweet to the palate and nutritious to the being growing near those of deadliest poison.

While the general ensemble of the floral beauty prompts extravagant speech, there is one, were its substance to touch the human tongue, speech paralysis would result for nine days. This is called the mother-in-law plant, a too valuable tribute to that ancient humor which from time immemorial has wrought injustice to the often best of women. It has been suggested—by a Member of the House of course—that this plant be installed in one of the recently acquired French vases of the Senate, hoping to accomplish thereby what Members have failed to reach by rule—the terminals of debate. [Laughter.]

Throughout that garden there is every tree from every part of this great globe. We have there the coffee and tea, the tree of life, the crown of thorns, the Banian, the tall pine, many varieties of the sturdy oak, and the stately elm.

There are interesting legends of that institution concerning trees that are found there. Eminent men in the course of the history of this institution planted trees there.

Charles A. Dana, the great editor, carried an acorn from the grave of Confucius and planted it here. It stands in solemn grandeur, lifting each year its head higher in air as if to look to its far-off source of being.

You will find a beautiful acacia, "that plant of deep root," planted there by Gen. Grant. It will bloom not far from his tomb, that "future ages may know the right."

Two cedars of Lebanon, whose ancestors furnished timbers for King Solomon's temple, were planted and thrive there, placed by Senators Hoar and Evarts.

The peace oak, planted by Senator Crittenden, of Kentucky—who could more appropriately plant it than he? The friend of Clay, the "Pacificator"—from the State which gave birth in one year to Abraham Lincoln and Jefferson Davis.

Standing in triangular position are the "trees of the tragedians," Edwin Booth, Edwin Forrest, and John Wilkes Booth. Each selected the bald or water cypress for his planting. Those of the elder Booth and Forrest are tall and stately. The other, dwarfed and sickly, presents the spectacle of nature's rebuke to his infamy, while the others are tributes to the mastery of a great art.

Over in the eastern part of the garden is the famous hornbeam, the most umbrageous tree I ever saw, its compact foliage a perfect shield from sun and to a large degree protection from storm. It covers one-tenth of an acre of earth. Here the birds nest and sing. Their chorus of the morning and their subdued orchestra at vesper are worth your walk to the garden. This sound, protective tree was planted by Abraham Lincoln—suggestive of his memory, now safe, and the cardinal economic policy which he professed, because he was for all of the United States and all for the United States. He stood for nationalism against sectionalism. Many believe if he were living now he would have still stood for nationalism against internationalism. [Applause.]

In the midst of the garden, arising out of a mammoth pool, where water lilies bloom and fishes swim, towers the Bartholdi Fountain. That fountain stood and yielded its crystal tribute at Fairmount Park, Philadelphia, when America celebrated the centennial of our independence. As the sunlight falls upon its stream and spray, every garden visitor finds improvised his own particular rainbow. It was well said by a visitor last summer, "The old Bartholdi certainly manifests the spirit of '76." [Applause.]

But with such an institution as this it would appear to the ordinary passer-by to be perhaps a cloister where the devotees of a religion or some cult had been set apart from their fellow men. I heard a foreigner going by there, looking at it this year, say, "Is that the place where they intern the alien enemies of the Government?" The unsightly wall should be removed.

There is another fact down there not immediately connected with this amendment or this bill. That is the neglect of the monument to U. S. Grant. That monument with its bronze cavalry at one end and its artillery at the other, and its neglected features in the middle, will soon be an anachronism. The soldier of the future will not know what its symbols mean.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SLOAN. Just one more minute, please.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I prepared this speech this morning, and I am like Madame de Stäel, who wrote a letter to a friend and said, "I beg your pardon for the length of this letter, but I am so hurried I can not write a shorter one."

I desire to say that two things ought to occur. For one thing, the monument should be finished, and the other, the wall should see its finish. [Applause.]

Post Office Conference Report.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALLEN T. TREADWAY.
OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 19, 1919.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, the conference report on the Post Office appropriation bill contains an unconsidered amendment. That is the item that was inserted on the floor of the other branch without committee approval and has been agreed to by the House conferees. It appropriates $50,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, $75,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and a like amount for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, a total of $200,000,000 to be added to the available funds heretofore appropriated under the so-called good-roads act.

As one of the Representatives from Massachusetts I was opposed to the original act and I am opposed to this further appropriation. Good roads is one of the greatest assets any State or community can have, largely for the benefit of its own population. Massachusetts was one of the first States to construct State highways, and the wisdom of the advanced legislation by that State has become more and more apparent as the years demonstrate its value. The Massachusetts statutes have been particularly favorable to rural communities, so that to-day there is probably not a town even of the smallest population that has not some State-improved road within its limits. Where local conditions permitted, the State highway commission has frequently required cooperation in the payment for the construction. The State has been greatly benefited by these roads, and particularly such rural communities as abound in the district I represent.

During the debate on the original bill, it was clearly demonstrated that the contribution of Massachusetts and her citizens to the appropriation carried in that bill would be several times the amount that would be returned to the State under its provisions for construction of roads within our State. The increase in tax rates since that time will very materially increase the percentage of the amount of the appropriation in this bill to be paid by Massachusetts. But it is the same old story. The power to put the burden on such a Commonwealth as Massachusetts has been very freely exercised by Congress during the past six years. The State has gladly cooperated when the needs were those of the prosecution of the war, but it seems to me the time has come to call a halt not only for the benefit of the citizens of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts but for the benefit of the Federal Treasury.

Let me for a moment call attention to the exact situation. The section has been added as a rider to the Post Office appropriation bill, which we to-day are asked within the limits of a very brief discussion to concur in. No consideration of any kind has been given by the House either as to the merits of the proposition or the amount of money involved. We have grown so satiated with the ease of action on big appropriations and so accustomed to billions that anything involving only $200,000,000 looks like a fly speck on the financial horizon. We must stop this inordinate extravagance. If we do not, we can not blame the people for lacking interest in purchase of new issues of our national securities and a marked depreciation in the value of issues already made.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWN] has made an eloquent argument that this money will be used in the employment of the returned soldiers. I want to say that the men who entered the service from my section were not those who handled the shovel and pick on the highway, and we do not intend to offer returning men that kind of occupation. These men were deserving of better employment before they left us, and those returning physically able will not be asked to accept poorer occupation than before they donned the khaki.

Further, the experiment of Federal construction to date does not seem to me to warrant an appropriation nearly three times as large as the original one. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] informs us that nearly $70,000,000 of the original appropriation is still available, and that there has been constructed in the past three years 45 miles of Federal cooperative road. Let us see something more tangible for our original appropriation than 45 miles of roadway before we embark on this $200,000,000 undigested and unconsidered appropriation.

Congressional extravagance and increased taxation invariably lead to additional discontent among the people.

Naval Bill—Dreadnaughts Not a Defense Against Modern Submarines and Similar Small Craft—Increase of Present Number a Menace to National Treasury.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAVID A. HOLLINGSWORTH,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 11, 1919.

On the bill (H. R. 15539) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I shall not try to get into my head or discuss at length the stupendous figures of this bill, aggregating, in appropriations and authorizations for the Naval Establishment for the year ending June 30, 1920, over $1,000,000,000. My mind staggers at the immensity of details, staggers at the tax burdens thus to be imposed upon the country in a time of assured peace.

When I came to Congress a few years ago, the term "billion-dollar Congress" was a party reproach to be avoided, but now officials of the Government and Members of Congress on both sides talk glibly of single billion-dollar expenditures with apparent unconcern.

The tax-ridden people are ignored.

I do not, as I say, care to discuss the details of this bill, which has already been done with great thoroughness by members of the committee and others in the confidence of the President, who is said to be asking for it. His reasons are given to members of the Naval Committee in confidence, and to which, perhaps, no objection should be made. But a number of other Members have stated openly in their remarks on the floor that they also have been shown in confidence the President's secret-code message from the emergency White House at Paris. Why? Is this House classified into Members who can be trusted and Members who can not be trusted with official secrets? Are we all blacklisted except a favored few? Is there a sort of secret political freemasonry in this open forum of the people, where the people's representatives are supposed to meet upon a level and act and part upon the square?

Barring the propriety of Members exploiting on the floor of the House their possession of secret confidences of the Executive in matters of public business, what inference does it furnish as to his estimate of other Members not thus honored; black sheep, so to speak? Are they expected to meekly assume the rôle of "me, too," a la Senator Platt in the old days?

For myself, it is a matter of indifference; I have never sought individual recognition at the White House, and am leaving Congress soon, presumably not to return, but I protest against this official favoritism and practical ignoring of nine-tenths of the membership of the House, each one of whom represents an equal unit of the American people.

The President told us before the war that we had an ample Navy, and I believed him, and still think he spoke the unvarnished truth, and the naval battles of the war have not been sufficiently numerous or destructive to cause in me a doubt of his prewar assurances. The British fleet easily kept the big German ships bottled up in the Kiel Canal before we entered the conflict, and this same condition seems to have continued to the end, and that is about all that can be said of our naval heroics during the war, outside of the activities of a few small craft, torpedo boats, submarines, and submarine destroyers.

The Paul Joneses and the Admiral Deweys of this war are easily counted. When the naval program of 1916 was under consideration I was unable to convince myself that we needed the 10 new dreadnaughts proposed in the bill; believed, and so stated at the time, that they could not be constructed in time to be of service in the war if America should be, as it subsequently was, forced to enter it; and, further, that the number of so-called sea monsters already in commission was sufficient for all practical purposes. I felt then, as I feel now, that the millions of the people's money proposed to be thus expended was a useless waste, and, right or wrong, I declined to give it my support.

I was subsequently reelected by a largely increased majority, although the friends of my Democratic opponent exploited him as a big Navy man and, if elected, he would have been expected in party fealty to follow the President's lead with lamblike faith. On the contrary, I felt that, in a sense, I was instructed otherwise by the electorate of the district I have the honor of representing. As a matter of fact, none of the huge leviathans of the sea thus provided for have yet been completed, although the greatest and most costly war of history has been fought and won, leaving their bulky unfinished parts, if ever put together in finished dreadnaught form, liable to rust out and be in junk long before we have another war with any naval power.

I stated then, as appears in the RECORD—and I give it now as my nonexpert opinion—that we do not need any great increase in our already efficient fleet of dreadnaughts and superdreadnaughts, unless we intend to sail into foreign waters in a defiant attitude and make of Uncle Sam a veritable jingo of the seas:

> A nation of 100,000,000 freemen, with unlimited resources, situate between two ocean barriers, and these barriers equipped, as they are or should be, with adequate coast fortifications, mines, submarines, and submarine destroyers, aircraft, good roads, as in Germany, connecting such ocean barriers and thus furnishing ready means of transportation of an army from one point of danger to another, on inside lines, need not in a just cause fear a combined world in arms, even if our Nation does not have a Navy "the strongest and most powerful in the world," as suggested by an eminent but somewhat belated militarist. We are not an aggressive people; our real permanent defense must always be in the justice, sincerity, and fair dealing of our Government with all the world.
